Mr. Wilkinson: First, I suggested for the future a wholly elected senate. Secondly, the upper House is a revising chamber; it has no power over money Bills or budgetary matters, which is of crucial significance.

I hope that, in judging these constitutional matters, people will recognise that, in a true democracy, representatives must know their electors and their electors must know them. Currently, we hardly ever see Members of the European Parliament. They seldom hold surgeries and are not involved in the day-to-day matters about which people really care. As I said, the electorate have more important concerns—their standard of living, their jobs, their health and their local schooling—than the constitutional monstrosities that the Government are proposing in the Queen's Speech.

8.13 pm

Miss Melanie Johnson (Welwyn Hatfield): During such a debate, for most of which I have been in the Chamber, I am especially proud to be on the Labour Benches—not only because of the quality of Labour Members' arguments, but because of the wider setting. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was right to begin his speech by placing the subject in a much wider context and I was disappointed that so few Conservative Members picked up on that.

Like Members of Parliament, the constitution exists for a purpose. As my hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Ms Blears) said, Members of Parliament are here to help people in their ordinary lives outside the House of Commons and the other place. I have been helped in my intention to be brief by the fact that the Tories have not mentioned law and order, one of the many matters which the constitution exists to uphold, but which the official Opposition removed from the scope of the debate by not referring to it in their amendment.

This morning, I was sitting not on these green Benches but on a magistrates' bench. I was dealing with people who had first offended at the age of 13 but who were still going through the offending and imprisonment routine in their 30s and 40s. One of the reasons why we are discussing the constitution is so that we can make the right decisions, implement the right systems and processes and allocate the right resources to tackle matters such as youth offending. I am disappointed that the official Opposition have not enabled the many Labour Members who wanted to talk about the wonderful things that the Government are doing on that score to say more about how we have the answers to many of the law and order problems that everybody outside faces.

The regional lists are closed but, as many hon. Members have said, they are not as closed as hereditary peerages. Indeed, they are less closed than the lists used when Tories went on the chicken run from, for example, St. Albans to Hitchin and Harpenden, neither of which constituencies is a million miles from mine. I know that the electors of St. Albans wanted to vote in my hon. Friend the Member for St. Albans (Mr. Pollard), but I am also sure that many of them wanted to say no to the former Member for that constituency, the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley). Like others, they found it disappointing not to have such a choice.

Selection in the Labour party is very democratic. I was on a short list of six candidates, several of whom are now also Members of Parliament. However democratic that process, electors may nevertheless vote for only one party, so it is ridiculous for Conservative Members to make a fuss about the European elections when they have lived with the system for Westminster elections for so many decades.

Conservative Members seem to be arguing that, because we are not doing enough about the hereditary principle, we should do nothing at all about it. I want to know what has happened to democracy and its principles. Why has the word "democracy" not been used more often in this debate? Perhaps Conservatives are uncomfortable with democratic means of getting their way in Parliament. Dubious means have been used in the other place to frustrate legislation. Indeed, I am sure that dubious means would have been used to frustrate legislation on the abolition of hunting, for example—the other place would have come to a different conclusion from that of the House of Commons. Moreover, as other hon. Members have asked, to what extent do those with hereditary peerages represent women and the ethnic minorities?

Conservative Members have spoken about tradition. I expect that similar arguments were used to justify slavery or other practices that were once seen as traditional but have since been recognised as inappropriate in a more modern society. How can we justify a second chamber in which a large number of the people making decisions are there by virtue of their birth, in which women are under-represented and in which ethnic minorities are hardly present? As an argument, tradition cannot have any weight.

Mr. Lansley: I recall that the Earl of Shaftesbury was a Conservative, so I do not think that the hon. Lady can arrogate to the Labour party the responsibility for abolishing slavery. Will she deal with the real argument about the House of Lords? The Labour manifesto said that abolition of the voting rights of hereditary peers would be a self-contained step. Conservatives believe that the step should not be self-contained; before it is taken, a clear decision must be made on what should come next.

Miss Johnson: I will be delighted to move on to that point in a moment. First, it was explicit in the Labour manifesto that this would be a two-stage process. In voting for a Labour Government—as people did with a massive majority—it was clear that people would be voting for a two-stage process, of which only one stage would be completed during this Parliament.

As has been said, we cannot reject hereditary Members. We are stuck with them by right of their ancestry—regardless of whether they are useful, appropriate, mad or sane. Some peers may fit into any one of those categories.

The two-stage process has been raised, and it is an interesting point. The Home Secretary made a powerful point about what you would do if you found that your dentist—or the pilot flying your plane—was in that position of responsibility as a result of a purely hereditary principle and had no relevant skills.

Mr. Grieve: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss Johnson: I am answering the point made by your hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley). If a dentist or surgeon worked on a hereditary basis, Opposition Members would not say, "Let us wait and see how it turns out before we decide whether that person should go on doing the job." That is the point that you are putting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. I am not putting any points. Would the hon. Lady try to use the correct parliamentary language?

Miss Johnson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I will endeavour to do so.

If we do not have the two stages, we will not move forward on the hereditary principle; instead, we will maintain something that we feel is dangerous, inappropriate and out of place. The Opposition argue that we should move forward in one fell swoop and not in two stages—a proposal for which we have electoral support. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)—who is not in his place at the moment—likened a royal commission to a broody hen sitting on china eggs. My grandparents had hens, and that was quite an effective manner of getting them to lay eggs. I would not want to indulge in my hon. Friend's pessimism on a royal commission.

The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) talked about moving in one fell swoop and about having an exact plan. That is the perfect ploy for delay, which must be the reason the Opposition proposed it. They know perfectly well that if this process has to be carried out in one fell swoop, it is highly unlikely to take place. They are keen to see a second chamber without any legitimacy, and one in which the hereditary principle is still very much alive and well. That would be ideal for the Opposition.

One could say that the House of Lords was built by the Tories, for the Tories, to keep the Tories in power. It is not an independent second chamber. We have heard evidence today of how it has been biased against Labour Governments. The built-in majority results in limited changes when the Tories are in power, but massive opposition when the Conservatives have been removed by the people from Government and do not have their previous legitimacy in this Chamber.

We can see why the Tories want to maintain the present position; their opposition is self-interested. This is about the class war, it is about the Conservatives making sure that they have a mechanism to try to defeat the will of the people of this country and about the rights of the House of Commons to have its say as the democratically elected Chamber.

Like many others, I am happy to see a second chamber—our proposals are not about removing the second Chamber altogether. However, we can make this first step in a good way to show that we are modern and looking to the future and that we do not want to support a principle that has no validity in a democratic system. We can move towards getting rid of hereditary peers and towards a discussion, through a royal commission, of how we make an effective second chamber that we all need in order to be an effective House of Commons.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): I found some of the parts of the speech by the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson) rather obscure, but one of her points went to the heart of our discussion. She said that the purpose of the constitution was to deliver what people wanted. From that, I inferred that she wished to see the constitution altered, so that she—and, by implication, her party—could deliver the policies that they thought were correct. I have to say that that is never how I have viewed the purpose of a constitution.

Miss Melanie Johnson: That is not what I meant in the slightest. I meant that the constitution needs to relate to the things that mean something to people in their ordinary lives—education and health, for example. The policies do not matter particularly, but the constitution must be capable of delivering the things that the electorate as a whole want.

Mr. Grieve: I am grateful to hear that from the hon. Lady, but she still misses a central point. One of the values of a constitution is to provide a framework within which decisions are taken which command as much approval within the community as possible, so that those decisions which are often inimical to certain groups within the community nevertheless command respect and are accepted. That applies as much to decisions taken by Conservative Governments as to those taken by Labour Governments.

[Mr. Grieve]

That is why I believe so strongly in a constitutional monarchy, which I believe provides the framework within which people can relate and have a common focus of loyalty, which is so important where there are other areas in which we may have disagreements.

It is with that in mind that I approach the whole question of constitutional reform. In the past year, I have spent many hours in this House debating the Scotland Act—I think we clocked up 190 hours. We have debated also the Human Rights Act—which, unlike some of my right hon. and hon. Friends, although they had good reasons, I supported and broadly approved of—the Government of Wales Act and a number of other constitutional measures.

It is perfectly proper for the House to consider constitutional reform, but we would do well to have in mind when we do so the purpose of what we are doing and what we are trying to achieve. In that context, there was a great deal of open scrutiny of the Human Rights Act. I pay tribute to the Secretary of State for Scotland, the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (Mr. Dewar) for the dialogue and debate which undoubtedly improved the Scotland Act. In contrast, the Government of Wales Act was one of the worst-drafted pieces of legislation I have ever seen, and its hallmark was precisely the reluctance of the Government's ministerial team to engage in any debate on it.

We are now facing a new raft of legislation. The question of the reform of the House of Lords will clearly attract a lot of emotion; we have heard quite a bit in this debate. I start from the premise that we need a second chamber—that seems to command a considerable measure of agreement in this House—that a revising chamber is important and that a chamber which can keep the lower House, the House of Commons, in check and make it think again, even if it will not ultimately stop legislation, is also important.

Unlike some Labour Members, I do not believe that unbridled democracy, which, of course, neither the United Kingdom nor any other country has, is an unbridled good. Ultimately, there must be checks and balances in any working constitution. Interestingly, it was from the Labour Benches that we heard that point, and I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley) for pointing out that the powers of the Commons to obstruct—not prevent—legislation, and to make the Government think again have been consistently eroded over the past 30 years. The result is bad legislation, which, ironically, places a greater burden on the upper House. It must do our job for us, and that creates more frequent confrontation than should be necessary.

The upper House is undoubtedly an eccentric institution. It has one great merit—historical continuity. However, I accept that that could be preserved even within the reforms that the Government have suggested. At the same time, the great virtue of the other place is undoubtedly its independence. That independence arises not only from the eccentric fact that it contains people who have not been placed there, who depend on no one and who are selected from a substantial and random pool, but because its members bring to bear a range of independent ideas, backgrounds, professions and jobs. The diversity is considerable. One need only consider the contributions made by several hereditary peers to note that they often turn out to be of considerable value. We ought to pause and think about that before we embark on any programme of reform.

We should also consider independence of party. Party allegiance will count for something, but the peers are not ultimately dependent on party. The hereditary peerage is beholden to no one. We should take that into account in considering how, if we are to get rid of the hereditary element, we can improve on it.

Let me offer briefly two possibilities. First, if we are to have an elected second chamber, which has much to commend it, the powers of the second chamber will be circumscribed in relation to the powers of the first. The likelihood is that the second chamber will therefore attract politicians for whom, I hesitate to say, it will not be the first choice of where to go. Far from the elected element representing diversity, we may end up with an elected element composed of placemen who want to go there because it is rather a soft touch. It may well attract those who fail to get into this House. Some creative thinking is required on that point if we are to embark on reform towards an elected second chamber.

If we are to stick with an appointed second chamber, we shall face considerable problems. It is no good the Prime Minister promising that some nebulous commission will make the appointments. We need to get down to the nitty gritty of what will happen in practice if we are to understand how appointments will take place in a way that will enable independence of thought to flourish. If we do not, we shall end up with a chamber of placemen. That is undesirable, but surmountable. Surely we must debate that issue.

I freely acknowledged during our debates on the Scotland Act 1998 that I had learnt a lot from the process of debating. However, we seem to have reached the stage at which debates on Bills involve a statement from the Government Front Bench, endorsed by clone-like comments from the Back Benches and ritually opposed from the Conservative side before they go through. It is no wonder that Bills return with hundreds of amendments from the upper House when it has considered the detail. We must consider how we can improve legislation, rather than simply ritualistically deciding that one part of the upper House offends some susceptibilities and should be got rid of. In fact, if our correspondence bundles reflect the position, the vast majority of the electorate find the House of Lords a wholly innocuous institution that generates many benefits.

Shona McIsaac: The hon. Gentleman mentioned his postbag. I have had a number of letters about the upper House and fox hunting. People who wanted hunting abolished believed that the Tory hereditary peers in the House of Lords would thwart any legislation. People in the country certainly understand that point.

Mr. Grieve: The Bill in question never went to the upper House, having failed to get through the House of Commons in the time allotted to it. Even if the upper House had rejected a Bill, there is no doubt that, if it had been re-presented, it would have got through. The checks and balances should not disappear. I fail to follow the rationale of the hon. Lady's argument.

I would be perfectly well prepared to engage in vigorous and interesting debate on how to create a reformed second chamber, but I will be blowed—and my constituents will be blowed, too, if I read their letters and the opinion polls correctly—if I am to sign away an element of the upper House's independence that has made some interesting and amusing contributions, and some of great benefit to our national life, when no one on the Government Benches is prepared to suggest how the replacement will improve on the current position.

Far from encouraging us to engage in debate, and to look at the big picture, the Government are asking us again and again to consider narrower and narrower issues. When the public—and, sometimes, even hon. Members on the Government Back Benches—point out that the Government are going off the rails, as with the closed list for proportional representation for next year's European elections, they are ridden over roughshod. We are told that it is all the fault of the upper House, but it is, in fact, clearly articulating the disquiet that the electorate are registering.

I hope, for the sake of my country, that the Government will go down as a successful reforming Government. They have come in with a lot of ideas, but after 18 months, evidence has emerged with startling and hideous clarity that they are blinkered against any reasonable debate. Above all, they are blinkered by their own spin doctors against articulating their fears or the drawbacks that they see in their own policies. There are one or two notable exceptions to that, which is why I singled out a few Ministers earlier.

The Government's proposals are dreadful. They fail to address the big picture, if I may use the Prime Minister's phrase. Until they do so, the Opposition are entitled to oppose them. I am sorry to say all this to the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), for whom I have a great deal of respect. I wish that one or two other Ministers were present. When Governments embark on policies that I believe to be highly objectionable, it is my duty to oppose them. The Government will, at the end of the day, have the majority to carry their proposals, but the development of the debate is extremely valuable.

Historically, those who have believed that they could ride roughshod over others to achieve their aims have tended to come a cropper. I am mindful of the comment made to King Henry V when he thought that he was on his way to conquer France. The Duke of Burgundy said that the King had all he required to achieve that, but that he would, by the time he achieved it, be heartily tired. Unless the Government think again, I intend to ensure that that is exactly how they feel.

Maria Eagle (Liverpool, Garston): I want to concentrate on the reference in the Opposition amendment to reform of the House of Lords, although the other two issues raised in the amendment are equally important. I have been struck during this debate and previous debates by one word that we hear time and again from Conservative Members. It was used by the Leader of the Opposition when he opened the debate on the Gracious Speech last Tuesday. It has been used constantly today, not least by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) and the right hon. Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd). The word in question is "independence".

I wish to explore what is meant by that. I have made several interventions to try to tease out what the Opposition mean when they use that word because it can have several meanings. What is it that is independent about the current upper Chamber? How representative is it? What is its composition? What does its voting record over the past few decades show?

I ask the House's forgiveness in advance for giving percentage figures that are inherently boring, but I hope that hon. Members will bear with me because they have an impact on one's view of the upper Chamber's independence. How representative are the current members of the upper Chamber? More than half of them are hereditary peers—626 out of 1,166. Of those, 299, or 47.7 per cent., take the Tory Whip. Some 17, or 2.7 per cent., take the Labour Whip, and 24, or 3.8 per cent., are Liberal Democrats, Another 198 are Cross Benchers, who swing all ways in casting their vote and are not reliable in a party sense, and they form 31.6 per cent. Some 88—or 14.5 per cent.—have no affiliation, not even to the Cross Benches.

My hon. Friends have already pointed out that less than a third of 1 per cent. are from the ethnic minorities and, of the hereditary peers, only 2.5 per cent are women. For the benefit of Conservative Members, I should point out that the two latter facts narrow the range of experiences on the basis of which those who sit in the upper Chamber can speak and vote. The value of having a diverse range of people in any legislature, including this House, is that they bring wider experiences of life to the consideration of legislation. That is an important point that is not often made.

At the general election, the Labour party experienced one of the three biggest landslides this century. It was the best result the party had ever had. The Conservatives will not wish to be reminded, but they had their worst result since 1832. What impact has that massive change in political views had on the independence of the House of Lords? Well, 47.7 per cent. of the hereditary peers still take the Tory Whip. In other words, the landslide had no impact whatever on the composition of the upper House.

Some Conservative Members have defended the hereditary principle, but others seemed somewhat embarrassed and said that they would vote to get rid of it, given the opportunity, in favour of a senate or something. It is a democratic outrage that an election can demonstrate such a change in political opinion but that the impact on the other place is zero. The hereditary peers are representative only of an old aristocratic section of society. I do not wish to sound prejudiced, but they overwhelmingly represent one social stratum and one type of life and experience. That does not fit my definition of independent. Most of them are conservative, if not in party affiliation, in experience, background and life style.

What of the life peers? I have heard it said that the life peers restore the balance and make the hereditary aspect acceptable. The current Chamber contains 531 life peers. The Tories have 173, or 32.5 per cent.; Labour has 158, or 29.7 per cent.; the Liberal Democrats have 45, or 8.4 per cent.; there are 120 Cross Benchers, or 22.5 per cent.; there are nine Law Lords, or 1.6 per cent.; and the bishops make up 4.8 per cent. Even among the life peers, the Tories still have the biggest group. Labour has fewer life peers, but the number is closer to equality with the Conservatives. Cross Benchers form the next biggest group, and the others make up the numbers.

The Tories still have the most peers, whether life or hereditary, despite the fact that they went down to their worst defeat since 1832. While the hereditary peers still exist, the Tories can call on them whenever they want to ensure victory in the upper Chamber.

That is not what I call independence of either representation or composition, although the Conservative party has a tendency to use the word "independent" interchangeably with the word "Conservative". We have all come across that on local councils, where they also used to use the word "ratepayer" to mean Conservative.

What have the peers done over the years in their voting record to indicate the independence that the Conservatives seem to value as their most important contribution? I have a list of important defeats inflicted on Governments by the House of Lords since the Liberal Government of 1909, and it makes illuminating reading. My conclusion, from reading the list, is that the upper Chamber has defeated Labour Governments much more often than it has defeated Conservative Governments and, when we used to have Liberal Governments—a long time ago now—the Lords defeated them much more often than they defeated Tory Governments.

The defeats that the upper Chamber has inflicted on Labour and Liberal Governments in the past have also been more extensive and on much more important pieces of legislation. The upper Chamber has also tended not to press Conservative Governments so far, so defeats are inflicted but entire Bills are not lost. A further important aspect is that defeats inflicted on Labour and Liberal Governments chimed in with the Conservative Opposition of the day.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Lady is making a fascinating and thoughtful speech. However, she is surely not suggesting that the upper Chamber, whether elected, appointed or hereditary, should operate by trying to achieve equality in the number of times that it rejects the legislation introduced by different Governments.

Maria Eagle: Of course I am not suggesting that—it would be nonsensical. I am trying to illustrate that the composition of the upper Chamber becomes important when we examine how it exercises its powers. I shall give some examples.

We have all read in history books about the crisis that brought about the first of the Parliament Acts, when the upper Chamber decided to defeat the Liberal Government's Finance Bill. The first Labour Government were defeated on proposals to nationalise the mines, and those defeats benefited the private mine owners, those landed and propertied interests that the upper Chamber tends to represent and protect.

At the time of the vast programmes of nationalisation on which the post-war Labour Government embarked, the Lords tended to defeat the Government in order to prevent the vesting days of nationalised industries. That was still occurring under the Wilson Governments, when the Lords inflicted defeats on legislation that nationalised assets. Those were clearly Government policies that had been included in the party's manifesto.

The upper Chamber has not only inflicted far fewer defeats on Conservative than on Labour Governments: it tends to concentrate its defeats of Labour Governments on important legislation and is not concerned that the policies were in the party's manifesto.

Reference has already been made to the manifesto commitment to reform the upper Chamber, which is specific. It says:

"The House of Lords must be reformed. As an initial, self-contained reform, not dependent on further reform in the future, the right of hereditary peers to sit and vote in the House of Lords will be ended by statute. This will be the first stage in a process of reform to make the House of Lords more democratic and representative. The legislative powers of the House of Lords will remain unaltered."

That is why I take exception to the implication in the amendment before us today that we should propose stage two of the reform before abolishing the rights of the hereditary peerage to sit and vote. It is clear from the manifesto that that is not envisaged as stage 1 of the reform.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): I have been listening to the hon. Lady's speech with great interest. Does she accept that Conservative Members would have vastly more faith in that second step if the royal commission had been set up on the day the Government came to power, so that there was a chance of putting serious reform before the House now?

Maria Eagle: I am happy to give my view on that. Of course, I am not a member of the Government but a Back-Bench supporter. There is no reason why the royal commission cannot report quickly, and I would support that. The view that the royal commission means that reform will disappear into the dim and distant future is not necessarily correct. Although I can understand the hon. Gentleman's view, which is based on the role of royal commissions in the past, this commission will not necessarily be the same.

It is important to see off, at long last, the hereditary peerage in the short Bill that will come before the House. That will not impede the upper Chamber's ability to conduct its affairs, or prevent it from doing its job within our constitution. There is no reason why the royal commission cannot report quickly and why stage two of the reform cannot be achieved more speedily than some Conservative Members fear it will be.

Mr. Grieve: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Maria Eagle: No, I am short of time.

We are witnessing a re-establishment of the pattern of the upper Chamber's behaviour towards a Labour Government. It has started to defeat the Government on major legislation to fulfil pledges and manifesto commitments. That is why the reform of the upper Chamber must proceed as quickly as possible, whether or not stage two has been worked out.

8.54 pm

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): The House should be grateful to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle) for introducing to the debate important and interesting facts about the many facets of independence, which the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) greatly exaggerated. I had visions of Conservative hereditary peers independently getting into their cars and into their planes in Tasmania to come here for the debate on European elections, when we know that their independence took the form of responding to a telephone call from the Conservative Whips in the other place, who whip peers every time they need them to vote.

The hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) made a frank admission about the role of personal votes. During the general election, my father went around saying, "Vote for my son. He needs a job." I suggested to him that that was not the ideal campaign slogan, but I know that I got a personal vote.

I agreed with the spirit of what the hon. Member for Salford (Ms Blears) was saying. On election turnout, my experience in Sheffield is that when political parties are fighting a close battle they do bother to make themselves relevant to the electorate. That is not the effect of the electoral system on its own—the fact that there is a contest is important. Sadly, under the current system, in many areas there is no real contest, so politicians do not bother to make themselves relevant. The hon. Lady's experience may differ, of course.

Two key issues were raised about the European elections. We are all grateful to the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) for another chance to debate that important issue and the reform of the House of Lords. A common thread runs through those arguments: can the Government exercise their will and make their own mistakes, or should we have a new doctrine that the other place exists to save the Government from themselves?

If Conservative Members believe that the Government's proposals are wrong, they should stand in the next election on a platform of returning to first past the post for European elections and to the existence of hereditary peers. If they had any confidence in themselves, they would believe that they could win an election in 2001 on that platform. The European Parliamentary Elections Bill has undergone a revising process, and the Conservatives should not block the legislation altogether because that is outside the domain of proper scrutiny.

Dr. Fox: There is a mechanism by which the Government and this House ultimately get their way—the Parliament Acts. That is the proper constitutional procedure to use.

Mr. Allan: We are all aware that the Parliament Acts are being invoked for the European Parliamentary Elections Bill, but the Conservatives gain no credit by delaying the legislation for so long and causing disruption.

The other common thread that runs through the two issues is that they both involve members of the Conservative establishment trying to protect themselves against what they see as threats in the form of fair voting systems and the end of their in-built majority in the House of Lords.

Liberal Democrat Members are prepared to associate ourselves with those important reforms. We agree that they are not perfect in every respect, and we have voiced criticisms on many occasions and will continue to do so. However, on balance the reforms are worth while.

On the European elections, most of the problems that have been revealed in our debates have related to internal Labour party selection processes rather than the voting system itself. We are interested to note that Conservative Members have linked that to the Neill committee recommendations, and I hope that they will be playing an active part in reforming party funding, as we certainly will be. The Home Secretary has already brought in the Registration of Political Parties Act 1998. We are now moving into a constitutional phase in which legislation deals with the internal affairs of political parties. That is necessary as we end the fiction of parties being secondary to individuals.

We are no longer in a world in which the country squire is elected and casually joins the Whig or Tory factions, and in which the party is secondary to the main interest of politics. In my experience, the party is one of people's principal concerns and is certainly all-pervasive in the House and another place, to a greater degree than has been admitted in the debate.

Conservative Members have no credibility on the issue of European elections. They allowed the Scotland Bill and the Wales Bill to be passed with closed-list systems. In Committee, they did not support a Liberal Democrat amendment, on the Belgian open-list system, to the European Parliamentary Elections Bill. The Conservative spokesman, Lord Mackay of Ardbrecknish, said that he accepted that the Bill was likely to be passed and that the most important point was to have a review afterwards. The Conservatives were offered precisely that in this House and, at that very late stage, seemed to turned down the amendment for which they had argued in Committee. Our only conclusion is that their real motive was to see the Bill fall, as indeed it did in the previous Session. Their real motive is to block a system in which all votes in June will count under a fair electoral system.

I was interested to note that young peers were called in evidence by the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth). The other day, I told a young peer, my noble Friend Lord Addington, that on the day of the Queen's Speech, I felt that some hon. Members were keen to dive straight into the House of Lords and say, "Come on, outside now." Lord Addington discouraged me from doing so. He is as wide as the Mace and a very keen rugby player, which suggests that his promise that peers can defend themselves perfectly well is adequate to scare us off and will force us to reform the House of Lords by constitutional means.

I certainly worry about the prevalence of gun cases in some of the Range Rovers in which peers travel up to London. That, too, suggests that the Government's constitutional method is the one to take us forward—even though I recognise that the atmosphere in this House is sometimes a little more heated.

Tory arguments on the issue of the House of Lords have become very confused. They appointed life peers while in government and did not criticise their role, yet now trot out the argument that such peers are no more than automata who have no independence and are not able to make any decision. We heard again about Tony's cronies. Although we are still appointing Paddy's cronies and Willie's cronies, there are still far more of Maggie's and John's cronies than anyone else's. Indeed, a few of Lloyd George's cronies are probably still lurking in the corner.

The fact that such peers are life peers does not devalue them completely. The fact that the Government are appointing them to redress the balance causes some concern, however, and we would certainly favour an independent commission creating a balance of peers according to the split of votes at the election. We believe that is the fairest way forward in the interim. To simply say that all life peers have a problem and all hereditary peers are great, which certainly seems to be the tone of Conservative arguments, devalues the debate.

We would like the second stage of reform to begin as quickly as possible. Conservative Members who have spoken in favour of some reform seem to be latching on to the single Conservative policy of wait and see. Famously, the Conservatives have a wait-and-see policy on other issues, too. They think that, until they have seen the total shape of reform, they should not make a decision or take any steps forward.

The role of the House of Lords is crucial. The Conservatives seem confused on that, too. On the European Parliamentary Elections Bill, they have argued all arguments, from the House of Lords being a revising Chamber to the matter being one of fundamental principle. The hon. Member for Garston has done us a great service in pointing out the way in which Conservative peers have defeated non-Conservative Governments, which suggests that the revision varies very much according to the political predilections of the Government of the day. Revision can mean many things according to who is in government. What seems clear is that revision takes the form of blocking far more frequently when centre and left parties are in government.

We believe that all this points to the need for a written constitution. We need clearer authority than any single Government or Parliament eventually to resolve such issues of major change. Parliament needs to cede some of its authority to an independent authority. We welcome the Human Rights Act 1998 as a key stage in that process. The lack of clarity in our constitution causes the fear on which the Conservatives are so keen to play. The fact that nothing is written down and that there is no other limiting factor creates a climate of fear, which the Conservatives are using to try to hold us back.

As an example of the assistance of the written constitution, I would cite the Republic of Ireland, where the Government have had to use explicit referendums to decide every cession of power to the European Union. The ability under a written constitution to decide what goes before and outwith Parliament and what needs to go to the people would be very helpful—not least to the Conservatives in clarifying and achieving some of the objectives that they state that they want to limit an Executive's powers.

It is time to be bold on this issue and to move on the agenda. We are prepared to associate ourselves with the agenda of electoral reform for Europe and reform of the House of Lords. We are prepared to let the electorate decide on whether that agenda has been successful. We do not want to leave that decision to hereditary peers, who were elected by no one.

9.4 pm

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford): This debate has left me with the definite impression that many Conservative Members have been asleep for the past 40 years—some for even longer. For 40 years, the House of Lords has been a mixture of hereditary and life peers. I do not recall the Conservatives making any substantial criticism of that arrangement until now, when it is proposed that it should change. Indeed, the Conservative party fought the general election on the basis that our constitution had reached such perfection that any one change would be for the worse. There was no question then of the House of Lords being in any way affected. Now that it is proposed to remove hereditary peers, we are told that we would be removing the respectable part of the House of Lords and that what is left—life peers—is no longer respectable and, indeed, quite intolerable. That reflects a state of mind, but I am not sure whether my mind can cope with it.

Conservative Members have also totally ignored the point that has been made in response to the broad slurs of "Tony's cronies" and placepersons. The Government have already said that a commission will be set up to appoint life peers to the House of Lords in the interim before a royal commission has considered the matter and defined a longer-term solution. Those aspects were not mentioned of course; they were inconvenient to the Conservatives' argument.

The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) was like a breath of fresh air. His contribution was elevated more by the flatness of the surrounding countryside, but at least he appears to be a paid-up member of the 20th century, unlike the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), who seems barely to have entered the 17th century, given the views that he expressed about the hereditary principle.

However, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe did not tell us why—if he abhors the hereditary peerage as much as he said—the hereditary peerage should have any say on the House that follows it. Why should it be there to define its successor, and why should that privilege linger for generations to come, in the form of the House of Lords that it has defined?

Conservative Members have made much of their argument that what is really at issue is the need to abolish the hereditary peerage at the same time as deciding what will follow it. That is sophistry, because Conservative Members know that, if so complex a measure were introduced, it would be balked at every turn in the House of Lords. There would be an exact repeat of what happened when Harold Wilson introduced a similar Bill. Why should the hereditary peerage be in a position to balk a Government's business? And not only this issue would be balked. There would be a road block of all the Government's measures for the next 12 months at least. For 12 months, there would be frustration of a Government who received an immense endorsement from the people only 18 months ago.

The truth underlying the Conservatives' feigned Olympian detachment is revealed as they seek to define a proper and appropriate process. Their stance hides the crude politics of the Conservative party maintaining its dominance—maintaining its say through the future House of Lords. The party has done it before; for a large part of the 20th century, it has maintained power under the table, through privilege. However, one of the main messages of 1 May 1997 was that the British people would not put up with that any longer. If Conservative Members realised that, they might halt their party's decline.

9.8 pm

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): The issues that we are discussing tonight are fundamental, because they concern the working of our democracy. I shall keep my remarks short, owing to a lack of time, but there is so much that could be said on these matters, and much of it has been said tonight.

The reason I am so concerned about these aspects of our democratic system is that, when one looks at the whole picture, it becomes clear that the Government are undermining the balance of our parliamentary democracy. Their plans for dealing with the issue of the second Chamber—how it should be constituted and who should sit in it—are part of that undermining process.

We should have debate first, then action. It is illogical and dishonest to do things the other way round, as the Government are intent on doing. We should debate first what the second Chamber is about and what it is to do. We should then debate how it should be constituted.

Personally, I do not defend the hereditary principle. Had there been anything to inherit in my family, I would have been rather annoyed if my brother had inherited it all and I had been ignored. It is an academic matter as there was nothing to inherit. My brother and I are therefore good friends. I would have been angry had it not been so.

I have been amused to hear the arguments of Labour Members about the so-called Conservative majority among hereditary peers. I fully appreciate the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), whose logic I usually admire—although I might not always agree with her. However, that is not my position this evening. The hon. Lady and her hon. Friends have overlooked an important point. They may challenge the legitimacy of hereditary peers, but they cannot challenge their independence. The fact is that one does not inherit political views. They are not in the blood. It just happens—

Maria Eagle: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Laing: I shall give way in a moment.

It just happens that many of those who sit through an hereditary right in another place are Conservatives. Surely Labour Members must appreciate that tomorrow's hereditary peers could become members of the Labour party. They could do so if they wanted to because they are independent.

Maria Eagle: My points were made on the basis of figures that show how many of the hereditary peerage take the Conservative Whip. Of course that may change over generations.

Mrs. Laing: I agree. The hon. Lady's facts and figures are indisputable. However, she cannot dispute that if 100 hereditary Members of another place decided tomorrow to join the Labour party, they could do so. They would be able to do that because they are independent. Therefore, to challenge the independence of hereditary peers is wrong. This point has been entirely overlooked through prejudice.

Much of the debate has been about what people who sit in another place do in their leisure time. That is irrelevant. It does not matter whether someone goes hunting on a horse, plays badminton or whatever. That is irrelevant. What matters is what they do when they are in Parliament. I repeat that one does not inherit political views. Such views come not through the blood but through decisions which independent people reach on their own, and in the 1990s we are all individuals.

I am sure that my uncle, who was once chairman of the Labour party in Scotland, is most amused that I am sitting on the Conservative Benches.

Dr. Fox: Upwardly mobile.

Mrs. Laing: I wonder—we Conservative Members will be that when we are sitting again on the Government Benches.

I shall turn briefly to my second point. Once again, the Home Secretary did not make clear this evening his attitude to the need to regulate the conduct of referendums. If referendums are to be part of our constitutional democracy, we must have regulations. If a referendum is not properly conducted, the result is undermined and the referendum has no legitimacy. I introduced a Bill a few weeks ago that would have had the effect of regulating referendums in accordance with the recommendations of the Neill committee. The Government did not oppose my Bill but neither have they supported it. We are asking only for a fair and level playing field.

I ask Ministers to tell us what the Government are afraid of. What are they afraid of when they refuse to legislate on the conduct of referendums? Are they afraid that on the next referendum that is called on a major constitutional issue, as is likely within the next year or so, the Neill committee's recommendations will mean that the Government will not be able to use their machine and taxpayers' money to fight their side of the argument?

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): They are afraid of the people.

Mrs. Laing: Indeed, they must be afraid of the people. If they are not afraid of the people, why are they afraid to consult the people under fair rules? Why are town council elections, parish council elections and even some student elections at universities better conducted than referendums on major constitutional issues? It is illogical and unfair; unless and until the Government agree to establish rules for the proper regulation of referendums, we shall continue to ask: of what are they afraid? If the Government want to conduct opinion polls, they can continue to do so; but if they want a referendum to be legitimate, it must be conducted under rules.

The hon. Member for Salford (Ms Blears) said that the people who elected us to Parliament are not interested in constitutional matters. If people believe that the constitution is a dry and boring matter which is discussed only by lawyers, it is not surprising that they are not especially interested. However, when they begin to realise the Government's underlying agenda for change to our constitution—surreptitious, gradual and, I would argue, dishonest change, because the Government do not explain their overall strategy—the people become interested in the constitution. They will quickly come to resent what the Government are doing to undermine our parliamentary democracy.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): This debate began in a most interesting fashion, with the Home Secretary detailing what he described as the Government's detailed and thorough constitutional changes. However, they must have been different constitutional changes from those that have been presented to the House, which could not have been described as either detailed or thorough. The parliamentary Session began with the Government's devolution proposals, which laid the ground for the further constitutional changes that have since been proposed. To understand exactly what stage we have reached in those constitutional changes, we need to examine the process, for it is instructive in showing how the Government have gone about those changes.

First, let us look at what we were promised before we reached the devolution referendum, when we were still at the White Paper stage. We were promised that the proposals would preserve the Union and that they would bring an end to nationalism. The Secretary of State for Defence said that they would kill nationalism stone dead. Well, nationalism did not appear to be stone dead in north-east Scotland last Thursday, when the nationalists looked rather triumphant. That only goes to show that when we said that the proposals presented a tremendous danger to the Union, our warning was correct.

During the passage of the Scotland Bill through the House, we were told that the Government would always look at devolution in the worst-case scenario; they would legislate just in case the consensus broke down. Despite the lovely winceyette, cuddly and all-inclusive, new-age politics that we were supposed to have in Scotland—which fell apart last Thursday—the Government would always look at the worst-case scenario, just in case. We said in return that we would be constructive in our approach to the Bill.

Is that what we got? It is not. In the other place, we got 186 groups of amendments to the Government's flagship Bill: the Government had to amend a Bill on their main proposal for constitutional change that was desperately flawed, as we had warned—it was so flawed that a bus could be driven through the holes in it. The second Chamber here, which the Government say has no democratic legitimacy, had to deal with 186 groups of amendments to a Bill that sets up a unicameral body. That, in the Home Secretary's words, was detailed and thorough. The Bill was a dog's breakfast—it was even being amended at Third Reading, days before coming back to this House.

We have already had several verdicts on devolution and I believe that we are to get another in the next couple of days. We never believe the leaks that we read in newspapers, but if the leaks in The Herald are to be believed, the verdict of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, which is dominated by Labour Members, will be damning indeed, saying that the Bill was poorly drafted and that Ministers did not understand their briefs. There are various criticisms of the process and of the fact that it will not fulfil the promises that the Government had outlined at first. Ministers had a unique combination of incompetence and naivety in their approach to the Bill, and—typically for the culture of the Government—Ministers of State get the blame, not Secretaries of State.

There was a by-election last week and, in the collapse of the Labour party's vote, we saw that the public had also lost confidence in the ability of the Secretary of State for Scotland to deal with the nationalists, although, as a by-product, I noticed that the Liberal Democrats were today cosying up to the Scottish nationalists, just in case they might be the winners in future elections. The Liberal Democrats take the term "lowest common denominator" to new levels.

On Wales, which is the other part of the flagship, we heard interesting noises from the Home Secretary—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the terms of the motion are quite carefully defined, and he should refer to it.

Dr. Fox: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am simply pointing out, as your fellow Deputy Speaker pointed out earlier, that background issues lay behind the Government's broader constitutional programme.

The Home Secretary said in his opening speech that he believes in equal funding in respect of referendums. I presume, therefore, that he agrees with the Neill committee, which had grave reservations about the referendum in Wales—had the Government not spent money on one side, there might have been a different result. That has enormous constitutional implications for us, and is something that we should consider.

As several speakers—most notably, my right hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd)—have said, the most important section of this part of the agenda is the fact that the West Lothian question remains unanswered: 20 years after that question was first asked by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), we still have no answer to an important constitutional conundrum.

How can it be that the West Lothian question was regarded as so unimportant that it was not addressed in the Government's well-thought-out, detailed and thorough constitutional programme? The reason is that it cannot be answered within the Government's devolution plans, because devolution cannot answer the West Lothian question. The West Lothian question defies the logic of devolution, which says that the constitutional arrangements in one part of the kingdom can be changed without changing them in the rest.

One of the issues that has come forward clearly today is the conduct of referendums. I thank those who have worked with us on that in recent times—Charter 88, the constitutional unit, the Electoral Reform Society; those who responded to our reasoned plea—the Law Lords, the peers, members of all parties in this House and the bishops; and all those of all parties and none who responded to what we had asked.

What we are interested in achieving in the conduct of referendums has to do with something that lies at the heart of the British people—a sense of fairness. I do not need to point out to the House that the groups with which we have worked are hardly the usual bedfellows for the Conservative party, but they all share a fear of the Government's approach to referendums.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) said so clearly—not only tonight, but on a previous occasion—if referendums are to be part of our constitutional architecture, and it seems that they shall be, we need better guidelines than we have at present. As she pointed out, we have adequate guidelines for the conduct of every other type of election in this country; why not for the conduct of referendums?

I was extremely interested in what the Home Secretary had to say, because—if I may use the term—his mood music was interesting and fair on this subject. As he will know, we have, with the co-operation of the groups that I have mentioned and a large input from Charter 88, developed a draft Bill which we believe could answer these points. I hope that he will enter into conversation with us, to discuss the content of the Bill and whether we could legislate in this Session in respect of this part of what the Neill committee has said. Any assurance that he could give the House—

Mr. Straw indicated assent.

Dr. Fox: The Home Secretary is nodding, and I am pleased to see that.

What we propose is very simple. We believe that there is a need for minimum regulation to deal with finance and media access during a referendum campaign. There is nothing to prevent the Government from putting their case in any referendum to the people—that is right and proper. What is objectionable is the Government using taxpayers' money to support only one side—as happened in Wales—because taxpayers will inevitably support both sides.

Having established minimum regulations on finance and media access to both sides of a referendum campaign, we should go further and examine what other regulations may be necessary. It would be sensible to consider who should set the question in the referendum, who should decide on the timing, what constitutes validity and what thresholds need to be set. Those questions should be of equal importance to both sides, as they deal not with specific issues, but with the mechanism by which a referendum would be valid in the eyes of the electorate. That is the most important aspect. Will those who lose in a referendum believe that it was fair and accept the result? The low turnout was one of the factors that undermined the referendum in Wales.

We need look no further than the referendums that may come up in the near future. I have no idea whether the Liberal Democrats know when the referendum on proportional representation will take place—if they do, their information is probably not correct—but we know that it will happen at some point. There will also be a referendum on economic and monetary union. Without the referendum commission, the question would probably be, "I, the Prime Minister, the Almighty, being such a great guy, if, at some point in the future, I decide that it would be reasonably good for the United Kingdom to consider monetary union, do you think that I perhaps should be given the chance to take this country in at some point to be decided in the future?" That is the sort of crisp question that we are likely to get, and it is all the more reason to establish a mechanism to make the process more valid.

What is the difference in validity between a pre-legislative and a post-legislative referendum? Our recent experience in Wales and Scotland strengthens the case for a post-legislative referendum. A Bill has been amended and changed until it is almost unrecognisable, yet in both its forms, it is supposed to be the same measure that the voters voted for, and that cannot be so.

The case for a post-legislative referendum is also strengthened by the changes being made to the legislation for London, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) pointed out. My right hon. Friend the Member for Fareham referred to other cases in which people have voted for one thing and have got something quite different. It should be our practice to have post-legislative not pre-legislative referendums, if they are to have legitimacy.

I do not intend to say much about the European Parliamentary Elections Bill. We have had a rota, and have taken turns to speak on that Bill, so there can hardly be a Member who has not spoken on it. The attitude of Labour and Liberal Democrat Members is instructive. There is a clear principle, which is choice for voters. Choice for voters is good, maximal choice is best, and some choice is better than none. However, the Government have adopted the reverse principle—not voter first, but party first.

I was astonished to hear the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) say that the Salisbury convention had been badly shaken by the decision to reject the closed list. There is nothing in the Labour manifesto about closed lists. The Liberal Democrats did not say that they would change from open to closed lists when it suited them. This was a properly constituted matter: the House of Lords decided that the House of Commons should think again.

The House of Commons can get its way through the Parliament Acts, and the Government have made it clear that they will do so. That is the correct process. For some reason, the idea has been put about that there has been undue process and an abuse of Parliament. This is how Parliament is supposed to work. We have a system of checks and balances to ensure that the House of Commons gets its way, but does not rush through legislation if the other Chamber believes that it should think again.

I hear people say that this is the settled will of the House of Commons. It is the settled will of the House of Commons through the Whips—there is no doubt about that—but it is hardly the settled will of the House of Commons as conveyed by Labour Members in speeches here. Labour Members went out of their way to be absent: to be in their constituencies, having dinner, seeing their best friends or doing anything to avoid having to defend a position that they found very unpalatable.

Most of today's debate has concerned reform of the Upper House. I feel that, generally speaking, the standard of debate on this issue should be raised from the caricature and tiresome class-war rhetoric that has featured too much today. I exempt the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), who made an informative and intelligent speech. I wish that more of her colleagues had done the same.

The debate is not about the Government's right to have stage one without stage two, which is clearly in their manifesto; it is about whether the Government are wise, or correct, to have stage one without stage two. It is not about the Conservative party's blindly defending the rights of hereditary peers—although that is what the Labour party would love us to do, because it would make its job so much easier. It is very unlikely that, if we started with a blank piece of paper, we would end up with the constitutional position in which the United Kingdom currently finds itself.

I do, however, defend the public service of men and women in the other place, over many years. That has been cheaply denigrated today by too many Labour Members, many of whom have been in Parliament for only a short time. Above all, Conservative Members defend the right of the people to know how they are to be governed. In saying that they want stage one without stage two, the Government are, in effect, saying, "We are going to change the way in which you, the people of Britain, are to be governed through Parliament, but we are not going to tell you what that change is to be".

We need, first, to determine whether there is a need for a second chamber. My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) presented a passionate defence of our two-chamber system today. Next, we need to decide on the role and function of a second chamber: we must do that before we decide on its composition. To decide who is to sit in a chamber before deciding what it is to do is rather like setting up a factory, employing staff and then deciding what the factory will make. It would be ridiculous to put us in such a position.

After that, we should decide on our criteria for the chamber. We have set out six criteria for any change to the upper House. It should hold the Government to account better than the present Chamber; it should have a substantial number of independent Members, free of any political party; the Prime Minister's power should not be increased; Members must be drawn from all parts of the United Kingdom; the impact of reform on both Houses should be considered; and the House of Commons must remain supreme. Those are clear criteria, set out by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Straw: Do those criteria include an end to the built-in 3:1 Tory majority in the other place?

Dr. Fox: It is typical of the Home Secretary to ask such a question. We are talking about engaging openly in a process of reform, which, as the Home Secretary knows, we have offered to do on several occasions. We have wanted to take part in a full, one-stage, coherent process of reform. We are talking about the better governance of the United Kingdom—and what does the Home Secretary talk about? He talks about the Labour party's interests. The Labour party can see any part of constitutional change only in terms of what is in its interests. Only when we have decided what the role of the Chamber can be shall we be able to decide what its composition should be.

We heard one or two extraordinarily interesting contributions. Perhaps the best was that of the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac), who, in a "Beanoesque" speech, said, "No one voted for a candidate in the election. No one voted for me." The hon. Lady has not worked out that the whole point of an election is that the voters are supposed to have a choice. According to her, it is all about party. It takes one of the newest Members of Parliament to speak the truth, for that is indeed what it is all about for the Labour party: it is all about party.

Last week, Lady Jay referred, in the other place, to Cross Benchers' being independent "in name only". That betrayed the fact that, under the current Administration, people are either with the Government or against them. It is not possible to be independent: you are either "them" or "us". As my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood pointed out, they do not understand the danger of patronage.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester said, unusually in this Government, the new life peers being created are predominantly Government peers—54 per cent. so far. It is clear that the Government intend to pack the upper House, to increase the Prime Minister's power and to increase the Executive's power when we should be bringing it under check.

What is the demand for the constitutional change that is being put forward? Are our voters stretching out in constituencies demanding constitutional change? Are lorry loads of petitions making their way into the House at this moment to be dumped on our desks? Do barges sail up the Thames, with the people of this country demanding that we have constitutional change? No, they do not. That is not what people are interested in, as many hon. Members have pointed out.

The trouble is that the Government believe that history began on 1 May 1997. They have little respect for our traditions or our heritage. [Interruption.] Labour Members may well roar their approval because that is exactly the perspective. They see us not as a nation state, but as a conglomeration of regions, just as they see the electorate not as a whole, but as a coalition of minorities. As they say, they want us to be governed by modern European mechanisms of government, but we are not a modern European nation. [Laughter.] We are a strong, independent nation state that twice this century, because of the values that we have held, has been able to get Europe out of trouble of its own making. It is typical of how little feel the Labour party has for our country's traditions that it can mock them in such a way.

I look forward to the Secretary of State for Wales answering the debate. He is in a particularly difficult position: either he wins his election and gets a job that he does not want, or he stays in extended exile. I enjoyed his shotgun wedding to the Welsh Labour party last week, with him being led down the aisle by the Prime Minister. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) could be the best man, but best man is not a term that counts in the Labour party; only Blair's man counts.

We have in the Secretary of State someone who has come late to the constitutional debate, having not taken part in the devolution flagship debates, and he is left to clear up what is now a mess. The European Parliamentary Elections Bill tries to gag the voters and to boost the party bosses. The House of Lords reform is to bolster the Prime Minister, not to improve how we are governed. The nationalists are resurgent. The United Kingdom is in peril.

There is more that unites us as a nation than divides us, but the Labour party refuses to see it. The Government's approach is piecemeal, vacuous and superficial. It is all about Labour. It may be good for Labour, but it is bad for the United Kingdom. It should be opposed. We will relish that opposition.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Alun Michael): What a rant that was. I was looking forward to a wide-ranging debate reflecting the scope and breadth of the Government's constitutional reform programme. From devolution to the incorporation of human rights legislation into domestic law, to the reform of the other place, the Government are committed to overhauling and modernising our constitution. Instead of that sort of debate, we have had a narrow, petty amendment, reflected in narrow, petty arguments from Opposition Members. What we have heard in the past few minutes was the worst and narrowest of the contributions.

If anyone has come late to the constitutional debate, it is the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox). I have been involved in that debate for more than 30 years. My commitment over the years is beyond doubt. After the contribution that he has just made, his commitment to anything is slightly doubtful.

In the last Session, 10 constitutional measures were enacted; when constitutional experts said that two would be ambitious, yet it would have been 11 but for the refusal of the hereditary peers to accept the wishes of those who have been elected. There is more work to come in this Session, as well as a number of draft Bills—more than enough, I would have thought, to engage Conservative Members—yet instead there has been a series of stale and stereotyped attempts to defend the indefensible: the so-called right of an in-built Conservative majority to frustrate the policies of an elected majority in the House of Commons. That is what the debate has been about.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) was right to criticise what he described as the "ritual opposition" of Conservative Members, who have debated nothing but one issue. They have offered no real debate on the European elections or on the Neill committee's report. They have shown no real engagement on the major constitutional issues raised by the 10 major constitutional measures that I mentioned. They have also not attempted to debate the measures that were introduced in the Gracious Speech.

I tell the hon. Member for Woodspring that the Government's authority is based on our constitution, and on the confidence with which people voted for us and their desire for us to make this a modern, democratic Government. He has confessed that the previous Government did not leave us a modern and democratic House.

The language used by Conservative Members in today's debate has been curious and loaded with prejudice. They accuse us of undertaking reform piecemeal. It is more appropriate to talk of incremental change. As we have an uncodified and unwritten constitution, we are bound to effect change in a case-by-case, incremental process. I thought that Conservative Members favoured such a process—of careful, incremental change, driven by a coherent philosophy. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary clearly said at the beginning of the debate, we certainly take such an approach.

I agree with the comment made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley) on the Government's courage in proceeding with the modernisation agenda at every level of government.

Mr. Lansley: I fear that, in his comments on the previous Session, the right hon. Gentleman may be failing to distinguish between activity and achievement. Nevertheless, on the coming Session, will he explain—if he has a coherent philosophy—what the Government propose as the democratic and modern alternatives to the current House of Lords and to current electoral systems?

Mr. Michael: The alternatives are simply what we promised in our manifesto—to remove the entirely undemocratic and unjustifiable votes of elected peers. We shall then move forward. Until we have taken the first action, we cannot get Conservative Members to engage in proper debate. They are stuck on defending the indefensible—an unelected majority in the other place. Once we have dealt with that, perhaps the Government will be able to have a coherent debate with Conservative Members and not only with the Liberal Democrats. Conservative Members have opted out of the debate.

This Session will also bear witness to several of the previous Session's measures bearing fruit. The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) mentioned that point. As a consequence of the Human Rights Act 1998, for example, the Bills that have been published already this Session have been accompanied by ministerial statements certifying their compliance with the provisions of the European convention on human rights. The constitutional reforms that the Government have undertaken are starting to have a direct beneficial effect on the lives of ordinary people. None the less, today's Conservative amendment is narrow, bitter and arid.

Why did Conservative Members not want to talk about the new Northern Ireland Assembly, the government of London, or the sentence in the Address celebrating the fact that "people will be able to vote in elections to the Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly next year, and my Government will work to ensure that both are established successfully"?

It was not until the hon. Member for Woodspring replied for the Opposition that a lame attempt was made to criticise the exciting progress being made by the Government. Perhaps Conservative Members are so quiet now because that legislation completed its passage, finishing the job, in the previous Session.

The fact is that 1999 will be very much a year of destiny for Wales and Scotland and for all of the United Kingdom. I am very concerned that there are those in Westminster and in Whitehall who misunderstand the process of change that we are experiencing, just as they seemed to misunderstand the referendum process that we experienced. Conservative Members' mention of referendums and, in their amendment, of the Neill report was meant simply as a hook to be used in attacking the devolution process. Dare I say it that hon. Members and some people in Whitehall believe that, after 7 May, they will no longer have to consider or bother about Wales or Scotland?

There are also those who pursue a nationalist agenda and talk as if, after devolution, a deep divide will develop between the English border and the Welsh border. There is neither a new Offa's dyke to be erected nor a new Welsh sea to come between us. The point of our constitutional change is for the people of Wales to elect representatives who are directly accountable for the decisions that are currently taken by the Welsh Office. It will be essential for the Assembly to engage with other Departments of state and be involved in legislation and administration that is done on an England and Wales basis or a United Kingdom basis.

Reform of the House of Lords, reform of this House and systems of election are closely related and are about improving democracy in this country. They are not about undermining our democracy, as the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) suggested, any more than devolution is about separation. It does not mean cutting the ties that bind us. Instead, it gives us the opportunity to create better government. My vision of devolution is not about the arid separatism that nationalism implies. It is dynamic devolution, in which accountability and democratic participation are brought to decision making for Wales and in which we develop new partnerships and new links between the different levels of government to create a dynamic economy and movement in social and economic development, enhance the opportunities available to every sector of the economy and society in Wales and move the whole United Kingdom forward.

Dr. Fox: Will the great new democratic freedom in Wales and the lust for devolution be extended to the Labour party in the form of one member, one vote?

Mr. Michael: Every member of the Labour party will have a vote in the selection of the leader of the Labour party in Wales.

It is not surprising that the hon. Gentleman wants to move away from the argument about the effectiveness of our systems. If we are to be effective—if this House and the House of Lords are to be effective—it is important that decisions should be taken at the right level, that we should get the right results and that we should enhance quality of life for people in every part of this land. Conservative Members seem to have lost sight of the fact that that is what constitutional change is about. It is not about arid theory; it is about making life better for people.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): My right hon. Friend is expounding the most exciting aspect of the devolution debate. For too long, this country has been over-centralised. Now, we have the opportunity to release the talent of the British people in all their countries and regions. That is the way to get this country moving again. I thank him for raising the subject.

Mr. Michael: I am delighted that my right hon. Friend, as an English Member, understands the process of devolution and the fact that, for it to be effective, there needs to be a dynamic partnership between different levels of government. That is why I shall be putting my energy in the coming months into preparing the ground for that new relationship and dynamic devolution that I spoke about earlier.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I, a number of my hon. Friends and even the Home Secretary were brought to account by the Deputy Speaker when we ranged outside the narrow confines of the amendment. It appears that the Secretary of State for Wales is straying on territory—

Madam Speaker: Order. I am perfectly capable of knowing what the Secretary of State is saying.

Mr. Michael: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman was not here when the Opposition spokesman raised the same points of devolution to Wales to which I am alluding. I am referring briefly to those issues because they are vital. Until the winding-up speech, the Opposition chose to ignore them. I am also trying to bring home to the hon. Gentleman, if he would care to listen, the fact brought to the debate by my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac)—that the views of ordinary people are important. Some 70 per cent. of her constituents wanted to scrap the voting rights of hereditary peers. That reflects the views of my constituents. My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson) asked us to reflect on what our constituents expect of us—an improvement in the quality of their lives. That is the basis on which we should judge constitutional change. Those who operate at the grass roots—businesses, trade unions, local authorities and voluntary organisations—need to be the partners of Parliament or an elected Assembly. The votes of hereditary peers have never helped us on such issues.

Reference has been made to devolution, which as my predecessor—my right hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies)—said is not an event but a process. It is neither a single one-off election nor a point on a process from dependency to complete independence, but a process of engaging people as we seek to do in Wales and in every part of the United Kingdom.

Defending the powers of hereditary peers seems a million miles away from the issues that affect our constituents. That is why I am delighted that the Gracious Speech this year underlines the importance of the events of devolution, including the election, in the next 12 months. It reminds us that those developments will enhance the unity of the United Kingdom, not undermine it. England and Wales will remain partners, bound together by our common legal and economic framework and the accidents of Welsh geography, but allowing us to express our distinctive identity through the Welsh Assembly, which will provide us with our own clear voice.

Let us apply to the House of Lords and the arguments made by the Opposition the same test of success that I will apply to the Welsh Assembly. What does it do for our people in terms of a strong economy, jobs, better education, opportunities for all, a better health service and healthy, safe communities? The Assembly and the House will be judged by those criteria, which should also apply to the House of Lords. We should consider whether the retention of the rights of hereditary peers can do anything to help.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): My right hon. Friend mentioned Offa's dyke. He will know that that great earthwork goes through my constituency, as does the earthwork of Watt. However, I am not concerned with Anglo-Saxon imperialists. How does my right hon. Friend envisage his plans helping the economy in my constituency? What will his proposals do for Alyn and Deeside?

Mr. Michael: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He does not realise that, as a teenager, I became a world expert on Watt's dyke, but I shall speak to him about that some other time. Each of the 10 measures to which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary referred will improve the quality of life and its freedoms and the accountability and responsibilities of institutions to the British people. That is our agenda and that of my hon. Friend in his constituency and his work.

Mr. Grieve: I know that time is short and that the Minister still has points to make. He was kind enough to pick up my remark that we should get away from ritual. In the next few minutes, would he be willing to address some of the issues that were raised in the debate?

Mr. Michael: Yes, but to do so I shall have to turn to my right hon. and hon. Friends and to the Liberal Democrats, as they were not addressed by the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues.

The right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) noted the ambitious nature of the Government's reform programme. I welcome the fact that he and his party are prepared to enter into debate about modernisation. We may not always agree—it would be nice if the Conservatives took that on board—but he was right to point out that the underlying casuistry of the self-seeking actions by the hereditary peers, who have undermined the conventions of our democratic traditions, has been defended outrageously by Conservative Members this evening.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Michael: I am coming to the speech by the right hon and learned Gentleman.

In contrast, the Conservative speeches—the right hon. and learned Gentleman was the first who gave the slightest hint of engaging in debate on how to reform the House of Lords—

Mr. Clarke rose—

Mr. Michael: I should get my retaliation in before the right hon. and learned Gentleman replies. He was the first for some time to give the slightest hint of engaging in a debate on how to reform the House of Lords, but he retreated rapidly from any real engagement. We shall engage the Conservatives in a full debate only when the rights of hereditary peers have been removed. The Conservatives will not seek to restore such a barmy constitutional anachronism, so let us remove the appendix and get on with improving the health of the body politic.

Mr. Clarke: I thank the Minister for giving way. He listened to some of the debate, in which I heard no Conservative Member defend our right to a permanent majority in the upper House. Will he address the question that the Bill would make the present Government the first for almost 200 years accountable to a second House entirely appointed by the Executive? Does he have a solitary argument in favour of that in terms of the accountability that he is now talking about?

Mr. Michael: No. The composition of the House of Lords will be changed by the removal of the hereditary peers, so the form that it then takes will be a matter for constitutional debate and consultation.

Sir Norman Fowler: Answer the question.

Mr. Michael: I have answered the question; if Conservative Members listened to the question and the answer, they might learn something.

The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe made a quirky claim to be a close ally of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), which sounded like another vicious personal attack. Other than that, his position was illogical and untenable. He argued that the outrage of the hereditary peers' genetic veto should continue while we build a consensus on how to construct a second chamber that retains and improves what is good about the House of Lords and removes what is bad. When we published our proposals in opposition, I found it extraordinary to behold the instant conversion of hereditary peers to the wholesale democratisation of the House of Lords provided that we waited until every detail had been worked out and agreed before we removed their votes.

The right hon. Member for Fareham (Sir P. Lloyd) is usually a thoughtful man, but he made the ridiculous assertion that the hereditary peers are independent and not merely Conservative. Of course we need a balance in the constitution, as the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe rightly said, but how will parliamentary democracy be reduced if we make the House of Lords more democratic? Reforming the House of Lords is like eating an elephant; it must be done a bite at a time. That suggestion seems to contain much wisdom.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) made a typically vigorous speech and said a great deal with which I agreed. I am glad that he was not intimidated by his confrontation with large, gun-toting, rugby-playing Liberal peers. The hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) was worried about the Government's response to the Neill report. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary dealt with those issues comprehensively and at length on 9 November.

I remind Conservative Members that we made clear in the general election our intentions for the House of Lords. Our manifesto said:

> "As an initial, self-contained reform, not dependent on further reform in the future, the right of hereditary peers to sit and vote in the House of Lords will be ended by statute. This will be the first stage in a process of reform to make the House of Lords more democratic and representative. The legislative powers of the House of Lords will remain unaltered."

Our intentions were clear and we have pursued them in government.

It is absolutely clear that no Government this century have undertaken such a radical and wide-ranging overhaul of our constitution. Far from wrecking the constitution, we have sought to amend it. The Liberal Democrats have been engaged in that process but there has been no Conservative engagement, to that party's eternal shame. Conservatives can claim no rights or authority as supporters of the constitution when their approach is entirely negative and destructive.

During this Parliament, we will ensure that decisions are taken much closer to the people. We will improve local government and government at the Welsh, Scottish and Northern Ireland level. We will ensure that people no longer have to go to Strasbourg to enforce their basic human rights. We will clean up politics by giving effect to the recommendations of the Neill committee. We will end the absurd anachronism by which people can serve in this legislature not by virtue of election or their own merits but by accident of birth. I am proud of what we have achieved and of what lies ahead.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Madam Speaker: When I responded to a point of order today from the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), I was not aware that he was elected to this House 48 years ago today. I congratulate him. He and I have not always seen eye to eye, but it has been a privilege for me to serve in the House with him. I understand that his wife is not well, and I hope that he and his entire family flourish.

Planning (East Hertfordshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Pope.]

10.15 pm

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): This debate concerns the case of my constituent, Mr. S. Carslake, and his dispute with East Hertfordshire district council and the local government ombudsman over the way in which he has been treated in relation to developments affecting his home.

The essence of the issue is how we ensure that justice is done, and seen to be done, for ordinary people whose property is affected by development that reduces its amenity and value. As we advocate the use of brown land and the redevelopment of our towns and villages instead of building in the green belt, that issue will become more and more important. The case of Mr. Carslake's property in Bishop's Stortford is a prime example of what should not happen. It has left Mr. Carslake—a decent, hard-working citizen of this country who has bought his own home—with a burning and justifiable sense of injustice and outrage.

The case is as follows. It relates, first, to a number of failures in planning procedure and the lax enforcement of planning conditions involving new structures on three sides of Mr. Carslake's residence, the amenities of which have been substantially damaged. More importantly, it concerns the behaviour of several council officials, which has proved unacceptable by any reasonable standards. It is a complex and difficult case, and I have had to simplify it considerably to describe it in the time available and enable the Minister to give a proper reply.

The new structures that are being built around Mr. Carslake's home include, first, an overbearing structure on one side which is built closer to his home than the planning approval allowed for and runs the full length of his small rear garden. Planning permission is flouted by the roof being higher in one part of the building, and the original planning permission was amended to extend the building by 9 ft without any reference to Mr. Carslake.

Secondly, a huge house, which is 170 sq m larger than was advised to the planning committee, overlooks Mr. Carslake's entire rear garden. That problem is made worse by the raising of the land in the garden surrounding the house without planning permission. Planning permission for the house was accepted by the council as being damaging to Mr. Carslake. The council offered to recompense Mr. Carslake by building a wall that would cost at least £6,000, but has subsequently withdrawn the offer.

On the third side of Mr. Carslake's small rear garden, there is a building converted from a banana packing station into four dwellings with eight windows overlooking his property. The planning permission said that those windows should be non-opening, but they can be and are opened. The council failed to enforce its own planning permission and the building is in any case higher than permitted.

The second issue is the failure of the ombudsman to examine and report on the case in full once the council had admitted to maladministration on one, and only one, aspect of the whole case. That is important not only because it shows up the limitation of the ombudsman and the need for reform of the system, but because, as I understand it, any compensation for Mr. Carslake will be restricted to damage that is caused to his property by the building of the first structure that I mentioned. There will be none for the over-large house for which the council initially offered compensation. If that is so, it will constitute a grave injustice to Mr. Carslake.

Mr. Carslake has instanced to me and his councillors a series of misdemeanours by the council's officials, which I shall summarise. He has suffered long delays in replies to his letters—months not weeks. Some of his letters remain to be answered seven years after they were sent. In order to avoid answering letters, the council has said that it has lost some delivered to it—since when, of course, Mr. Carslake has always corresponded by recorded delivery.

Information that he legitimately needed to know has been withheld from him by the holding of conversations in secret part II council meetings. He has been refused minutes from such meetings, even though, under the council's standing orders, it is obligatory that they should be made available to him. To this day, the council has yet to answer any objection that Mr. Carslake has lodged with it, especially with regard to the removal of a pear tree, which provided shelter for his home.

In September 1992, the director of planning of East Hertfordshire district council submitted a report to the planning committee on the big house which, in a report issued nine months later, was generally agreed to be misleading. Compensation to a maximum of £6,000 to heighten a wall—which Mr. Carslake pointed out could not be done without making it unstable, therefore uninsurable and certainly dangerous to children who played on either side of it—was awarded on the basis of the report and reported to the press. Of course, he refused to accept that amount as sensible compensation or, indeed, as a compromise. At a subsequent secret meeting of the planning committee, the offer of compensation was withdrawn. Council officials decided to do nothing more and were reluctant even to discuss the case with Mr. Carslake's legal representatives.

After considering the huge amount of evidence submitted by Mr. Carslake and the council, the ombudsman produced a draft report, which he sent to Mr. Carslake and the councillors who were advising him for their comments. The two councillors in Bishop's Stortford who have represented Mr. Carslake for seven years deserve the compliments of the House for the way in which they have pursued the case, supported their client through thick and thin and helped him to try to get justice from the council.

When the report was published, it reflected none of the comments of either Mr. Carslake or the two councillors. Frankly, it was outrageously biased in the council's favour. This Parliament established the post of ombudsman to try to safeguard the interests of individuals against the council and other bureaucratic procedures. In spite of detailed evidence to the contrary submitted by Mr. Carslake, the ombudsman's report accepted all the council's statements as factual.

Thirdly, statements made by the council in its own favour were included in the report as fact, although they were untrue and the ombudsman had been given detailed evidence that they were untrue. Fourthly, the ombudsman totally ignored almost all the written evidence provided by Mr. Carslake and the two councillors. Moreover, the report in its final form was never submitted to Mr. Carslake so that he could comment on it.

Fifthly, there was not a word regarding the main thrust of Mr. Carslake's complaints—that is, misconduct, wilful misconduct and cover-up, all of which incorporated extremely serious allegations. In addition, a number of other highly relevant issues involving false and/or misleading statements by senior council officials were unaddressed, and remain so to this day.

Sixthly, Mr. Carslake's legal advisers had been given no opportunity to see and comment on the revised draft before its submission to the ombudsman. I understand that, under the ombudsman's terms of reference, that opportunity was improperly denied to Mr. Carslake.

Seventhly, Mr. Carslake was awarded the derisory and insulting sum of £250 compensation for out-of-pocket expenses and inconvenience. An independent, highly respected local surveyor assessed the amenity damage caused to Mr. Carslake's property at £10,000. Legal expenses alone of more than £10,000 have been incurred, and Mr. Carslake and the councillors involved have spent a huge amount of personal time on the case.

Mr. Carslake's lawyers have commented that, from the ombudsman's actions, it is clear that the validity and strength of Mr. Carslake's case have been systematically undermined, and that conclusions drawn in the report represented a high and unacceptable level of injustice. Those are highly respected planning lawyers, from some of the leading firms in this country.

My request that the ombudsman meet Mr. Carslake with the objective of resolving the difficulties was bluntly refused. In effect, the ombudsman has assisted in the cover-up and has shielded senior council officials from the consequences of their improper actions.

In conclusion, faced with the stony-faced bureaucrats of the council and of the ombudsman, I have had no alternative but to bring this very serious matter to the attention of the House and the Minister. I ask him to investigate the case immediately, with a view to giving an individual taxpayer justice, or to make certain that East Hertfordshire district council sets up its own independent investigation. Mr. Carslake has offered £10,000 to assist in defraying the costs of such an investigation, provided that the money is returned to him if the independent report finds in his favour.

I also request a review of the way in which councils conduct planning procedures and enforce planning permission conditions, and I ask the Minister to issue guidelines, or to amend the law, to prevent such injustices occurring.

Lastly, I ask for an investigation of the ombudsman to ensure that his procedures are effective and objective, using this case as an illustration of where he has failed in the past.

This is a case of the small man trying to achieve justice against the juggernaut of the bureaucracy. It is a case in which the machinery established by Parliament to protect the individual has failed to do so. I know that the Minister will share my concern and that of Mr. Carslake, and my desire to see justice done in this case and for all those many property holders, now and in future, who face, or will face, similar dilemmas.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I thank the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. It may help if I briefly set out the origins of the case. I shall then respond to a number of the points that the hon. Gentleman raised, and make clear my understanding of the position.

I understand that, between about 1990 and 1993, Mr. Carslake's home, "Monkhams", Half Acres, Bishop's Stortford, Hertfordshire, was surrounded on three sides by housing development. Mr. Carslake exercised his rights to make representations about those developments. In respect of one, a bungalow immediately adjoining his home, he was given assurances by the local planning authority, East Hertfordshire district council, about its size.

When amended plans were subsequently put to the council, it did not reconsult Mr. Carslake, and when construction of the bungalow started, he was concerned to see that it was closer to his home than he had been promised and that, although part of the roof visible from his garden was lower, it was longer than he expected and had a chimney on the end gable. Mr. Carslake was also concerned about the redevelopment of a house a little further off from his home, which he felt was higher and larger than its predecessor.

Having looked into this matter, it appears to me that the nub of the issue lies not in the enforcement of planning conditions, but in the errors that the council made in consulting and reconsulting Mr. Carslake, and in the failure of attempts since then to resolve the matter.

I think it will help the House if at this point I outline the obligations on local planning authorities to notify neighbours of planning applications. Local planning authorities are required to publicise all planning applications so that people likely to be affected by a proposed development can express their views before decisions are taken.

As a minimum, authorities have to notify neighbours directly or place a notice on or near the site. For major applications—for example, the erection of 10 or more dwellings—local planning authorities are additionally required to advertise the proposal in a local newspaper. Generally, neighbour notification will be appropriate where the development is likely to be of interest to close neighbours only. Site notices can be particularly effective where there is doubt about who might have an interest. It is, of course, open to authorities both to notify neighbours and to post a site notice if they consider it appropriate and cost effective to do so.

These measures represent the statutory minimum requirements. Circular 15/92, "Publicity for Planning Applications", advises local planning authorities to consider what other methods of publicity are available for attracting a wider audience. There is no statutory obligation on local planning authorities to publicise changes to applications once they are accepted as valid, or to publicise applications required by a condition on a previous application, or for the approval of reserved matters. It is for the authority to decide whether further publicity is desirable in the light of the circumstances of the particular case.

In this instance, the local planning authority quite properly wrote to Mr. Carslake to inform him of the first planning application, and entered into correspondence with him about it, but unfortunately treated the subsequent amended plans as minor alterations to the proposal, and did not reconsult him.

Mr. Carslake has also expressed concern about the council withholding information from the public domain. Under the Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985, the public have a general right of access to meetings of local authorities and their committees. That includes access to related documents. Such documents normally include minutes of meetings and reports presented to public meetings of the council, including background papers. There are exceptions in the case of certain sensitive material specified in the Act and, for example, authorities must never disclose information the disclosure of which is prohibited by a court of law.

Returning to Mr. Carslake's position, it is difficult to comment on a situation that has extended over several years and has clearly caused him considerable distress. The case has also greatly occupied the local authority. I think that it would be inappropriate for me to attempt to offer detailed views on who is right and who is wrong.

The situation now is that the local government ombudsman has investigated the matter, and published a report in February 1997. His findings were as follows. The ombudsman clearly found in Mr. Carslake's favour in respect of the injustice that he suffered as a result of the council's failure to consult him properly about the bungalow built next to his home. He found that there had been maladministration in the council's handling of the replacement dwelling house built a little to the south of Mr. Carslake's home, but that he had not suffered injustice. He found also no maladministration regarding two other matters of development control.

The ombudsman recommended a clear remedy: that the council should commission a valuation of any diminution in the value of Mr. Carslake's home as a result of the impact of the bungalow; and that compensation should be paid to him on that basis, in addition to a payment of £250 for his time and trouble in bringing the complaint.

It is a matter of regret that the ombudsman's recommendations have not been implemented, but I understand that that is due to the continuing disagreements between Mr. Carslake and the council. However, I also understand that in recent weeks the valuation has been recommissioned. Whether that valuation will resolve the matter within a reasonable time is entirely in the hands of Mr. Carslake and the council.

I note with concern that Mr. Carslake wants the independent valuation of his home to be undertaken on a basis that differs from that recommended by the ombudsman. He wants it to take account not only of the bungalow but of the replacement house to the south of his property. The ombudsman found very clearly that Mr. Carslake had suffered no injustice by the council's errors with regard to that house. However, Mr. Carslake has raised questions about the ombudsman's report, so I shall turn now to the role and status of the local government ombudsman.

The ombudsman was established by Parliament to consider complaints by individuals of alleged maladministration by a local authority causing injustice. An important aspect of the legislation governing the activities of the ombudsman is that it was designed to help those individuals who suffer injustice as a result of maladministration where there is no other method for them to seek a remedy.

As the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford will be aware, the ombudsman is entirely independent of both central and local government. Decisions on whether to investigate complaints are, therefore, entirely at the discretion of the ombudsman, as is the manner in which complaints are investigated. Parliament decided that that independence was crucial to ensure that complainants could rely on a fair and impartial service. The House will understand that Ministers are therefore unable to intervene in the ombudsman's handling of his casework.

I understand that there has been considerable correspondence between Mr. Carslake and the ombudsman since investigations into Mr. Carslake's complaint were concluded and the ombudsman's report was issued in February of last year. Mr. Carslake disagrees with aspects of the ombudsman's conclusions, which has resulted in delays in assessing the diminution in value of Mr. Carslake's home. The ombudsman's reports into complaints are final, although his actions may be the subject of judicial review. The ombudsman also has an internal complaints system for dealing with complaints about the way in which he has behaved, or the way in which a complaint has been handled. However, if Mr. Carslake wants to make a new complaint about the planning issue, the ombudsman has said that he would be prepared to consider it.

I have considered carefully whether there is any action that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions can take in the matter. I have to advise the House that there is no action that he could take. As I made clear a few moments ago, he cannot intervene in the deliberations of the ombudsman. My right hon. Friend's powers are entirely, and quite rightly, limited to those powers accorded to him by planning legislation. However, in that respect also, there is no action he can take.

All the planning decisions at issue were taken several years ago and have been implemented. The dispute does not appear to be about the enforcement of planning conditions; no one appears to have any remaining right of appeal to the Secretary of State; and there is no scheme outstanding over which he could exercise his exceptional power of call-in. It would not be appropriate for him to exercise his exceptional power to direct the revocation of any planning permissions, not only because substantial compensation would be payable to the owners of the buildings but because they could also lose their homes, which would be a harsh and absolutely unjustified consequence. In any case, the Secretary of State is extremely reluctant to intervene in matters of solely local significance, which this case is.

In my view, the way forward for all parties is perfectly clear. If Mr. Carslake has further grounds for complaint against the council, he should put them as soon as possible to the ombudsman, who will then consider whether there is a case to answer. If Mr. Carslake has complaints against the ombudsman himself, he should follow the course I outlined a few moments ago. Otherwise, I would urge him—I am sure that the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford will convey the message—to allow the independent valuation to go ahead on the basis recommended by the ombudsman.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty minutes to Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

New Zealand

1. Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): What representations he has received from the New Zealand Government on matters relating to trade between New Zealand and the United Kingdom. [61419]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): There have been no formal recent representations from the New Zealand Government on trade-related matters, but the New Zealand and United Kingdom Governments regularly co-operate on various matters, including trade.

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful for that answer and glad to understand that the New Zealand Government have not become over-enthusiastic about the difficulties with trade in sheep that arise from our domestic problems in the sheep sector. Will the Minister keep the New Zealand Government abreast of developments in that sector, so that they understand the difficulties under which farmers have been labouring in the United Kingdom? Hopefully, within a year or so, we may be able to withstand the full rigours of trade once again.

Mr. Fatchett: I am happy to give the right hon. Gentleman that commitment. We continue to discuss a range of trading issues with the New Zealand Government, including the trade in lamb, and we will certainly take up the points to which he referred.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Will the Minister confirm that there is no prospect of this country trading its successful first-past-the-post electoral system for the disastrous proportional representation system, which has done so much to undermine parliamentary democracy in New Zealand?

Mr. Fatchett: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on a very wise question. From my own perspective, I would say that we had a great deal to learn from New Zealand on that issue.

Middle East Peace Process

2. Mr. Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby): When he next expects to meet President Arafat to discuss the implementation of the Wye agreement; and if he will make a statement. [61420]

4. Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow): If he will make a statement on the current situation regarding the middle east peace process. [61382]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): We will be doing everything we can to build on the breakthrough in the middle east peace process secured at Wye Plantation. Yesterday, the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), who has responsibility for middle eastern affairs, attended the donors' conference in Washington, and he has flown through the night to be with us today. He announced a package of assistance to the Palestinian authority and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine refugees in the near east totalling more than £100 million, both bilateral and European Union.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister met President Arafat in London immediately before the Wye talks and we both met Mr. Netanyahu last week. We have congratulated both President Arafat and Mr. Netanyahu on their statesmanship in achieving the Wye agreement and on their courage on the start to implementing it.

Mr. Quinn: I thank my right hon. Friend for that statement. Does he agree that both the Prime Minister of Israel and President Arafat have shown considerable courage in concluding the Wye agreement? Will he tell us how the Government, with their European partners, will ensure that both sides show the same resolve after this period of negotiation to move to a final and lasting peace in the middle east?

Mr. Cook: I very much share the sentiments behind my hon. Friend's question. As I announced, Britain is committed to major financial support for the peace process and is the largest donor to UNRWA, which deals with so many of the Palestinian social issues. One way in which Europe can greatly assist in taking forward the peace process is by achieving momentum on economic issues. I am delighted that we have secured the opening of Gaza airport and we must now achieve the same for the Gaza seaport. If we want peace to be deeply rooted, we must prove to ordinary Palestinians in Gaza and the west bank that they will also benefit in material terms from the peace process.

Mr. Gerrard: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, important though the Wye agreement may be, the fundamental foundation for lasting peace must be the Oslo accords and UN resolutions, some of which have still not been implemented, and which recognise the illegality of the occupation of the west bank and of the continued expansion of settlements there? Will he do what he can to emphasise to both sides, but in particular to the Government of Israel, that lasting peace and real security can be achieved only through honouring the promises made at Oslo?

Mr. Cook: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the fact that, although the Wye Plantation agreement is an important step, we have a long way to go. The significance of that agreement is that it is a step in the right direction, and it gives us an opportunity to build momentum to take us towards the final stages talks that were envisaged at Oslo. On the settlements, I said last week when Mr. Netanyahu was here, and have said on many occasions, that we would not want either side to take any provocative unilateral action that made it difficult to make progress on peace negotiations.

Zimbabwe

3. Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): What recent representations his Department has made on the issue of land reform in Zimbabwe; and if he will make a statement. [61421]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): We have expressed our concern to the Zimbabwe Government about their decision to issue 841 acquisition orders. In our view, the Zimbabwe Government's actions represent a major step back from the position agreed by all sides at the land conference in September. We will continue to press the Zimbabwe Government to follow the due process of law, including the right of appeal against acquisition and for fair compensation.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to the Minister for making clear the Government's opposition to the policy of the Zimbabwe Government in seeking to confiscate land, which is illegal, as he said, as well as racist. Will he make it clear that that condemnation extends to ceasing British Government aid to Zimbabwe should confiscation proceed?

Mr. Lloyd: No, because British aid to Zimbabwe is not programme aid. It is not Government-to-Government aid, but aid tied to projects that are designed to help the poorest people in Zimbabwe. It would be irresponsible to say that we wanted to pursue—as we do—co-operation with the Zimbabwean Government that would have the effect of distributing land in a way that favoured the poor of Zimbabwe while threatening to cut off aid designed to help precisely those poor Zimbabweans.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok): Although I have criticisms of the way in which the Zimbabwean Government have proceeded, does the Minister accept that inequality of land ownership and control must be addressed? Will he undertake that the British Government will do all that they can to ensure that the severe difficulties faced by many ordinary Zimbabwean citizens are addressed?

Mr. Lloyd: Yes, consistent with what I have already told the House, the British Government have always made it clear that we would support a process of land acquisition that had certain features. The process must be transparent; at the moment, we do not have that certainty. It must be fair, which means that there must be an adequate compensation package and an adequate challenge regime. In particular, the land transfer must favour the very poorest people in Zimbabwe, not those who seek to better their own already well-funded personal circumstances. Within that, we will help the Zimbabweans, but not on the basis of their present proposals.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): Does not the project aid of which the Minister spoke enable the Government of Zimbabwe to spend huge sums on prosecuting a war in the Congo? Is there not a case for reconsidering that aid in the light of that expenditure and of their land expropriation proposals?

Mr. Lloyd: No. That is not the effect of our assistance, which, whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman likes it or not, goes to the poorest people in Zimbabwe. If he believes that the Zimbabwean Government would replace British project aid with Zimbabwean Government assistance, he is wrong. It is in those circumstances that we will continue our policies for poverty eradication in Zimbabwe. We call upon not only the Zimbabweans, but all parties to the war in the Congo, to operate an effective ceasefire, get round the conference table and end the conflict.

Cuba

5. Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire): When he next intends to visit Cuba to discuss the state of its economy. [61383]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has no plans to visit Cuba. However, my noble Friend the Under-Secretary made the first ministerial visit to Cuba under this Government in October, followed in November by my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade. Both discussed with their Cuban interlocutors, among other things, the prospects for the Cuban economy.

Mr. Pickthall: Does my hon. Friend share my dismay that, last month, the United States stepped up its trade sanctions against Cuba? Does he agree that there is much to be gained by Britain and Cuba stepping up their trade relationships a gear, for example, in respect of food and engineering equipment exports? Cuba is desperate for both. Is there any way in which Britain can help Cuba in the development and marketing of the meningitis vaccine that it has produced, which would greatly benefit Britain and the world?

Mr. Lloyd: My hon. Friend knows that it has been the policy of successive Governments that constructive engagement with Cuba will be more helpful in bringing it to acceptance of basic democratic standards and human rights than the process pursued by the United States. He is right to point out that we already have many exchanges, in terms of both trade and science. A team from Imperial college will shortly make a third visit to Cuba to conduct a further assay and to follow up clinical tests in connection with the meningitis vaccine pioneered in Cuba. That vaccine is significant, and I met the research team who developed it some time ago. It may become the world's first and only effective vaccine against meningitis B. If the Imperial college team concludes accordingly, it will be put to the Medicines Control Agency for approval for licensing within the United Kingdom. That will be a great step forward, not only in the fight against meningitis, but for Cuban medical research.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): Is the Minister aware that Latin America will perceive Her Majesty's Government's policy toward Cuba as selective and partial, in that no fewer than six of Her Majesty's Ministers have visited that tiny island, whereas a comparable number have not visited other Latin American countries? The economy of Cuba is, to be candid, a basket case. Is the Minister aware that our exports to Cuba went down last year, from £24 million to a mere £19 million; that our exports to Chile, which has a population similar to that of Cuba, went up to £210 million—a rise of £44 million; and that our imports from Chile went up by £220 million, whereas imports from Cuba fell by £4 million? Is that a good investment on the part of Her Majesty's Government?

Mr. Lloyd: I am genuinely astonished if the Opposition believe that we should denigrate Cuba in particular and the Caribbean in general. If that is the import of the hon. Gentleman's comments, he is seriously wrong. We want to have strong relations, not only with Cuba and the Caribbean as a whole, but, beyond that, with Latin America. Our relations with Latin America have improved enormously in recent years and are continuing to improve. There has been, and will continue to be, a steady flow of ministerial visits, not only to Cuba, but to other parts of Latin America. That is good for Britain and good for Latin America. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman does not share that view.

Western Sahara

6. Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): When he expects the UN to be able to conduct a referendum on the future of the western Sahara. [61385]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): The UN has proposed to Morocco and the Polisario that a referendum should take place in December 1999. We hope that that deadline can be met.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the Minister share my disappointment that the Secretary-General of the United Nations should have proposed yet another delay, for a further year, to the referendum? Is not the real reason for that delay Morocco's obstruction of the process of registering refugees living in the camps and other people living in the region? Is not the UN being seriously obstructed in its desire to hold the referendum, which should have been held many years ago?

Is there anything my hon. Friend can do to ensure that MINURSO—the United Nations mission for the referendum in Western Sahara—carries on and is fully funded, and that the refugee camps are fully supported and funded? Above all, will he do what he can to ensure that the date of the referendum—currently December 1999—is significantly brought forward? If it is not, the UN will be brought into disrepute. I fear that Morocco will try to delay the referendum beyond that date and that the people of the western Sahara will be denied the opportunity to decide their own future.

Mr. Fatchett: It is important that the referendum should take place and that it should take place as early as possible. I share my hon. Friend's concern about the further delay. He is right to say that the referendum must be fair and be seen to be fair, and that it must have the confidence of all the parties. He is also right to conclude that the best way forward for the western Sahara is for the referendum to take place, because that is the only way in which we shall be able to determine the feelings and aspirations of the local people.

EU Enlargement

7. Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): If he will state his objectives for the Austrian EU presidency in respect of EU enlargement. [61386]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): The screening process for the first six candidate countries has now been completed for half of all the chapters of European law. Substantive negotiations have now begun on a quarter of them. At the Vienna European Council, we shall review the recent report of the Commission on all the dozen candidate countries, which concluded that most candidates were making good progress with their preparations for membership.

We must not underestimate the real problems in achieving the biggest-ever enlargement in the history of the European Union. Nevertheless, the Government firmly believe that the problems of enlargement are much less important than the benefits from strengthened prosperity, stability and democracy in central and eastern Europe.

Mr. Jenkin: It is now nine years since the Berlin wall came down; since then, some 20 to 30 former Soviet bloc states have been crying out for full inclusion in the institutions of western democracy. Has the EU not failed those countries, which are struggling to emerge from poverty and misrule, by continuing to apply protectionist policies? Is it not clear that the European Union's real agenda is not enlargement, but monetary union, tax harmonisation and the Franco-German agenda of a single European state? A date is still to be set for the admission of a single former Soviet bloc state.

Mr. Cook: I gently remind the hon. Gentleman that I can take ministerial responsibility only for the last 18 months of those nine years. He might like to address his remarks to those who served on the previous Conservative Government's Front Bench. If he wishes to draw a parallel, he should look at what occurred during the last enlargement involving Austria, Finland and Sweden. It took three years to negotiate enlargement for only three countries, all of which were wealthy and were net contributors to the European budget. It is a bit rich for the hon. Gentleman to complain that we have not completed enlargement in nine months for 12 countries, all of which are poor and will be net recipients from the European budget.

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that this Government have demonstrated a far more positive commitment to Europe in the past 18 months than the previous Government demonstrated in 18 years? As a result, this Government have far more credibility in arguing for progress on European enlargement than the previous Government who, for 18 years, adopted a narrow, isolationist approach to everything European.

Mr. Cook: The proof of my hon. Friend's point is borne out precisely by the fact that this Government have managed to start beef exports to Europe while the previous Government started a beef war with Europe.

However, there is room for further improvement. I can report to the House that the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin), is convening a new ministerial group to co-ordinate our policies on Europe. It will tomorrow hold its first meeting, which will be chaired by my right hon. Friend, and is an excellent advertisement for joined-up government.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): Will the Foreign Secretary take this opportunity to state to candidates for membership of Europe and to existing members that the Government have no intention of proceeding down the road of tax harmonisation and that there is everything to be gained, and nothing to be lost, from concerted European-wide action against tax evasion?

Mr. Cook: The hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware that a Treasury Minister is leading the work within ECOFIN to take action on unfair tax breaks, which attract industry and investment from our country as well as from others in the European Union, in areas where we have a clear national interest in ensuring that there is a level playing field.

There are no proposals to harmonise either the zero rate on value added tax or income tax, for that matter. I do not believe that any such proposals could muster majority, never mind unanimous, support. We should all try to deal with the reality of Europe rather than with the fantasies that some people are trying to sell.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): Does my right hon. Friend agree that reform must precede enlargement? For example, there can surely be no enlargement before the common agricultural policy and the common fisheries policy are reformed. We should perhaps also examine the modus operandi of the European Parliament and the European Court of Justice.

Mr. Cook: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct: the onus for preparing for enlargement does not rest entirely with the candidate countries. The European Union must also do its work. A particularly important part of that work is reform of the CAP, which the European Union is committed to completing by next March. We believe that the 30 per cent. cut in intervention prices on beef, the 20 per cent. cut on cereals and the 15 per cent. reduction in milk quotas will have a major impact on the CAP and will save British consumers £1 billion a year. That is a prize well worth fighting for in the interests of Britain and of enlargement.

Qualified Majority Voting

8. Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): If he will make a statement on the extension of qualified majority voting as a result of the treaty of Amsterdam. [61387]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Ms Joyce Quin): As the hon. Gentleman will be aware from the parliamentary ratification of the Amsterdam treaty, qualified majority voting was extended in several areas, including the fight against fraud and promoting transparency. The Government believe that those extensions are very much in Britain's interests.

Mr. Bercow: Now that the Foreign Secretary's German counterpart, Joschka Fischer, has admitted that the creation of a single European state is the decisive task of our time, how can the right hon. Lady guarantee that qualified majority voting will never be used to introduce measures that would force this country to be a mere province of a single European state?

Ms Quin: It is clear from what was agreed at Amsterdam and in previous treaties that unanimity remains the rule in important areas, including institutional and treaty changes, and we are in favour of that. I remind the hon. Gentleman that significant extensions of qualified majority voting took place under the Maastricht treaty and probably the most significant extension was introduced by the Single European Act passed by Lady Thatcher's Government.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that to make the European Union more democratic and functionally efficient, any EU enlargement will necessitate an extension of some forms of qualified majority voting? It is palpably absurd for the Conservative party, on the one hand, to call for enlargement seemingly without restrictions and, on the other hand, to oppose any extension of qualified majority voting.

Ms Quin: We are keen to make enlargement a success. As was made clear at Amsterdam, we shall have to consider the institutional arrangements foreseen in that treaty to prepare for enlargement. We believe that we can do that while safeguarding the important areas that can progress only if all countries are in agreement.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): First, I congratulate the right hon. Lady on her new, co-ordinating responsibilities, which the Foreign Secretary announced a few moments ago. I thank the Foreign Secretary for his astonishing admission that, for the past 18 months, the Government's European policies have not been properly co-ordinated.

In view of the apparent importance now attached by the Government to the veto, does the right hon. Lady now accept that the extension of majority voting at Amsterdam was a mistake? Is it not undeniable that she and her colleagues will now be utterly helpless in the face of measures that they claim to oppose, such as the extension of works councils?

Ms Quin: It is difficult to take seriously the right hon. and learned Gentleman's point about co-ordination because he was a member of a Government who were disunited on European issues. The purpose of the co-ordinating committee, which I shall chair, is simply to build on the success achieved by the Government during the British presidency, when Departments worked together effectively.

I am sorry that the right hon. and learned Gentleman insists on repeating completely unjustified scare stories which have been substantially aired during the past few days. The measures agreed under the Amsterdam treaty were very much in Britain's interests and do not affect the policy areas to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred.

Kosovo

9. Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): What discussions he has had with countries bordering the Former Republic of Yugoslavia about Kosovo. [61388]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): I visited Bulgaria, Macedonia and Romania in late October and Slovenia last week. Kosovo was one of the key elements of my discussions in all four countries. In Macedonia, I met Professor Agani, the leader of the Kosovar negotiating team, who expressed the thanks of the Kosovar people for Britain's efforts to secure an end to the conflict.

All four countries are developing closer ties with the European Union. So long as President Milosevic pursues policies of ethnic confrontation, he will condemn Serbia to be left further behind in the modern Europe.

Ms Stuart: Will my right hon. Friend assure me that the Government will continue to do everything to support those in Kosovo who seek a peaceful, negotiated solution to the problem? More specifically, what are the Government doing to support the development of independent media in the area?

Mr. Cook: I assure my hon. Friend that we are very much in the lead on the ground in Kosovo, making a reality of the Holbrooke package. As from this week, 73 British personnel will be attached to the Kosovo verification mission—one of the largest contributions from any European or international state. Media repression is a matter of grave concern, especially in view of the media law that was passed in October, which prevents all Serbian broadcasters from rebroadcasting foreign news agencies, including the BBC World Service. I have, therefore, asked my officials to investigate the feasibility and funding of a transmitter in the region which can rebroadcast those foreign news agencies. President Milosevic may not want his people to hear the truth, but it is important that we do not let his ban prevent them from doing so.

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor): In the light of recent discussions on Kosovo, have the Government decided to send extra troops to Macedonia to join the NATO extraction force—troops, one supposes, which may be called on to operate in Kosovo? There was a report to that effect in yesterday's edition of The Daily Telegraph, and one on the BBC today, although I understand that no announcement has been made. Surely in this matter of potentially far-reaching consequences, the House is entitled to know what is going on.

Mr. Cook: There have been repeated statements on Kosovo; I made one only a couple of weeks ago. Indeed, preparations with regard to Macedonia, about which there have been questions, have been no secret. We have repeatedly said that we are willing to support the quadripartite unit in Macedonia; it flows from our discussions with Germany. We will be the second largest contingent in that force. Of course, we fully intend to hold President Milosevic to his assurance that the verification mission will not in any way be intimidated or hampered by the Serbian security forces, although it is important for reassurance that our capability is near at hand.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): How will Her Majesty's Government ensure that the plight of refugees and displaced people is improved as winter approaches, so that we do not see again horrific scenes of them in the mountains or under inadequate shelter?

Mr. Cook: I am pleased to say that we have achieved substantial progress in removing refugees from the open hillside and that, over the past two months since the Holbrooke package, the numbers have fallen from 50,000 to a few hundred. Nevertheless, my hon. Friend is quite right to express concern about the continuing position of refugees. Although they have returned to their former villages, many of their homes have been shelled. It is, therefore, essential that we continue the humanitarian effort to ensure that they are sheltered, fed and, with proper health support, are able to survive throughout the winter. Britain is very much in the lead in supporting that effort, and will continue to do so.

Myanmar

10. Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): What recent representations he has made to the Government of Myanmar concerning treatment of the Karen population. [61389]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): We regularly make representations to the Burmese authorities on the treatment of ethnic minorities, including the Karen—most recently on 25 November.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome the Minister's response. Does he agree that the State Peace and Development Council has perpetrated one of the most tragic scenarios of ethnic cleansing and genocide? What can be done internationally to stop such events, prevent further atrocities and aid victims, bearing in mind that hundreds of thousands of Karen and others have been so eliminated?

Mr. Fatchett: What has happened to the ethnic minorities in Burma is a true but sad reflection of the regime's nature. That is why we constantly argue for the international community to be vigilant, to maintain the pressure and to work for a restoration of democracy and a respect for human rights. We have provided £250,000 of humanitarian aid in the 1997–98 financial year. I also discussed the issue in Thailand earlier this year in order to ensure some co-ordination in providing support for ethnic minorities.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): Given the uniquely abhorrent nature of the regime in Myanmar and the quite uncalled-for action against the Karen, Karenni and other peoples, will the Minister give an absolute assurance that the Government and the European Union will do everything possible to put pressure on the Myanmar authorities? To that end, will he explain why Mr. Win Aung, Foreign Secretary designate of Myanmar, was admitted to this country last week?

Mr. Fatchett: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's first question is yes, we shall continue to give that commitment.

The second question refers to the Burmese ambassador, who returned to the United Kingdom as ambassador, not as Foreign Secretary. When he becomes Foreign Secretary he will enjoy no right to enter the United Kingdom because of the European Union's common position. We shall certainly safeguard it; indeed, the United Kingdom strengthened that position at the most recent meeting of the General Affairs Council.

My position on Burma is now so strong that I have been told today that the Burmese authorities will not allow me to visit Burma. I see that as an accolade for the work that we have done and for our fight for human rights and democracy in Burma.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): One of the Government's first actions was to stop financing trade missions to Burma, and many human rights activists throughout the world were very pleased about that. However, does my right hon. Friend agree that the campaign must be stepped up—that the destruction of human rights in Burma is so severe that we need a campaign on the scale of that mounted against apartheid in South Africa? What action is being taken by European Union states to advance that cause?

Mr. Fatchett: The European Union toughened its position in October 1998. We have strengthened our position against the regime on visa issues. We have also issued a statement advising people not to go to Burma as tourists. The position is strong. At the General Assembly of the United Nations on 12 November 1998, we co-sponsored a resolution again condemning the Burmese regime for its violation of human rights.

I very much share my hon. Friend's views. This issue should unite the House in condemnation of a regime that is unique in the atrocities that it commits against its own people.

Iraq

11. Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): If he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's relations with Iraq. [61390]

12. Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): If he will discuss with his American counterpart future policy towards Iraq. [61391]

13. Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): What recent representations he has made to the Government of Iraq concerning the status of United Nations Security Council resolutions. [61392]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): We have made it clear to Saddam Hussein that our forces remain in the Gulf and remain on alert. If he breaks his undertaking to allow UNSCOM to resume inspections, we are prepared to take military action without further negotiation.

There will be no let-up in our pressure on Saddam Hussein until we are satisfied that he no longer has weapons of mass destruction with which to inflict on neighbouring countries the terror tactics that he uses to oppress his own people.

Mr. Day: The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that, at a recent Prime Minister's Question Time, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition suggested to the Prime Minister that it should be a prime objective of British policy to remove Saddam Hussein from power, and the Prime Minister appeared to agree with that suggestion. In the light of BBC reports that imply that the Government do not agree that removing Saddam Hussein is their prime objective, will the right hon. Gentleman please tell the House the exact position?

Mr. Cook: I do not know which BBC programmes the hon. Gentleman has been watching, but I have repeatedly said on the BBC that the whole world, including the Government, would welcome the removal of Saddam Hussein. That is why my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett), the Minister with responsibility for matters in the region, recently met representatives of all the opposition groups in Iraq and explored with them how we might help them. However, if they are to succeed, those groups must work together more closely.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On the same question—my question having been asked earlier—is it not true that the American Administration has gone further? Following passage through Congress of the Iraqi Liberation Act, effectively American foreign policy is now to engage more openly in the removal of Saddam Hussein, and America is helping that process by allocating $90-odd million to the Iraqi National Congress. Is there not a marginal distinction between our policy and American policy, and cannot we be more robust and adopt what I believe to be a better American position?

Mr. Cook: I am sorry to say that, as my hon. Friend's question has already been asked, it has already been answered. However, to respond to his last point, I do not think that it would be possible to find a country that has been more robust than the United States and the United Kingdom on the issue of Iraq. During the recent crisis, we gave authority for our pilots to take off unless Saddam backed down, which he did there and then.

We have shown great robustness on this issue and we shall certainly continue to do everything possible to assist those who wish to return Iraq to a more accountable system of government, and one that would engage with the international community. In the meantime, we shall continue our work to ensure, as best we can, that we provide the assistance that is required—humanitarian relief for the people of Iraq to spare them from the consequences of the way in which they have been oppressed by Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Fraser: What part does the fate of Kuwaiti prisoners play in assessing Iraq's compliance with United Nations resolutions?

Mr. Cook: The 600 people who were removed from Kuwait and are currently believed to be detained, or who were certainly detained for a time in Iraq, feature in United Nations Security Council resolutions. Therefore, if Iraq wishes fully to comply with those resolutions, which is a condition for the lifting of sanctions, it has either to produce those 600 people or to give a clear account both to Kuwait and to the international community of what has become of them.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What would be the objective of bombing Baghdad, a city of 4.5 million people with two ambulances, neither of which has oxygen, and a fire engine that possibly does not work—Dresden, perhaps?

Mr. Cook: The House would not expect me to disclose specific targeting plans, but I can say—

Mr. Dalyell: If my right hon. Friend talked to them properly, it would help.

Mr. Cook: My hon. Friend is very free with his allegations, so perhaps he will allow me to respond to them.

The plans that have developed take very careful account of the need to minimise casualties as far as possible, and especially civilian casualties. There is therefore no question of a mass bombing of Baghdad on the scale that my hon. Friend suggests.

I am sorry to hear that Baghdad has only two ambulances. There is absolutely no sanction to prevent Iraq from importing all the ambulances that it requires. Thanks to a resolution pioneered by the United Kingdom, Saddam Hussein can export $10 billion-worth of oil to pay for the import of food, medicines and humanitarian goods. If he is so short of ambulances, we would be delighted to assist, through the Sanctions Committee, in ascertaining how many ambulances he needs—if he would choose to put them on the list that he submits in place of some of the other claims for humanitarian goods that he has made, such as glass ashtrays, cigarettes, alcohol and plastic surgery.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): How do the Government envisage Saddam Hussein will be removed?

Mr. Cook: As I have said to the House, we have already met the Iraqi Opposition. We shall continue to work with them. We have no legal base for using force for the removal of Saddam Hussein, but we will use force to make sure that Security Council resolutions are implemented.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): Do the Government share the Pentagon's estimate that 10,000 people would be killed in any bombing of Iraq? If not, what is the Government's estimate? Do they think that, whatever the number, it is a price worth paying?

Mr. Cook: First, I do not recognise that figure. We do not share that figure. Secondly, undoubtedly the price for Iraq's behaviour and Saddam Hussein's Government is being paid by the Iraqi people. I urge my hon. Friend to read the reports of the United Nations on human rights in Iraq, one of which was published only last month. He will see from them that, every year, thousands of people in Iraq pay with their lives for being ruled by Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Will the Foreign Secretary publicly express his support for the campaign of INDICT set up by the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd)? Will he act as best he may in international circles to have Saddam Hussein and others arraigned before either an international tribunal or an international criminal court as soon as possible, and thereby give hope to the many millions of people in Iraq who are terrorised by Saddam Hussein and want to see the international community to take action against him and split him from the peoples of Iraq?

Mr. Cook: I am pleased to say to the hon. Gentleman that the Government fully support INDICT. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is sending a message to the press conference today expressing that support on behalf of the Government. We are ready to look at any means by which Saddam Hussein may be brought before any international tribunal, but the Government's immediate priority is to ensure that we succeed in the establishment of an international criminal court, which would be very relevant to Saddam Hussein and to any future Saddam Hussein.

International Criminal Tribunals

14. Ms Helen Southworth (Warrington, South): If he will make a statement on his Department's support for the international criminal tribunals in Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia. [61393]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): We strongly support the work of both tribunals and have given substantial assistance to both of them, in addition to our mandatory contributions.

Ms Southworth: What steps will the Government will take to ensure that President Milosevic complies with the UN resolutions and provides support for the Yugoslav tribunal's investigations into alleged crimes? Will my hon. Friend undertake that the British Government will consistently take a lead in making it clear to those who commit crimes against humanity—such as torture, murder and the taking of hostages—that they will find no hiding place anywhere in the civilised world?

Mr. Lloyd: We deplore the fact that President Milosevic has so far refused to co-operate with the international criminal tribunal on Yugoslavia, particularly with respect to Prosecutor Judge Arbour's desire to investigate recent events in Kosovo. There is no doubt that, under Security Council resolutions, he is as much liable to co-operate with the tribunal as he is to play a constructive role in, for example, political dialogue with the Kosovo Albanians or in humanitarian relief. That is not negotiable. The international community will continue to insist that the tribunal's work should not be interrupted by Milosevic or by any of those acting in his name.

On the more general issue, the clearest signal that we can give of the need for international justice in the modern world is the fact that yesterday the permanent representative of the United Kingdom at the United Nations signed the international criminal court's treaty, which means that Britain has committed itself to the long process of ratification of the treaty and to it becoming an effective instrument against the Milosevics, Pol Pots and Saddam Husseins of the future.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Does the Minister think that, if crimes against humanity are to be dealt with, an international criminal tribunal is the way forward, whether for Yugoslavia or Rwanda? Would that not also be the correct way to view crimes against humanity in Chile? Should not the former President Pinochet be allowed to return to Chile so that the Chilean authorities can prosecute him, if that is their wish? Should there not be a properly constituted international court if such crimes are to be dealt with?

Mr. Lloyd: I shall pass over the inconsistency in the hon. Gentleman's comments. Of course we support the internationalisation of the process. That is why, as I told the House, Britain signed the documents relating to the international criminal court yesterday in New York. That is an important step forward in the internationalisation of justice and a strong signal to the Pinochets of the future that their actions will not be tolerated anywhere on this planet. However, the hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that, at present, responsibility for Mr. Pinochet lies with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, who will make his views known in the fulness of time.

Private Military Companies

15. Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): What assessment he has made of the impact of the activities of private military companies operating wholly or in part from the United Kingdom on the implementation of UK foreign policy objectives. [61394]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): Our concerns relate principally to private military companies which are involved in the supply of military equipment or other controlled goods and services in breach of the UK's national commitments, or which supply, or offer to supply, mercenaries or related military services. The activities of such companies could have—and, in some cases, clearly would have—an adverse impact on the implementation of the Government's foreign policy objectives.

Mr. Mackinlay: Is not one of the lessons of the Sandline affair that such private mercenary companies can cause acute embarrassment to the UK? Many people in this country find it repugnant that private military firms—mercenaries—can operate in the UK. Will my hon. Friend consider advancing within the United Nations a convention to control and monitor such outfits? Will he also consider bringing legislation before the House of Commons so that we can monitor, control and police those outfits? As we license the sale of arms, why do we not license and control those people who organise armies? It is time that we addressed ourselves to legislating to control them.

Mr. Lloyd: There is no doubt that the Government deplore the action of mercenaries. In a few weeks, I shall meet the United Nations special rapporteur on mercenaries, Mr. Ballesteros, whose mandate is to examine the use of mercenaries as a means of violating human rights and impeding the exercise of people's right to self-determination. That is the usual way in which mercenaries operate.

I must say to my hon. Friend that we have a problem. He referred obliquely to the UN convention on mercenaries, which we think is unworkable for legal reasons. The definition of mercenaries is not one that would get through a British court, and cases would simply fail. We are presently examining with other Departments the experience in South Africa, and in other countries that have looked at the legislative route, to find out what lessons that holds for Britain and whether it would offer a way forward to control those unacceptable activities.

Nigeria

16. Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): What discussions he has had with EU member states about Nigeria. [61395]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tony Lloyd): We have frequent contact with our European Union partners about Nigeria, at all levels. In response to the improved political and economic climate, the EU agreed a new common position on Nigeria on 1 November. That lifts most of the measures that had been in place since 1993. It will be reviewed no later than 1 June 1999, with a view to lifting the sanctions once the democratically elected civilian Government are installed. A copy of the text has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. While I recognise the role that Britain has played, and is playing, in ensuring a return to democracy in Nigeria, can he assure the House that he, in conjunction with our European partners, will ensure that the Government do everything they can to make sure that next year's elections in Nigeria are successful?

Mr. Lloyd: There is no doubt that the electoral process, which kicks off this weekend with the local elections, is a seminal moment in the modern history of Nigeria. All Nigeria's friends would recognise that. Britain has been as closely involved as any friendly country, and we have been entirely supportive of the practical steps taken by the Head of State, General Abubakar, in moving his country towards a properly democratically elected Government. We will continue to support that process. Clearly, the House would also expect us to be vigilant to make sure that those who would derail the process are deterred from that. We want a civilian president and a civilian Government.

EU Enlargement

17. Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): When he expects to meet other EU Foreign Ministers to discuss enlargement. [61396]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Ms Joyce Quin): My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and I will attend the General Affairs Council in Brussels next Monday, which will discuss enlargement.

Mr. Skinner: Now that Germany is beginning to throw its weight around again, does it not worry my right hon. Friend the Minister, and other Ministers on the Treasury Bench, that some of the countries that are due to become applicants for the Common Market could be little more than satellites of Germany, based upon the fact that, geographically and in trading and economic terms, they are much nearer to Germany than to Britain?

There has been a position that has been long held—it was evinced by Mrs. Thatcher—that more countries joining the Common Market would result in its weakness. There is a possibility, now that the position is changing on the continent, that the opposite could be the case. The net result for our Chancellor of the Exchequer—whom we want to use his veto on any harmonisation of tax plans—could be that more qualified majority voting is the order of the day because of those satellite countries.

Ms Quin: Having talked with many of my counterparts in the countries that are applying to join the EU, I am conscious that they are proud that they now have their independence and that they are in an era that is different from the domination that they had to endure during the cold war. They are not keen to become satellites of any country, but they are keen to participate in the European Union of the future.

My hon. Friend mentioned trade, which is an important aspect. Germany is probably the country that does most trade with those countries, but I am keen for Britain to improve its trade—both exports and imports—with them. It is important for us to work closely with them in the years ahead leading up to the enlargement of the EU.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Can the Minister say what effect enlargement will have on the work reported in this week's edition of The Week, which says that "valuable progress" has been made in regard to tax competition? It especially commends the work of the committee chaired by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, which has been considering measures to bring about "tax levels significantly lower" than those applying in other countries.

Ms Quin: I, too, pay tribute to the work of the committee chaired by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, especially its efforts to tackle the tax evasion and competition that damage industry and chances of employment. I also applaud my hon. Friend's work in respect of the code of conduct, and on the way in which she has chaired the committee.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Will next week's discussions include Cyprus's application to join the European Union? What has been the attitude of the Foreign Secretary's counterpart in the EU to that application, given that the Turkish Cypriots do not wish to take part in the negotiations?

Ms Quin: The position on Cyprus is as outlined in a recent debate in the House. The Government feel strongly that the application should be supported and that it should be seen as an important catalyst in the efforts to bring about reunification of the island and a settlement of its problems. We believe that that view is shared throughout the European Union. We want to make progress with the application, while at the same time promoting efforts—including those of the United Nations—to bring about reunification in a way that will give both the Turkish and the Greek Cypriot communities a sense of security and financial and economic prosperity for the future.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): The Minister has emphasised the importance of trade with the applicant countries. Does she share my concern about rumours currently circulating in Brussels that the Czechs, Hungarians and Poles will unilaterally operate outside the Europe agreement, reject preferential rates of duty on exports of pigmeat from the European Union and apply the higher rate of duty within the World Trade Organisation? Will the Government take action in European circles to quash such moves?

Ms Quin: I am always reluctant to respond to rumours, but there are many ways in which those issues can be discussed with the applicant countries. We meet them regularly, and when we do so we discuss a range of trading issues with the aim of achieving a fair balance between the interests of the European Union and the very real interests of the applicant countries.

Indonesia

19. Jane Griffiths (Reading, East): If he will make a statement about the United Kingdom's relations with Indonesia. [61398]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): We have substantial bilateral ties with Indonesia. We look forward to continuing to work with the Government of Indonesia in their efforts to bring about peaceful democratic reform and economic recovery.

Jane Griffiths: What steps are the Government taking to help Indonesia with political reform? What assistance will they offer the Indonesian Government in that regard and also to support the Indonesian economy?

Mr. Fatchett: We have encouraged the process of democratic reform because we think that it is the only way in which to build a new, stable Indonesia and to bring about economic recovery. When I was in Indonesia last month, I told President Habibie that we would help it to introduce democratic reforms, either bilaterally or through the European Union, by working on the procedures for elections. President Habibie acknowledged the nature of the offer, and I think we can say that we can look forward to working with the Indonesian Government on those issues and on human rights. I recognise, as does President Habibie, that progress can be made only through democratic reform.

Ron Arad

21. Mr. Frank Roy (Motherwell and Wishaw): What assessment he has made of the whereabouts of missing in action Israeli airman Ron Arad. [61400]

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Derek Fatchett): There is no conclusive evidence of the fate of Ron Arad. We cannot be sure where he is, who is holding him or, indeed, whether he is still alive. I met the family of Ron Arad when I visited Israel in January. It is important that the missing service men are not forgotten.

Mr. Roy: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer. Ron Arad was captured in the Lebanon in 1986—12 long years ago. While encouraging the more moderate elements of the Iranian Government, when my hon. Friend next speaks to that Government, will he ask them what they know about the whereabouts of the airman and the other Israeli service men who have been missing since the early 1980s? I am sure that he agrees that 12 years is a long time for families not to know the whereabouts of their loved ones.

Mr. Fatchett: I have no difficulty in agreeing with my hon. Friend. When I met members of Ron Arad's family earlier this year, I could see the suffering that they had undergone over all those years. We will take every opportunity to raise the issue with anyone who can provide information on the whereabouts of Ron Arad and other missing service men.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I wish to seek your guidance on a statement that was made by the Minister for School Standards to hon. Members in a Standing Committee, and on the record of that statement. I have informed the Minister of this point of order.

On 18 November, in the Eighth Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation debating the Education (Infant Class Sizes) (England) Regulations, I referred to the fact that the regulations had been laid and had come into force during the parliamentary recess, thus ensuring that there could be no debate on them before they came into force. The Minister responded by saying that I should have spoken to Baroness Blatch, as the regulations had been announced on 27 April and discussed in the other place on 5 May. Column 21 of the Official Report of that Standing Committee debate refers to those statements.

I have spoken to Baroness Blatch. She has made inquiries in another place into the matter and I gather that the Minister's statement was false. The regulations were not announced on 27 April and were not discussed in the other place on 5 May. Indeed, I understand that, as the primary legislation was still going through the House, it would not have been possible to discuss the regulations, which were in the form of secondary legislation.

The Minister's comments to the Standing Committee were obviously misleading; I can assume only that she was given incorrect information by her officials. Madam Speaker, I seek your guidance on how the record on the matter can be set straight.

Madam Speaker: Neither I nor any occupant of the Chair in Committee can be responsible for the accuracy, or otherwise, of ministerial statements. I refer the hon. Lady to the Order Paper. Perhaps she will find ways of pursuing the matter. I am afraid that, in this instance, I cannot help her. I am not responsible for ministerial statements.

Orders of the Day

Debate on the Address

[SIXTH DAY]

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [24 November],

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as follows:—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.—[Mr. Ashton.]

Question again proposed.

The Economy

Madam Speaker: We now come to the main business. I have selected the amendment standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. Just after 10 o'clock, I shall ask for the amendment standing in the name of the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) to be moved formally. I have had to impose a 15-minute limit on speeches by Back Benchers between the hours of 7 and 9 pm.

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham): I beg to move, as an amendment to the Address, at the end of the Question to add:

"But humbly regret that the Gracious Speech contains no proposals to save jobs or help businesses, but instead continues the policies that are pushing Britain's economy into a sharper downturn than is forecast for any other major EU economy; call on the Government instead to pursue policies of maintaining Britain's competitiveness by reversing its proposals which increase costs on business and to return to the policies conducted by the previous Government which left a golden economic legacy of low inflation, steady and sustainable growth and falling unemployment; and also urge the Government to make a clear statement of its position on the question of European tax harmonisation."

The second Session of any Government should be a period of maximum purposeful activity. The Government have had the chance to play themselves in, to prepare major plans and to act in a genuinely long-term way. Instead, they have squandered the opportunity to make real and needed changes and to make genuine improvements to health and education; most reprehensibly of all, they have missed the chance to mitigate the effects of the economic downturn that Britain now faces, a downturn that was triggered by the Government's blunders and will be prolonged and deepened by their refusal to recognise their mistakes.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: In a little while.

The House will be surprised that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury has been entrusted with the debate. Last time he led for the Government, he got into seriously hot water for using his speech to bully the Bank of England's Monetary Policy Committee. "Major gaffe," the newspapers reported. "Chief Secretary on the Chancellor's carpet," they said, so it is surprising that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has let him out again.

That is why we have heard so much from the Economic Secretary to the Treasury recently. This is the first Treasury event in the House for some time that has not been fronted by her. She is the Minister who steps in where her colleagues are forbidden to tread.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Maude: I am overcome with these blandishments, but I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight).

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): I thank my right hon. Friend. The Government have become control freaks to such an extent that they seem to have circulated to Opposition Members their 10 questions to ask the shadow Chancellor today. To help them on their way, may I begin by asking the shadow Chancellor

"why he is opposing the extra £40 billion for our public services" that the Government have guaranteed?

Mr. Maude: The House will be grateful to my hon. Friend for saving a Government Back Bencher the trouble of having to read out that prepared intervention. As he knows, of course we are not opposing £40 billion extra for health and education. We are opposing the Government's failure to implement their own pledges on welfare reform, and their reversal of the fall in welfare spending as a proportion of national income spending, putting it back on an upwards path.

Mr. Plaskitt: The right hon. Gentleman, within seconds of starting his speech, used the word "downturn". May I draw his attention to paragraph 9 of the minutes of the Bank of England's Monetary Policy Committee meeting of November 4 and 5, which state:

"the tone of some public comment had moved from predicting a slowdown through a downturn . . . That was extreme"?

Is the right hon. Gentleman satisfied to have joined the extremists?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman is off-message already, showing dangerous signs of thinking for himself. This may be shattering news to him, but the Treasury's own figures and the consensus view of outside forecasters demonstrate disbelief in the Chancellor's comments on the course of the economy. Outside forecasters are predicting a downturn. Although the hon. Gentleman undoubtedly thinks that he knows better, the Bank of England, the Confederation of British Industry and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development do not believe the Chancellor's forecast. The hon. Gentleman may believe the forecast, but that may say more about him than it does about the others.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury is standing in today for the Chancellor. It is surprising that he has been allowed out on his own, but probably every other Treasury Minister is too busy harmonising. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury is busy chairing the European Union code of conduct on harmonising business taxes in the European Union. The Chancellor is even busier today, at the Economic and Finance Council, harmonising other taxes. It is lovely to see the Paymaster General in the Chamber—welcome back to him. He is busy deciding how to harmonise his business past with the requirements of the Companies Acts and of the House.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Earlier today, I was looking at page 421 of "Erskine May", which states:

"In debate a Member is required to declare 'any relevant pecuniary interest or benefit of whatever nature, whether direct or indirect, that he may have had, may have or may be expecting to have'."

I notice, from the Register of Members' Interests, that the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) said that he undertakes remunerated advisory work for Morgan Stanley investment bankers. As we are debating the economy, should he not have declared that interest at the beginning of his speech?

Madam Speaker: I cannot deal from the Chair with an interest if an hon. Member has already declared it in the Register of Members' Interests.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I have dealt with it.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie), in his slavish desire to ingratiate himself with his masters, gets it wrong again. I stated in the Register of Members' Interests that I may from time to time undertake such work. He will be delighted and reassured to know that I have not done so. He has therefore missed the mark once again, as we are coming to expect from him.

We support some things in the Queen's Speech. As my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said last Tuesday, we welcome partial privatisation of the Commonwealth Development Corporation. It will now become free to build on the valuable work that it has done previously with developing countries without being hamstrung by Treasury rules. Of course we welcome the conversion of the Secretary of State for International Development to the idea of privatisation and look forward with keen anticipation to hearing her arguing the case.

I should now like to say a word about the financial services and markets Bill. Let me reassure the hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) that I am on the boards of two companies that will fall to be regulated under that measure. Those interests are fully disclosed in the Register of Members' Interests. There is, therefore, a serious danger of my knowing something about the subject.

The financial services industry is a British world-beating success story. Having it properly regulated so that the confidence of investors that their interests are adequately protected is not outweighed by the costs and burdens of the regulatory system is crucial, but the Government's handling of the Bill has been lamentable. They rushed clumsily into their plans last May, renaming the Securities and Investments Board and nearly precipitating the resignation of the Governor of the Bank of England. Having created turmoil, they then took 14 months to produce a draft Bill, which is quite simply a mess and has been widely criticised. It gives sweeping and ill-defined powers to the Financial Services Authority and probably breaches the European convention on human rights. It threatens huge extra compliance costs for firms, leading to more expense for savers and weakening the competitive position of the City in international markets.

The Bill ran into a hail of opposition and criticism and the Government now admit that it cannot be introduced in anything like its present draft form. The Chancellor blames the instability of the global market on the lack of proper regulation, yet at home he cannot produce a Bill on time. The Financial Services Authority continues to operate without proper statutory cover and there is continuing uncertainty and alarm in the City about the powers, scope and structure of the Government's regulatory regime.

We shall be constructive in our criticism in order to get a better Bill on the statute book. We do not see the need to delay the Bill further into the next Session and we do not agree that it is appropriate for the carry-over procedure.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): The right hon. Gentleman has declared his jobs in the sector which clearly give him an understanding of it, but does he accept that his interpretation will be from the producer side and not from the consumer side? He should not forget that the Bill aims to protect consumers and investors and to regulate the market.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Lady misses the point that consumers have an interest in investment products being made available competitively in a way that gives them free choice. Consumers are not served by a system that places such heavy costs on the financial services industry, as they will suffer from a lack of choice and excessive costs. In this, as in any other sector, the cost of over-heavy regulation eventually falls on the consumer, as the hon. Lady ought to understand.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): How does the right hon. Gentleman square his argument for clarity in the regulatory regime with his declared view on the media that the Bank of England is either too independent or not independent enough? Which should it be—independent or not?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman has done well. He has skipped one to nine and gone straight to 10. It is a pretty feeble question and he has asked it several times. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not answer that question until three days after the election. I am not prepared to answer it three years before the next election.

The economy should dominate the Government's thoughts and actions as Britain stands on the brink of the most severe downturn—[Interruption.] I am using that word—anywhere in Europe and north America. Incredibly, at a time when people's jobs and businesses are on the line, the Queen's Speech contained not a single measure to make it easier for anyone to get a job.

Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) rose—

Mr. Maude: I am going to make some progress now.

By their decision not to include even one Bill that would make it easier for people to get a job or keep the one that they have, the Labour Government have made their priorities abundantly clear to the whole country.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): Perhaps I can further develop No. 8 on the list. The right hon. Gentleman cannot say that he does not know the answer, because he has been given notice of the question. Constituents of mine have asked me to ask the right hon. Gentleman a simple question. They say that they earn very low pay and are pleased that, after all these years, a Labour Government are introducing a national minimum wage. The Conservatives want to block that and then remove it, I understand. Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that, at the next general election, the Conservative party will stand on a platform of ending the national minimum wage and reducing the pay of many thousands of people in my constituency—yes or no?

Mr. Maude: I have a high regard for the hon. Gentleman and I am sorry that he could not think of his own question instead of taking a handout from the Whips. The Leader of the Opposition said:

"I think it would in fact be very foolish, and most people in the party accept it, if the party started writing its . . . plans now."

That was the Leader of the Opposition—in 1995.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I have not asked what we said; I have asked the right hon. Gentleman what he thinks and what the Conservatives believe. Will their policy at the next election be to end the national minimum wage? If so, let us have a yes or no answer now, with no dithering.

Mr. Maude: I admire the hon. Gentleman's persistence, but what was good enough for the then Leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister—[Interruption.] Labour Members are very much out of order now. They are criticising their leader. It is not acceptable for him to have said that he would not announce his plans then. That is what he said in 1995, but it is not good enough for them. I am surprised that they did not express their criticism at the time.

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): The amendment on the Order Paper, for which I assume that we are asked to vote, calls for a "return to the policies conducted by the previous Government".

Surely the right hon. Gentleman will tell us to which policies he wants to return. Does he mean abolishing the changes that have taken place under this Government, such as the minimum wage? How can he expect the House to vote for a motion if he will not tell us what it means?

Mr. Maude: The amendment means returning to policies that created high growth, low inflation, falling unemployment and rising living standards.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Maude: It is a delight to see so many Labour Members wanting to intervene. I do not know whether all their pagers went off at once to make them all spring up at the same time. Perhaps they are being given a new line that has not yet been printed.

Ms Helen Southworth (Warrington, South): Does the right hon. Gentleman want to return to one of the dearly held policies of the past—interest rates of 15 per cent?

Mr. Maude: That is No. 6. I shall let the hon. Lady into a secret: her party is in government now; we ask the questions.

Although the CBI reports that business confidence is at an all-time low, Government complacency is at an all-time high. Every time a Labour Back Bencher stands up to intervene, their arrogant complacency and refusal to answer basic questions about the Government's policies illustrate my point.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Maude: I want to make a little progress now. I have been very generous in giving way and I think that we have almost gone through the list of 10 questions.

Mr. Ivan Lewis (Bury, South) rose—

Mr. Maude: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will ask the remaining questions together, which would save time.

Mr. Lewis: The right hon. Gentleman cannot define the policies to which he wants to return because, at general elections, the electorate vote primarily on economic competence. The reason for the biggest landslide in living memory on 1 May 1997 was primarily the Conservative party's economic record of boom and bust. That is why the British people will not allow the right hon. Gentleman back into office to implement his policies.

Mr. Maude: I think that the hon. Gentleman could have done a better job in clearing up the remaining questions. Again, I quote what the Prime Minister said when he was Leader of the Opposition:

"I don't believe people do expect us to say well by such and such a date there will be X hundreds of thousands of jobs, we will tell you exactly what the minimum wage is now, we'll write our budget in advance of getting into power".

If that was good enough then, it should be good enough now.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Maude: I am going to make progress.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: I think that there will be a point of frustration if the hon. Gentleman is not able to intervene.

Dr. Palmer: I am puzzled as to why the right hon. Gentleman is unwilling to deal with the points in the motion that he tabled. As a new Member, I am not clear whether it is in order for him to refuse to address the points in a motion that he tabled.

Madam Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Maude: I have been keen to give all Labour Members the opportunity to ask the prepared questions to earn their colours and to ingratiate themselves with the control-freak tendency, but I think that the patience of the House will soon diminish if that process continues.

The arrogant complacency—[Interruption.] Every response that Labour Members make and every note in their braying voices illustrate their arrogant complacency and their refusal to accept that there are any problems.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: No. I have said that I propose to proceed.

The Government have blamed everyone but themselves for the economic downturn. They have blamed the Asians, the Russians, Britain's managers and greedy workers; the Chief Secretary has blamed the Bank of England. No one can pretend that Britain is immune from international economic difficulties, but global turbulence makes it doubly important that policies are right at home. Britain's economy started to turn down before the Russian and Latin American problems surfaced. Most countries around the world are not sliding towards recession, yet every day there is more evidence that things are going wrong in Britain.

The CBI survey shows that confidence in the service sector is slipping yet further. The Institute of Purchasing Management monthly survey shows that manufacturing output has fallen at its sharpest rate for seven years and that manufacturing industry has contracted for eight consecutive months. Is it any wonder that barely anyone believes the Chancellor's fantasy forecasts for economic growth? The Bank of England does not believe him, nor do the CBI or the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development—

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: No. I am going to make progress.

Even a Treasury publication shows that the consensus of outside forecasts is well below the Chancellor's forecast—for next year, the year after and the year after that. Only a handful of old faithfuls, headed by the chief economist at the Trades Union Congress, believe the complacent nonsense that the Chancellor hands out.

The downturn was triggered by Government policy blunders and has been prolonged by their refusal to acknowledge the problems that they created. They made four basic blunders: the reckless spending spree—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Maude: I think that Labour Members are all on question No. 2, which I have already answered. Social security spending is set to increase by £37 billion over the next three years, which is almost as much as the increases in health and education spending put together.

Mr. Derek Twigg (Halton) rose—

Mr. Maude: The Labour party committed itself in its manifesto to cutting social security bills and the Prime Minister said the same immediately after the general election. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will explain what went wrong. Why has the Prime Minister's clear pledge in absolute terms to cut social security bills resulted in an increase in social security spending of £37 billion?

Mr. Twigg: The right hon. Gentleman has been asked this question many times. Will he tell us what the Conservative party would cut out of the £40 billion if they were in government?

Mr. Maude: None of it. We have said so many times. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman could not answer my question, which was: what went wrong with the Prime Minister's clear pledge to cut social security bills and how has it turned into a £37 billion increase? He cannot answer it.

The second blunder was the attack on savings, which fuelled spending and kept interest rates higher than they need have been, and the 17 tax rises, which have stoked inflation and put up interest rates. The Government have piled new costs on to businesses when they are least able to cope. Interest rates are higher than they need be and businesses are less able to withstand the downturn. What of the £40 billion in extra taxes and costs—no less than £1,500 per person employed?

Mr. Salter rose—

Mr. Maude: I will not give way, as I must make some progress.

The Government's measures are also boosting inflation, as the Bank of England has said. The problems in the economy are getting worse and the Government simply will not accept them. Their new favourite topic is productivity. The Prime Minister, like the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, without a day's—

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) rose—

Mr. Maude: I will not give way. I intend to make progress.

The Prime Minister, the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, without a day's business experience between them, have even had the impertinence to lecture business. The Prime Minister has said, "Be honest. Your fundamental problem is not high interest rates or a high pound; it is too few first-class managers." There is Labour's scapegoat, productivity and bad management.

What does the Chief Secretary to the Treasury think that the chairman of BMW meant—I raised this in our last debate on the subject, but did not receive an answer—when he said in 1995:

"Great Britain is currently the most attractive country among all European locations for producing cars"?

What has changed since then? Now, BMW is having to be bribed by the Department of Trade and Industry to keep Longbridge open. It is the same plant, management and work force, but a different Government, and that is what has changed. They are a Government who have increased costs on business and made productivity worse. That is why barely a day goes by without more jobs lost and more business failures—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) has made it clear that he will not give way for a while, so hon. Members should not persist in trying to intervene for the time being.

Mr. Maude: Last Friday—black Friday—no fewer than 4,200 job losses were announced, including job losses in BMW, which was lauding Britain's productivity to the skies barely three years ago. Today, it has been announced that 1,250 jobs are to go at Courtaulds Textiles. That is what is going on in the economy. The Government should admit it and take steps to mitigate the effects.

[Mr. Maude]

The Queen's Speech was curiously silent on another important subject—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Maude: No. I am making progress. The Speech contained much about the Government helping to prepare the European Union for historic challenges—talk of working with European partners to promote economic reforms and of preparations for the introduction of the euro—but nothing about the principal European issue of the day. If it were not so damaging to the country, a certain innocent pleasure could be had from the spectacle of the Chancellor tying himself in ever-tighter knots over European tax harmonisation. On that issue, as on so many before, the Government are trying to have it both ways and to be all things to all men.

When the right hon. Gentleman is in Britain, he says that tax harmonisation is not the way forward for Europe and that Britain's tax decisions will be made in Britain. However, according to "The New European Way", which he has signed and which, apparently, was not drafted a million miles away from him,

"We must make further progress in tax and benefit reform by co-ordinating savings and corporate taxation."

In Britain, he says that no one is proposing any change in value added tax, but the European Commission has published a policy document entitled "A Common System of VAT", which states that the present system has to be replaced and advocates the abolition of the VAT-free circulation of goods, so there is such a proposal.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Byers): I regret the fact that the right hon. Gentleman did not read out the paragraph to which he referred, because he omitted some important words. For the record, I draw his attention to the words that he missed out. The document clearly states:

"We must make further progress in tax and benefit reform to help safeguard and create jobs in Europe by implementing an effective code of conduct."

I regret his failure to mention why that was necessary.

Mr. Maude: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for amplifying and confirming my point: there is a clear commitment in Labour policy documents to taking further a process of tax co-ordination and harmonisation that can only increase Britain's taxes to continental levels.

Mr. Paul Marsden (Shrewsbury and Atcham): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: I am not giving way now, but I shall in a little while.

In Britain, the Chancellor says that the central issue for Europe is not tax harmonisation. However, Mr. Monti, the European tax Commissioner, says:

"As far as taxation is concerned, we have the UK fully on board."

The Government cannot continue to have it both ways. Why cannot the Chief Secretary make an unequivocal statement on where the Government stand? The Government seem to inhabit a parallel universe, where they have not done what they have done and where they did not say what they said.

I would like the Chief Secretary to answer three key questions. First, does he agree with his colleagues on the continent that the single currency will tend to lead to tax harmonisation? The German Finance Minister thinks so. Mr. Lafontaine said:

"It is necessary to harmonise tax policy. A unified currency area needs a fair and equal tax framework."

The Austrian Finance Minister thinks so, too. He said:

"EMU will make it imperative to start co-ordinating the sphere of taxation. The Social Democrat Governments will also have to look at harmonising price and wage policy."

The French Finance Minister thinks so. He is confident about it; I do not know who has been tipping him the wink. He said that Britain would be in the middle of next year.

"won round to tax harmonisation by the end of the German presidency"

That is what the Chancellor's continental colleagues think. They have a clear opinion on the issue. What does the British Finance Minister think? Does he agree with them that the road to economic and monetary union also tends to lead to tax harmonisation—yes or no? A simple nod or shake of the head will do. The Chief Secretary nods; he agrees. [Interruption.] He is being particularly helpful and illustrates my point perfectly. Asked whether he agrees, first he nods and then he shakes his head.

Mr. Byers: The right hon. Gentleman will have to wait for my speech, in which I shall address specifically the questions that he has raised in his.

Mr. Maude: It is all things to all men: a nod one moment, a shake the next; yes to one side, no to the other. No wonder the Government are in chaos.

I come to my second question. If the Chief Secretary cannot comment on the proposals from Europe—we wait with keen anticipation to hear what he will say—perhaps he can comment on Labour's policy paper. This revealing document states:

"The single currency is bound to lead to closer integration in some areas for those member states that participate, though Labour believes member states must retain their own control over public spending levels and personal tax rates."

What about the rest? Why is it Labour's policy only to protect personal tax rates? What about business tax rates, savings rates, savings taxes and stamp duty? Are they all up for grabs? Is the game up already?

Mr. Paul Marsden: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: I would give way to the Chief Secretary if he were prepared to answer my question. The Prime Minister has done the same thing and protected Britain's position on personal taxes only, with everything else left up for grabs. Will the Chief Secretary explain why? If he cannot, will he answer my third question and give us some guidance on specific taxes? Will he give a binding commitment not to raise Britain's rates of stamp duty on house purchases to the level of our partners?

Ms Keeble: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Ms Claire Ward (Watford): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: I will give way to the Chief Secretary if he wishes to respond to my question. Will the rate be raised to the level of our partners—yes or no? He could again shake his head, nod or do both as before; at least we would have some idea. Will he veto the imposition of the withholding tax on savings, which will put 10,000 jobs at risk in the financial services industry? Will he use the veto to protect Britain's rates of value added tax—yes or no? Will he veto any European energy taxes—yes or no? Will he veto the harmonisation of corporation tax—yes or no?

Perhaps the most ridiculous spectacle of all is cut by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. In Britain, she introduced a tax break for the British film industry; we were told that it was a flagship measure, designed to promote employment, investment and opportunities. The hon. Lady and her friends were pretty pleased with themselves, but they reckoned without the chairperson of the European Union working group set up to eliminate harmful tax competition, who is busy clamping down on unfair tax breaks to particular industries, such as film making. The chairperson of the working group will come to the Treasury to demand action from the Financial Secretary and there will be an angry confrontation.

Who will win that battle of the titans? Will it be the chairperson of the working group, or the Financial Secretary? Well, it turns out that they are one and the same person. The hon. Lady is going to face herself across the table, look herself in the eye and tell herself that such tax breaks are totally unacceptable and must be stopped immediately. Will she face herself down and insist on fighting for Britain's tax sovereignty against her European alter ego? Will she keep in with Britain, or cave in to Europe? Will she stand up for Britain, or speak up for Europe? The choice is hers. The Government are split down the middle and the Financial Secretary is as well.

The Government are spinning out of control, saying one thing one day and another the next. Yesterday, in a story in the Financial Times which was clearly briefed from No. 10, the Prime Minister was all for some tax harmonisation. It said:

"There is a growing realisation among ministers that some forms of tax harmonisation in the EU could be beneficial to the UK . . . Tony Blair, the Prime Minister, has instructed officials that they should not dogmatically oppose all EU tax initiatives."

It continued:

"the government is determined not to block the proposal to impose an EU-wide withholding tax on savings and investments."

That was yesterday, but what about today? On the front page of The Daily Telegraph today, we read:

"Tony Blair broke ranks with fellow socialist leaders"—

he certainly would not like that—

"last night to open the way for a showdown with France and Germany over their plans for Europe-wide taxes."

Today in The Daily Telegraph the Prime Minister is dead against harmonisation, but yesterday in the Financial Times he was all for it. Which Prime Minister does the Chief Secretary support? Does he support yesterday's Prime Minister, or today's? Perhaps he supports both. Will the real Government at last stand up?

Sometimes, the Government do not even wait until the next day to spin the opposite story. This very morning, some useful light was cast on the Government's attitude to duty free—[Interruption.] Labour Members might want to hear what I have to say, because the issue is of considerable importance to many of their constituents. In the Financial Times today, we read:

"Mr. Brown is today expected to offer support to France and Germany over plans to postpone the scrapping of duty-free shopping. At a meeting of EU finance ministers in Brussels, Mr. Brown is expected to back . . . calls for a five-year delay while the issue is reviewed."

That was reassuring: the Chancellor had read my letter and taken my advice—sensible fellow, we thought. However, we then opened another of today's newspapers and read:

"Gordon Brown will back the abolition of duty-free shopping at a meeting of EU finance ministers in Brussels today."

Are the Government keeping duty free, or scrapping it?

The Government are in a mess. They cannot work out where they are heading in Europe. They are fiddling while Britain's economy slides down, refusing in their arrogant complacency to admit that there is a problem facing them. The Queen's Speech is a missed opportunity. I commend the amendment to the House.

4.10 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Byers): There is a common theme running through the measures in the Queen's Speech. That theme is modernisation. For our country, our public services, our system of government and the economy, the status quo is simply not an option. Change must come, as that is what people voted for on 1 May last year. The people had had enough of a Tory Government who were drifting with no coherent programme and who allowed political dogma to triumph over reason and common sense. Judging from the speech that we have heard this afternoon from the shadow Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), nothing has changed on the Conservative Front Bench.

The contrast with this Government could not be clearer. We have adopted a pragmatic approach that has allowed us to act in the national interest, not for narrow party political advantage. Our new Labour Government are not an old-fashioned state interventionist Government; nor are we saddled with an equally outdated adherence to the free market. The Government have a new sense of direction that has allowed us to cut corporation tax, introduce a national minimum wage, give independence to the Bank of England, find radical new ways of combating social exclusion, crack down on juvenile crime while launching the most ambitious programme to slash youth unemployment that our country has ever seen, reform student finance and deliver a record increase in the level of child benefit. In this, our second Queen's Speech, we build on our first programme by pushing forward our modernisation agenda.

In our first Session, we delivered no fewer than 52 Acts, including four education Acts—all of which I had the pleasure and the privilege of taking through

[Mr. Stephen Byers]

Committee. In this more time-limited Session, we are promising nearly 20 Bills. In addition, draft Bills will cover important areas such as freedom of information, the food standards agency and the funding of political parties. Our modernisation agenda is based on fairness and enterprise. The debate since the Queen's Speech was delivered a week ago shows that our principles, values and ideals give coherence to our programme of legislation.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Byers: I will give way when I have finished my introduction.

As we saw this afternoon, the Conservative party wants to turn the clock back. It has no vision for the future—just a return to all our yesterdays. That poverty of ambition for our country has been rejected by the British people. This Government will lead our country into the next century. That carries a heavy responsibility, but we intend to discharge it in the interests of the many, not the few. In doing so, we will tackle those vested interests that stand in the way of the national interest, whether they are ermine-clad hereditaries from the House of Lords or professionals who block the radical reform of our public services.

Several specific proposals in the Queen's Speech are directly relevant to the economy and the financial markets. The shadow Chancellor referred to the financial services and markets Bill, and I wish to say a few words about that important legislation.

Mr. Hawkins: The Chief Secretary talks about fairness. What was fair about the unforeshadowed smash-and-grab raid on people's pensions? How many more taxes—which the electorate certainly did not vote for—will his Government impose on the British people?

Mr. Byers: The hon. Gentleman likes to use phrases such as "smash and grab".

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Answer the question.

Mr. Byers: I will answer in due course. I urge the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) to calm down, and I look forward to a speech from him in due course. I hope that it will be up to his usual standard—which would be extremely helpful. We believe that our tax proposals are fair and just and that the British people will agree with us.

The financial services industry is a highly successful and important part of the United Kingdom economy. It accounts for 7 per cent. of gross domestic product and employs more than 1 million people. An efficient and effective financial services industry is vital for our prosperity and stability. Millions of people depend on the availability of modern financial services and fair and honest markets and advice. The City of London is one of the foremost financial centres in the world. We are determined to secure the future of the City and financial services in the United Kingdom. We want the UK to be a good place to do business, and that is why we are introducing the financial services and markets Bill.

The Bill will create a single regulator with a single authorisation process, a single compensation scheme, a single ombudsman and a single appeals tribunal. In doing so, it will reduce regulation and provide for greater accountability. The Bill will do away with the increasingly blurred distinction between the nine existing regulators and the complex division of responsibility. The new regulator will have, for the first time, clear statutory objectives and a single coherent set of functions and powers.

Excessive regulation gets in the way of good business and is to no one's advantage. The Bill will therefore provide for the Financial Services Authority to consult on costs and benefits arising from any regulations that it proposes to introduce. There will be a statutory requirement for regulation to be proportionate. The Bill will reduce the potential for confusion and duplication. It will enable the Financial Services Authority to deliver high standards of supervision and investor protection. It will create transparency and fairness for providers and consumers of financial services.

As the shadow Chancellor said, a draft Bill was introduced at the end of July. The consultation process has now ended. In the light of that consultation, we can bring an improved Bill before the House next year. I am keen to learn from experience and I therefore propose to establish in the new year a joint committee of the House of Commons and the House of Lords to scrutinise the Bill before it begins its usual parliamentary process. Our consultation shows that there is strong support for plans to overhaul financial regulation, but I want to ensure that the details are right, and I am sure that the establishment of the joint committee will help us to achieve that. I am grateful to the Treasury Select Committee, which will conduct a short inquiry in December into certain aspects of the Bill.

This is an opportunity for hon. Members on all sides of the House to recognise the need for improved regulation in the City and to join us in ensuring that the Bill is in the best possible form to meet what I hope are our shared objectives.

The Queen's Speech confirmed that a Bill would be introduced for the working families tax credit and disabled persons tax credit. Many people on low income are trapped in poverty. The tax and benefit system stands in the way of people trying to get out of poverty. That trap frustrates ambitions and locks people into poverty. The Government believe that work is the best route out of poverty and a life on benefits. That is why we are introducing measures to help to make work pay: reforms of the tax and benefit system, a national minimum wage and the working families and disabled persons tax credits. The link with the tax system and payment through the wage packet will demonstrate the reward of work over welfare.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): The Chief Secretary mentioned the centrality to the working families tax credit of payment through the pay packet but, as a concession, it has been agreed that couples can decide whether the person with the pay packet or the person with the children gets the money. If parents opt en masse for payment to those with children, would not his vision be undermined?

Mr. Byers: I think not. The Government have no problem with people being able to exercise choice in this very important matter. The principle underpinning the working families tax credit is that people can see that work pays. That means going out, getting a job and ensuring that people get more money in work than they would on benefits.

The working families tax credit will ensure that work pays and is not punished. It encourages people to work by allowing them to keep more of what they earn, and it provides two specific guarantees. First, it guarantees a minimum income of £190 a week for families with one member in full-time work earning the national minimum wage. Secondly, families earning less than £220 a week will no longer pay any net income tax. A child care tax credit will also be introduced as an integral part of the working families tax credit, replacing the failed disregard in family credit. It will ensure that no family is denied the opportunity to work by being unable to access affordable, quality child care.

Those measures are part of our radical agenda to modernise the welfare system. They will provide a fairer and better deal for up to 1.5 million families. In its first year, the working families tax credit will give up to £1.5 billion more to those families than would have been available under family credit. The disabled persons tax credit will help disabled people who want to get back to work. It will be more generous than the existing benefit, so ensuring that disabled people can take and keep work.

I understand that the Opposition have made it clear that they will oppose the working families tax credit and retain family credit. The shadow Chancellor said that it was not for him to answer questions. I understand that the decision to abolish the working families tax credit and return to family credit has already been taken. The shadow Social Security Secretary made that announcement in Social Security questions a month ago. Will the shadow Chancellor confirm that that is the Conservative Opposition's policy?

Mr. Maude: Does the Chief Secretary recognise these words:

"the whole of the Working Families Tax Credit venture is fraught with great dangers: it offers huge bonuses for dishonesty; it strengthens the employers' hold over working people; it pulls employees into a spider's web of dishonesty and corruption"?

Those were the words of his right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field).

Mr. Byers: They were, and the simple reality is that my right hon. Friend was wrong. It is probably one of the reasons why he is no longer a social security Minister. The working families tax credit will work. I notice that we have had no confirmation of Conservative policy one way or the other from the shadow Chancellor. It is interesting that the shadow Social Security Secretary is on record as saying that the working families tax credit would be abolished, yet the shadow Chancellor cannot say one way or the other. Perhaps he will now.

Mr. Maude: The right hon. Gentleman is getting frightfully excited about this. We have said it so many times that this is one thing on which he is right: we will oppose the abolition of family credit. Does the Chief Secretary remember his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, when shadow Employment Secretary some years back, arguing that the introduction of a minimum wage would reduce the cost of in-work benefits? That idea seems to have gone out of the window.

Mr. Byers: I am grateful to the shadow Chancellor for answering a question, confirming that the Opposition would abolish the working families tax credit. I can understand why he feels uncomfortable admitting that; he probably knows the consequences of such a policy. For those 1.5 million people receiving the working families tax credit, it would mean an average tax rise of £17 a week.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) rose—

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose—

Mr. Byers: I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell–Savours).

Mr. Campbell–Savours: Will my right hon. Friend press the shadow Chancellor again? The shadow Chancellor answered a specific question on policy, telling us what the Conservative position at the next general election would be on the arrangement that we were discussing. Why cannot we get a clear answer on the national minimum wage? If he is prepared on one, why not on the other? Is it Conservative Members' policy to dither, and perhaps even to support us in the longer term?

Mr. Byers: I look forward to the Conservative Opposition's support for a national minimum wage. We may have to wait a long time for that support, but we live in hope.

Later, I shall speak about the national minimum wage and—

Ms Abbott: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Byers: I want to make progress. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] I always give way to my hon. Friend, and I shall do so in due course, but I want to make some progress, specifically on the working families tax credit.

If the Conservative Opposition decide that they wish to retain family credit but not working families tax credit, they will go into the next general election with a commitment to a tax increase of £17 a week for the $1\frac{1}{2}$ million people who will benefit from the working families tax credit. I look forward to campaigning against the shadow Chancellor on those issues.

I have concluded what I want to say about the working families tax credit. It may be an opportune moment to give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott).

Ms Abbott: The entire House agrees with my right hon. Friend that the best way out of poverty is work, but does he accept that some groups—especially the elderly, and mothers with very young babies—cannot take that route out of poverty? Does he agree with the recommendation of Sir Donald Acheson's report on inequalities in health that the way to bring the elderly and mothers with very young babies out of poverty is to increase the level of benefits?

Mr. Byers: Unfortunately, the Acheson report was published before the announcement of some of the policies that the Government are introducing. In particular, the large increase that will take place in child benefit will address many of the concerns raised in the report. For the record, the Government's policy is clear. We want work to be available for those who can work, and we want support and help to be made available for those who cannot. Those policies are clear, but we take the view that the way out of poverty for the people whom I represent, and those whom my hon. Friend represents, is work and having a job.

We also need to ensure that work pays. At the moment, for many people in my constituency and throughout the country, work simply does not pay. The working families tax credit will go a long way to ensure that people are not effectively punished financially for going out to work.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Byers: I must give way to the hon. Gentleman because he used to be Member of Parliament in my mother's constituency, and when I told him that she had managed to recruit several 80-year-olds to the Labour party, he went off to another constituency.

Mr. Jenkin: I fear that the right hon. Gentleman may be a little misinformed; but how comfortable is he, having campaigned before the general election for a reduction in means-testing in the benefits and tax system, now to be presiding over substantial increases in means-testing?

Mr. Byers: I was only slightly misinformed. My mother has not moved; there may have been a boundary change. Anyway, she was very disappointed no longer to be able to lock horns with the hon. Gentleman as her constituency Member of Parliament.

There is no inconsistency whatever between the commitments that we made on welfare reform before the general election, and the proposals and policies that we are implementing, and shall continue to implement.

The Queen's Speech says that we are committed to investing £40 billion in education and health over the next three years. We are able to do so because the Government have been prudent with public finances. We have taken tough decisions and cut borrowing by £20 billion in our first year in office. In the first half of this year, borrowing is £10 billion lower than last year. We have set out our spending plans for the next three years, and among the central features of our new spending regime are built-in margins to cover uncertainties, including the risk of slower growth and its effect on revenues.

I was intrigued by the comments that the shadow Chancellor made this afternoon about the Conservatives' approach to the extra spending of £40 billion for schools and hospitals. He is on the record as saying that our spending plans, which include schools and hospitals, were reckless and foolish. Interestingly, he now seems to be conducting a U-turn on his previous statements. The record will show that, during various interviews that the right hon. Gentleman has given on "Today" and on television, he has said that our spending plans are reckless and foolish. The record is there.

Mr. Maude: I challenge the right hon. Gentleman to produce the transcript of an interview or anything that I have said where I have stated that we oppose the £40 billion extra on health and education. The right hon. Gentleman can send his Parliamentary Private Secretary across to his officials to get them to hunt through the files. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would not have made this allegation without having chapter and verse to hand. Let him get them now to prove what he says.

Mr. Byers: I shall write to the right hon. Gentleman with the exact reference. I stand by what I have said. I shall write in my own time.

Mr. Maude: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Byers: I am not giving way.

Mr. Maude rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. There can be only one Member on his feet at the same time.

Mr. Maude: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Chief Secretary has made an assertion which I feel sure he would not have made without having chapter and verse to back it up. It must surely be possible for him to procure that chapter and verse so that we can ascertain whether he is justified in what he says. Alternatively, he can withdraw his assertion. He has the alternative of withdrawing his latest gaffe, if he is man enough to do it.

Mr. Byers rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister's speech so far has been in proper order, so there is nothing that he needs to withdraw. There is an opportunity for Opposition Members to rebut any case that the right hon. Gentleman has advanced.

Mr. Byers rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Let us start as we mean to finish this evening. The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton) should not be making any comments from a sedentary position.

Mr. Byers: We have clearly touched a raw nerve in the right hon. Gentleman. We need to know exactly what Conservative policies are. On spending on hospitals, time will tell whether the Conservatives will support our extra spending on education and health. It is a responsibility that we certainly intend to deliver. It is what the public want and what they will get.

Mr. Phil Woolas (Oldham, East and Saddleworth): I think that I can answer the point that has been made. The Observer printed an interview with the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) on 22 November. The right hon. Gentleman was asked specifically about cutting spending. The interviewer asked:

"But would not cutting spending make the slowdown worse?"

The right hon. Gentleman replied:

"Fiscal policy cannot be set to a demand regulator."

In a classic exposition of current Conservative policy, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"Perhaps I am being very naive about this."

He continued to talk about the so-called black hole. The Observer asked him:

"You think, therefore, that you could have lower interest rates if you cut spending?"

The right hon. Gentleman replied:

"Yes, that is precisely what I mean."

The right hon. Gentleman's policy is clear.

Mr. Byers: There are a number of references that might be prayed in aid. The extra money that we intend to spend on schools and hospitals is not following the old approach of proposing the spending of money for a particular problem and hoping that the problem will go away. In the next fortnight, we shall be publishing public service agreements that will show clearly the improvements that the public will get from the extra money that we shall be spending.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Byers: I wanted to move on to Europe, which I know the House has been waiting for. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman will be very popular if he delays me in moving on to Europe.

Mr. St. Aubyn: The Opposition are concerned about schools and hospitals. Will the Minister answer this question: if the Chancellor of the Exchequer's projections of Government revenue prove wildly optimistic, as many fear, will the Government cut their promises of extra spending on schools and hospitals, or will they increase taxes or raise borrowing? Which will they do?

Mr. Byers: The hon. Gentleman came in slightly late and may have missed my comment that we have built in a margin on the current Budget to cover those eventualities. The £40 billion for schools and hospitals will be spent. I can guarantee that that is a commitment from the Government. [Interruption.] The heckling from those on the Opposition Front Bench suggests that they do not support the extra £40 billion for schools and hospitals, but I shall not delay the House further.

With reference to Europe—an issue that interests many hon. Members—I shall deal with three aspects: the abatement, the single currency and tax harmonisation, which is specifically mentioned in the amendment.

The Queen's Speech states clearly that we will retain the United Kingdom's abatement. That budget rebate from the European Union remains fully justified. Enlargement of the EU does not alter the justification for the abatement, as it will not change the UK's position relative to existing member states. Any proposed changes to the own resource decision requires all member states to agree, and the Queen's Speech makes it clear that we will not accept any adverse changes to the UK's abatement.

On the single currency, we have said clearly that our policy is to prepare and decide, with the final decision being taken by the British people in a referendum. What does the Conservative party think? More specifically, what does the shadow Chancellor think of the single European currency? Does he believe that a principled position needs to be adopted? His leader said:

"I am against a single currency in principle."

Or is he pragmatic about it, as is the Conservatives' deputy leader, who said:

"Our instinct is to say, 'Show me it works.' That is the sensible approach, a pragmatic policy based on a hard-headed assessment of the facts"?

How can the deputy leader's approach be reconciled with that of the shadow Chancellor? In the interview in The Observer that was mentioned earlier, when the shadow Chancellor was asked:

"What you are saying is that even if the single currency were a success, you could not use that to decide whether or not to join?", he replied, "Absolutely." It is impossible to reconcile that approach with the view expressed by the Conservatives' deputy leader.

The Conservatives have held a ballot of their party members and have ruled out the single currency for 10 years, even if it is in Britain's national interest to join. However, the Conservatives must answer some fundamental questions. Is their hostility to a single currency based on principle? Is that the position of the shadow Chancellor? Does he believe that, as a matter of principle, joining the single currency should be ruled out—yes or no? He is not answering. If it is a principled position, why not rule it out for ever? If it is pragmatic opposition, how can the Conservatives rule it out for 10 years, even if it is in Britain's national interest?

Ms Keeble: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, given that most of the big financial institutions will be dealing in euros next year, and that many Opposition Members have interests in, or are employed by, those institutions, if those hon. Members were truly principled, they would say whether or not they intend to advise people to deal in euros next year, and to hold euro accounts themselves? They should be honest with the public about the relationship of the financial institutions for which many of them work to the single currency.

Mr. Byers: It will be interesting to see what advice Opposition Members give to their clients in the other jobs that many of them hold.

For the Tories, no decision for a decade is the only option. The single currency reveals a fundamental flaw that divides the Conservative party. As a result, they have adopted a policy that puts party before national interest.

Mr. Jenkin rose—

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) rose—

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) rose—

Mr. Byers: I am spoilt for choice. I am not sure whether to give way to the pro-European wing or the anti-European wing. There are so few pro-Europeans left in the Tory party that I shall give way to the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful indeed to the right hon. Gentleman. I am a pro-European, but the point is that he is Chief Secretary and the one who has to decide the policy. Can he answer for the Government the question whether this vague intention that they will join if the economic circumstances are right will be translated into positive political will to ensure that Government policy makes the circumstances right for entry? That is the challenge that he has to grasp. The trouble is that, by throwing all the questions around to others, he is evading the central question, to which many business men in this country need the answer.

Mr. Byers: That went down badly with some Conservative Members.

The Government's position is clear, and I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a close interest in matters European. Provided that the five economic tests were satisfied, we would be in a situation in which the Government would consider the position, there would be a decision of the Cabinet and of the Government and then there would be a recommendation. It will be for the British people to decide in a referendum—it will be their decision, and we have made that position absolutely clear.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Byers: I want to move on. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] Well, we should have both sides of the argument. Of course I will give way.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Although the Government's five criteria to be met before a referendum are perfectly acceptable—so far as it goes—on the technical side, do not the recent statements by the German Finance and Foreign Ministers make it perfectly clear, as a matter of constitutional practicality, that, if we were to join the single European currency and all that is clearly linked to that, we would cease to be an independent, self-governing, democratic nation state?

Mr. Byers: I do not accept that argument at all, and there are many other people who will agree with me in that position.

On tax harmonisation, I want to address a number of concerns that have been raised, and a good degree of scaremongering that has occurred, over the past few days. I also want to set out the principles that we will apply and apply them to a number of specific cases that have been raised in the past few days.

The Government have made it clear that they will not support any action at European level that will threaten jobs or the competitive position of British business, so any tax proposals will need to pass that acid test. Questions of tax of course require a unanimous decision, so there is no question of tax changes that we do not support being imposed on us by Brussels. The test has to be whether, in any particular case, the proposal delivers economic or financial benefits for the United Kingdom. If it does not, we will oppose it and argue our case. If necessary, we will be prepared to use our veto to protect the national interest.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Byers: No. I want to make these points.

Having outlined the principles that we will apply, let me consider three areas which have been the subject of recent speculation: value added tax, corporation tax and the withholding tax.

On VAT, let the House be clear that there are no detailed proposals to change the existing rates. We were elected with a clear pledge to maintain zero rates of VAT on food, children's clothes, books, newspapers and public transport fares. The United Kingdom's zero rates are fully safeguarded under existing European Community agreements.

All European Community VAT matters are subject to agreement by all member states. We can therefore guarantee that we will honour our manifesto pledge on VAT, and that VAT on food, children's clothes, books and newspapers and public transport fares will remain zero rated. Unlike the Conservative party, we will stick to our pledge. I remind the House that the Conservatives introduced VAT on domestic fuel and sought to increase it from 8 to 17.5 per cent.

On corporation tax, there are no Community proposals on the table in respect of harmonisation. Indeed, no one proposed minimum rates of corporation tax at today's Economic and Finance Council meeting. The political reality is that harmonisation of corporation tax across Europe is a non-starter. Rates start at 10 per cent. in Ireland and at 28 per cent. in Finland. In the United Kingdom, rates will start at 30 per cent. from next year. In Germany, the rate is more than 40 per cent. It is increasingly being realised that raising corporate tax rates would harm the competitive position of the European Union economy. We would simply not allow corporation tax rates to be raised to the existing levels of some other countries.

On the specific issue of the withholding tax, the motive behind the measure is one that I hope all hon. Members would be able to support—the prevention of tax evasion. It is aimed chiefly at Belgian and German citizens who place funds in the highly secretive banking system in Luxembourg and do not make a declaration to their own tax authorities. The Chancellor called today at ECOFIN for other countries to tackle the problems of banking secrecy.

Having studied the draft directive on the withholding tax, we believe that it is fundamentally flawed. In particular, it would be very damaging to the Eurobond industry. The British Eurobond market has earnings of £5 billion a year and employs nearly 11,000 people. Clearly the withholding tax, as presently proposed, is unacceptable.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Byers: No. I want to finish that point.

The Chancellor has made it clear today that exchange of information between banks and tax authorities is a much better solution. We would not accept the directive in its present form, which includes Eurobonds.

The Chancellor has made that clear in Brussels today. If the draft directive is not changed from its present form, we will use our veto to block it.

Mr. Loughton rose—

Mr. Malcolm Bruce rose—

Mr. Byers: I shall give way first to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton).

Mr. Loughton: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. On that specific point, will he therefore say why Jacques Santer said only last week that the code of conduct meant that Britain could not veto measures such as the withholding tax? Will he also condemn out of hand those members of the European Commission who have been talking about harmful tax competition? When does the right hon. Gentleman think that tax competition is harmful to the interests of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Byers: The position is very clear, as far as the Government are concerned. Legally, the withholding tax is a matter that would have to be decided on the basis of all member states agreeing. Therefore, we have made our position clear and I am happy to confirm it: if the draft directive on the withholding tax remains in its present form, we will veto that directive.

Mr. Bruce rose—

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) rose—

Mr. Byers: I want to make progress. My speech has been longer than I intended.

The Government's approach to Europe is clear. It is far better to be there, shaping and engaging in the debate, than sitting powerless on the sidelines. The issues for Europe are jobs and economic prosperity.

Mr. Bruce: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Byers: I will give way, for the final time.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. On the point about jobs and economic prosperity, does he agree—given that the Government are, in principle, in favour of joining the single currency—that the stability pact should allow for flexibility on borrowing for capital purposes in accordance with the established fiscal rules? Does he agree that that would be a beneficial objective—for Europe as a whole and especially for the United Kingdom, given our low borrowing levels?

Mr. Byers: There are issues that need to be addressed in Europe, and we believe that jobs and economic prosperity are the key issues.

In respect of harmful tax practices and tax havens, it is right that Europe should deal with those, but tax—

Mr. Burnett rose—

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) rose—

Mr. Byers: I shall not give way; I want to make progress.

I want to make it clear that tax harmonisation is not the way forward. We must deal with harmful tax practices and tax havens.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Byers: I will not give way at this stage. Businesses throughout the European Union do not want it—as is shown by a report produced by the European employers federation—and we share their view.

Our agenda for modernisation and reform applies not just to the United Kingdom, but to Europe. For Europe, as for the United Kingdom, there can be no turning the clock back.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the Chief Secretary give way?

Mr. Byers: No, I will not.

The shadow Chancellor, as we know, is the man who signed the Maastricht treaty. He is now the man who likes to say no. He says no to the new deal for the young unemployed; 160,000 have entered that scheme, and 30,000 have now found work. He says no to the working families tax credit, which will make work pay for up to 1.5 million of our fellow citizens. He says no to the national minimum wage, which will benefit nearly 2 million people from April.

We need not only listen to the shadow Chancellor. In the early 1990s, the right hon. Gentleman was Financial Secretary to the Treasury. He did not just sign the Maastricht treaty; he did other things as well. During his period in office, interest rates never fell below 10 per cent., and reached 15 per cent. The public sector deficit was rising to £50 billion. This is the shadow Chancellor's record as Financial Secretary: unemployment rose by 1 million, manufacturing output fell by 7 per cent., and inflation rose to nearly 10 per cent.

We are not going back to those bad old Tory days. The Queen's Speech looks to the future; the Tories are stuck in the past. This Government's priority is fairness for all our people; the Tories defend the privileges of the few. We will not be diverted from the real issues that affect the British people: jobs, the economy, crime, schools, hospitals and, yes, our relationship with Europe.

We have established an economic strategy to ensure that we can steer a course of stability in an uncertain and unstable world. Our programme reflects the needs of our people and their aspirations—for themselves, their families and their communities. Together, we can look forward with confidence to the years ahead.

4.52 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Our debates have focused on a Queen's Speech which should have shown us that the Government were getting up a head of steam for radical reform but which, in fact, has been celebrated more for what it does not contain than for what it contains.

Listening to what I suppose the Conservatives would describe as an attack, I wondered when we would receive an apology for the fact that they signed the Single European Act and the Maastricht treaty. They now denounce those actions, consider them to have been a fatal mistake, but have not yet admitted that they should not have done what they did. The truth is that this is a party that has made up its mind that it likes being in opposition and intends to stay there. It does not wish to deal with the question of how a country is to work in an expanding European Union in which it must advance its national interests in concert with other countries that are trying to do the same.

I commend the Chief Secretary's clear statement towards the end of his speech about tax and revenue co-ordination. As they stand, the treaties are unequivocal. It is no good quoting officials who may wish that they were different; they have been negotiated, and they are clear.

Many of us—many Liberal Democrats, certainly—who support the principle of British participation in the single currency, and support the idea of a single currency, believe that the corollary of a single bank setting a single interest rate is fiscal flexibility on the part of individual Governments, enabling such a system to be accommodated within their different national entities. It makes no difference what one member state says; we must all agree. The measure cannot be rammed through against our will. We retain that democratic right, and it is worth our saying as much to those who believe that we have given it up.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruce: Not at this stage.

Mr. Cash: It is at this stage that I wish to intervene.

Mr. Bruce: That is a good reason for me not to give way.

Let me deal with some of the measures that do feature in the Queen's Speech. My hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) will lead our party's scrutiny of the working families tax credit. He is generally accepted to be an expert on the subject, and I am sure that, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he will give us the benefit of further insight.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) will be following the progress of the Bill regulating the financial services. I shall not say much about the Bill, but, in principle, we have no difficulty in supporting its objective. The devil will, of course, be in the detail. I was interested by the Chief Secretary's suggestion that a joint scrutinising Committee should be set up before the presentation of the Bill: the idea has merit. The right hon. Gentleman also acknowledged that, in financial regulation, it is essential to get the balance right. The argument will centre on whether over-regulation will suppress creativity in the market, or whether under-regulation will damage consumer confidence—especially in a climate in which the Government have, in my party's view, ducked the expansion of the private sector into public-provision pensions. They will need to address that sooner rather than later.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way now?

Mr. Bruce: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman, who has only just come into the Chamber with the sole purpose of intervening.

At the risk of provoking the hon. Gentleman yet again, I want to talk about European issues and policies. I must tell the hon. Gentleman that he does not have a monopoly of interest in that subject, or the right to assume that he can automatically intervene every time it is mentioned, no matter how Pavlovian his reactions may be. I also want to talk about the new public service agreements.

The Liberal Democrats were disappointed, but not surprised, by the fact that the Gracious Speech contained no measures designed to pave the way towards joining a successful single currency. We have argued—we commend the proposal to the Government—for the publication of a six-monthly joint Treasury and Bank of England report on the extent to which our economy is converging with those of our continental partners. Such a report would not only inform but co-ordinate monetary and fiscal policy in the run-up to euro membership.

As I have said on a number of occasions, the Government seem to be saying, "In principle, we see no objection to joining. The private spin is that we are very much in favour of joining, but we are waiting for things to settle down." I do not think that an undertaking of this importance can be secured on a wing and a prayer; it requires a strategy, and practical action. I would go further, and say that the Prime Minister and his senior Cabinet colleagues will have to come out of the closet.

I understand that, in his previous cloak-and-dagger incarnation, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry believed that the Government—who were all privately committed to British membership of a single currency at the earliest practical opportunity—should wait for public opinion, and the opinion polls, to come round to it. But if they wait, it simply will not happen. When the Murdoch press and its allies are in full cry—when they are organising the argument on one side, and there is nothing but silence from Downing street and the Treasury—are we surprised that the opinion polls are saying what they are saying? We need leadership, we need a timetable and we need a strategy. We cannot simply drift.

If we are to trade within the single currency—regardless of whether we join sooner rather than later—we must address the fact that, within the single market, we suffer from a pound and interest rates that are too high for our current trading competitiveness. Those who look at the trade-weighted value of the pound may think that it is only a little above the May 1997 level, but if they look at the real, effective sterling exchange rate, using the OECD index, they will see that it is some 8 per cent. higher than the May 1997 level, and 26 per cent. above that of May 1996. That takes account of differential rates of inflation. In other words, sterling is clearly over-valued, and, as a consequence, life will remain tough for exporters. That is not just my opinion. For example, a report by economists Goldman Sachs in this week's economic update—that company is not that far away from the Government, so I do not think that its views are greeted with total indifference at the Treasury—says that DM2.50 would be about the fair value; that is 30 pfennigs lower than the current rate. Okay, interest rates have come down a bit, but 6.75 per cent. is slightly more than double the 3.3 per cent. average in the euro zone; I hope that we agree about that. Even if hon. Members are totally committed to having nothing to do with British membership of the euro zone, that differential is a problem that we should at least try to address.

Even pre-Christmas, the retail side of the British economy looks a bit soft. Against that background, the Bank of England may cut interest rates by a further 0.25 per cent. next Thursday, but that still leaves a yawning gap. I am not tempting the Chief Secretary to intervene—indeed, I do not think that I will succeed—but even if there is a cut, I do not think that the Government can pop out of the woodwork on Friday and say, "There you go: the gap is narrowing." It is still huge.

Mr. Bercow: Can the hon. Gentleman offer a single historical example of a single currency zone that has been formed without either formal tax harmonisation, or increased transfer payments from the centre?

Mr. Bruce: Harmonisation is not necessary. For example, it does not occur in the United Kingdom and Ireland; it does not even occur in the United States. I accept that there is an argument about transfer payments, but such payments were not made on the creation of the UK when there was a huge movement of people. However, the fact that something has not happened is not a reason for not attempting it, but then the hon. Gentleman is a Conservative and I am a Liberal: I believe in radical change and he, presumably, does not. Of course I accept that there are difficulties, but, when 11 countries have embarked on an enterprise of this type, we should not assume that it cannot happen because it has not happened before.

If the Government's true position is that they are in favour of joining a single currency, they should make that clear because that would, in itself, help to bring about a degree of convergence and enable people to start to make the preparations that the Government are urging on them, without offering them any clear timetable. It is not realistic to expect businesses to spend millions of pounds—indeed, tens of millions—preparing for something that may not happen, let alone if they have no idea when it will happen.

Mr. Woolas rose—

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruce: No. I want to proceed because of the pressure on time.

In the meantime, because of current problems, and as part of our preparations for eventual membership of the single currency, there is a requirement on the Government to do something to take the pressure off the hard-pressed manufacturing, farming and tourism sectors. Manufacturing faces an almost certain recession in 1999; whatever the Treasury forecast may say, that seems highly likely.

There is a discrepancy between what the Government have been saying publicly about their European economic policy and what apparently is being said on the quiet in Brussels—and not in the House. I am talking about "The New European Way"—about which I intervened in the Chief Secretary's speech—which has been published in the name of the party that calls itself the European Socialists—which I suspect sends a shudder through new Labour—but which most of us know was written by Ed Balls, although its authorship is now disowned. It was certainly put into the pot with the Chancellor's blessing and support.

Because it is a Euro-report, it contains quite a lot of mumbo-jumbo which is open to interpretation, according to people's opinions, but it addresses two crucial issues: monetary openness and fiscal flexibility, and tax harmonisation. The Tory amendment is on the mark at least in one respect: we do require a clear Government statement on those issues to the House. I accept that the Chief Secretary has gone some way towards giving us that statement, which was genuinely helpful and timely, and I commend him for his clarity. On the whole, it was also about right. It is high time that the debate centred on what the law is, rather than what certain motivated journalists wish it were, or wish people to believe it to be.

The Chancellor appears to want a more open and accountable European central bank than that set out in the Maastricht treaty. I agree that that is sensible. That is one of the reasons why the sooner we get in and can bring some influence to bear, the better. That does not mean interfering in the decisions of the European central bank, or carrying out the megaphone monetary policy adopted by the newly elected politicians in Germany—I suspect that they will learn a thing or two in a fairly short time—but it is about arguing that the British model of central bank independence, which I know does not command total support in the House, has something to commend itself to the continental model. It would provide for operational independence, but would make the European central bank much more open and accountable to public scrutiny—not open enough for the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott), but I am sure that she would agree that such transparency would be better than that which it offers.

I do not expect the Tories to have a view on that. Indeed, I do not know when they will review their policy given that the shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has said that 2002 will be early enough for the Tories to make up their mind whether the Bank of England should stay independent. As has already been quoted, however, the shadow Chancellor has certainly said that either we should have complete political control, or the Bank should be completely independent. He has not made up his mind which, but he is wrong.

The Government have rightly been criticised for the shortness of the contracts that were given to the members of the Monetary Policy Committee. Even if it does not mean that they are less independent, it creates the wrong impression—that they can be reappointed by the same Government who appointed them in the first place. We would like that to be changed, but we need a proper balance between operational independence and public accountability.

If we could export that model to the continent, rather than take on its arrogant and somewhat bureaucratic mode, we might be doing a service to other member states, and the peoples of those member states, who feel that they have to have some input, without interfering in the way in which the European central bank works. That would increase public confidence in the belief that it would be a force for stability and low inflation, and would not compromise on the anti-inflationary drive. Some people imply that it would do the latter—usually those who do not support the idea of operational independence in the first place.

I get the slight feeling—a vibration—that the Government might like a little more fiscal flexibility, particularly with regard to borrowing for capital spending. At the moment, that is not allowed for in the stability pact, but there have been enough noises, both formally and informally, from British Government sources to suggest that the Government believe that it perhaps should be.

Alastair Campbell is on record—he is not officially a Government spokesman, but, by God, when he speaks, most people listen; I think Labour Members listen even more closely—as saying that the Government do not want any watering down of the fiscal rules. The question is: why do not the Government want any modification? Surely we should look at our model and suggest that that commends itself to the continent, and that our rule is more reasonable and more generous on the capital spending front. We should surely fight for maximum fiscal subsidiarity in Europe.

I am sometimes puzzled by the Chancellor, who makes some robust statements, echoed by the Chief Secretary today, about the need for fiscal independence, but who seems unwilling to use the very fiscal independence that he has to help to manage the economy in a way that would bring about convergence. At least he agrees that such independence should be retained.

Lloyds bank does not have any agreement regulating the borrowing of National Westminster bank; nor should it, even though one's intervention in the market affects the other. They just adjust their behaviour accordingly.

I am not suggesting that sanctions should not be imposed on countries with unsustainable debts. However, within a disciplined framework, there should be maximum flexibility, particularly for countries such as Britain that have a very low debt-to-GDP ratio. For countries whose ratio is either above or close to the limit, achieving such flexibility should be an incentive to reduce it and, in goods times, to try to get it below that limit. They could therefore achieve flexibility in a revised stability pact. I should have thought that that would commend itself to both sides of the House, as it is about allowing a more flexible approach to economic management.

It is essential that we have tax harmonisation. It is also true that our tax rates must be competitive internationally and not only in Europe. In many ways, tax competition is helpful and more appropriate than harmonisation. The Government have made it clear that they will retain the veto and use it; their intention is as clear and unequivocal as anyone could wish.

I certainly do not believe that we should be signing up to Euro-uniformity simply for the sake of it. It will have to have merit and benefits, and offer added value and added advantage. However, let us not go to the extreme that we are not prepared even to discuss it or to explore the possibility that there are tax anomalies that disadvantage us in the single market or in third markets. It really is unhelpful if, every time a sensible discussion of the matter is proposed, Euro-sceptics foam at the mouth and say, "There you go again—you're about to sell your country short." Surely we can examine whether there are ways in which we can co-operate while retaining our right not to accept imposed tax policies. If so, we must be prepared to say no.

The Government will introduce public service agreements, on which there will be an announcement sometime this month. My colleagues and I have a particular interest in such agreements, as we made a study of how one system operated in New Zealand, which demonstrated commendable aspects of performance delivery. However, I should tell Ministers that, when I spoke to politicians and civil servants in New Zealand, it was made absolutely clear to me that the system could not work without freedom of information legislation. They said that that was central to ensuring that the system operated in the open and that the public knew the basis of the agreements and bargains which had been struck.

Liberal Democrat Members should therefore like to know whether the new agreements will contain clear, concrete and measurable targets for improving public services. If so, has there been consultation on the targets? If so, what type of consultation was it? If not, will there be consultation? I believe that the matter should be open to wide consultation.

The fundamental question is why the agreements are with the Treasury. If the agreements are to be about public administration, should they not be with Parliament and the representatives of the people? What independent measures will monitor performance against contracts? How can we ensure that contracts between Ministers and civil servants are fair and equal rather than one-sided? They will have to be equal if civil servants are to fulfil the contracts honestly. What action will be taken to ensure that targets are met? In New Zealand, contracts contain an element of performance-related pay for chief executives. I feel that that should apply also to Ministers, so that the bargain is equal.

Those issues are real ones. The introduction of service agreements is a radical, very important step which could fundamentally change the way in which services are delivered in the United Kingdom. However, if they are to work, they will require openness, clear targeting, clear objectives and independent monitoring, so that everyone may know what was undertaken and of any changes.

Some of the Government's actions—some of which I have previously used as examples—would have been different if there had been agreements according to the necessary terms that I have outlined. The Prime Minister, for example, said that our priority is education, education, education. The reply should have been, "Fine; but specifically what will you do each year to deliver improvements in education? What contracts have been signed to deliver detailed action?" I say constructively—not negatively—that that type of public service agreement means something and is not mere sloganising.

Similarly, when waiting lists shot up, the Health Secretary announced on the "Today" programme that he was responsible for the rise because he had decided that he wanted to deal with accident and emergency priorities before reducing waiting lists. Regardless of whether that was the right decision, had he made a contract to deliver lower waiting lists, he would have had to admit publicly—and not after the event—that the contract had been changed, and there would have been a debate about it. Contracts seem to offer a genuine means of involving Parliament and the public in the delivery of policy. Such changes may be dangerous and uncomfortable for Government, but, if Ministers are serious about modernisation and openness in government, such radical thinking is required. I applaud the Government's initiative on agreements, but am unsure whether it will be as radical and farsighted as the Government claim.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) said in his opening speech in the debate on the Loyal Address that we would never have achieved the welfare state and the national health service if Lloyd George and Nye Bevan had been as timid in the second Sessions of their radical reforming Parliaments as the current Government have been. That observation may come back to haunt the Government. Nevertheless, the contents of the Queen's Speech are only part of the programme, and the Government may introduce other measures. I hope that the radical will to make progress has not disappeared entirely from the Government.

On a constituency and important personal note, I should like to add that, during this Session of Parliament, there will be elections to a Parliament for Scotland and an Assembly for Wales, which will have a fundamental impact on how the House is run and on how the United Kingdom develops. I say that as someone who believes that the United Kingdom has enormous strengths, from which we all draw and which greatly benefit us all. However, that benefit requires a recognition of the distinctive character of the component parts of the United Kingdom. There will have to be an English dimension to how things are done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. So that the House is aware of how we will conduct this debate, I should tell the hon. Gentleman that it is strictly on the economy, not on constitutional matters that could have been debated earlier.

Mr. Bruce: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I thought that the debate was on the Queen's Speech, but entirely accept that stricture from the Chair.

The economic relationships between the House and the new Parliament and Assembly will be crucial. I simply urge a recognition that, initially, there will be tensions that will have to be resolved.

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Gentleman be standing for the Scottish Parliament?

Mr. Bruce: That is irrelevant.

Perhaps you will help me on this, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There was a suggestion that, by next June, Scottish Members will have nothing to do in the House, which is why the Queen's Speech proposed no Scottish legislation. The fact is that 90 per cent. of the Bills in the Queen's Speech will apply to Scotland, and Scottish Members, who have been elected to the House, have a real interest in their progress. The House and the public should understand that point.

The Government have introduced reforms, not all of which they themselves fully understand. It will require some understanding, flexibility and tolerance if those reforms are to succeed. In that spirit of understanding and tolerance, I believe that what has been set in train will create a much stronger United Kingdom.

The House is debating Europe and Westminster, and I have just discussed Scotland. I believe that we shall require all those levels of government, and that we shall have to take appropriate decisions at the appropriate level. As a Scottish Member, I am delighted that there will be a Scottish Parliament. I am equally delighted that Scots will continue to play a full participating part in the United Kingdom Parliament. I also look forward to the day when the United Kingdom is a fully paid-up member of the European Union, rather than a part-time observer on the touchlines.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) concentrated much of his speech on the single currency. I am sure that he shares my belief that our main economic task in this Parliament is to prepare for entry into the single currency. However, preparation appears to be missing.

I have always thought that the move towards a single currency was too hurried and that a longer timetable would have been much more sensible; however, a decision has been made. We are fortunate to have my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his predecessor, two of the most able Chancellors in recent times, who have had a close identity of view on some of the most essential aspects of our future. Nevertheless, we have paid a high price for not joining the single currency at the outset. Only yesterday the merger between the Deutsche bank and the Bankers Trust resulted in the reduction of their involvement in the City of London. That was in part a consequence of our not having joined the single currency.

There has been a terrible catalogue of missed opportunities year after year and decade after decade. The Government's first economic decisions, which devolved some of their powers, should have made closer integration into Europe far more acceptable. Control over exchange rates went to the markets and control over interest rates to the Bank of England. Income tax—that great engine of Government finance—was circumscribed by Government promises before the election. All those changes should have been a precursor to our entry into economic and monetary union and the single currency. We may still be paying the price.

In the Financial Times yesterday, Sirkka Hämäläinen, one of the six executive board members of the European central bank, said:

> "Exactly where the eurozone's monetary system will concentrate, however, is impossible to forecast . . . It can concentrate on certain national central banks near large financial centres, or it could be centralised in the ECB."

That is a danger to us. I am quoting her not as authoritative, but as having some understanding of the matter.

In the 1950s, we missed taking the leadership of Europe, although it was offered to us on a plate. Then we missed taking our place as one of the three leading players and then we missed being the headquarters of the European central bank, instead of Frankfurt. Now, as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury said, we are even risking London's position as the overwhelmingly dominant financial centre of Europe. Only recently, we have lost the Bankers Trust, through a merger, and the entire German Government bond market to Frankfurt. That would never have happened had we joined European monetary union and the single currency at the outset.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman should clarify the issue. It was surprising that the German bond market came to London in the first place. It came because of technological advance here; innovation and technological advance in the German market has won it back. What we are discussing is far more important. Our financial market will be restrained in Europe if we are over-burdened and over-regulated, and we are under threat of that from Europe.

Mr. Sheldon: The German bond market did go back to Frankfurt, however—that is the top and bottom of it. Had we been closer to the European central bank, that might not have happened.

The most important issue relates to decisions that will be taken early next year. The most crucial decisions of any institution are taken at its commencement. Despite the high standing of our Chancellor, those decisions will be taken by the single currency adherents. The decisions will be theirs, although they may affect us.

What should we do? I believe that, without making the final decision of setting a date, we should state our firm intention of joining the single currency. That would have an enormous effect immediately. It would reduce interest rates and exchange rates would become more realistic. It would improve inward investment. It would also strengthen the position of the Chancellor. It would not be as good as being a member of the club, but it would represent a delayed but certain application and put us in a better position to argue our case. We do not seem to understand that there is a big battle ahead. Entry on our terms is not a foregone conclusion. We seem to lose sight of the work that is needed to meet not just our requirements for entry into the single currency, but our partners' requirements from us.

One of the biggest issues is the level of the pound at entry. It has to be negotiated and the negotiations will not be easy. The longer we delay, the longer the other countries will have settled down to their new arrangements making it more difficult for us to obtain the conditions that we want. The longer we delay, the more conditions we shall be expected to fulfil and the more difficult it will be to find an easy passage into the euro. How will we get the exchange rate that we really need? In what used to be considered normal times, the recent decline in our balance of payments would have resulted in an automatic decline in the level of the pound, but capital movements and other factors have helped to offset that.

With my interest in the manufacturing industry, I would wish a rate nearer the lower end of what is being suggested. The prospects for manufacturing industry have been deteriorating. The pre-Budget report predicts an increase of 0.25 per cent. this year. Next year, it should be in the range of minus 0.25 per cent. to plus 0.25 per cent. More recent estimates are even more pessimistic. One important component is the level of the pound. Considerable time lags are involved. Profits can be squeezed in the short term and customers may remain loyal for a while, but sooner or later time runs out and manufacturers have to raise their prices to stay in business and their customers look elsewhere. The pound has been too high for too long. On entry into the single currency, we shall need to fix a more realistic rate.

We all have our views on the right level for the pound. The desirable level seems to be somewhere between DM2.30 and DM2.70. As I said, I would want a level towards the lower end of that. Whatever is the right rate for us, how will we be in a position to negotiate the rate we want when we are seen as Johnny-come-lately—only wanting to join when the success of the union is assured? The others have taken a risk. We are waiting to see whether it is successful and only then shall we say, "Yes, it is a good club. You have done all the hard work and made it work well. Now we are going to give you the privilege of having us join you." That does not appear to be a good negotiating stance. We should not be surprised if the others resent our attitude. The danger for us is that that resentment could lead to economic disadvantages for us. In particular, it could limit the range of the value of the pound at which we may wish to enter.

We keep saying that, once we are members of the new club, we will be able to use our veto more effectively. Threatening to use the veto even before we enter is unlikely to make the rest of the EU anxious to have us in. We need to consider much more closely the costs of delay in joining the single currency and the need to take decisions that will improve our prospects on entry.

I should like to say a little about the Monetary Policy Committee. It has only one goal—controlling the level of inflation. Only after that goal has been met can it consider the other factors of economic management, such as growth and investment. It would be better if we learned the lesson of the United States Federal Reserve. Alan Greenspan considers the level of inflation in determining his monetary policy stance, but he also takes the economy into account. His remarkable success might have given us second thoughts on how the more limiting criteria that the Monetary Policy Committee has to observe might be broadened, at least up to the level of those of the United States Federal Reserve.

An amendment was tabled to the Bank of England Bill in another place that would have required the Monetary Policy Committee to take wider issues into account. Perhaps we should return to that. In the meantime, we can consider broadening the committee. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor cannot be expected to pack the committee with representatives of every interest group. However, he can get a better mix. Now that we have some experience, perhaps those wider considerations might be taken into account when a vacancy arises.

My final point is on the cost of earning a living. There was a time when everybody lived near to his place of work, be it the mill, the engineering factory or the pit. People's clothes were working clothes and everybody knew what working clothes were. They all took a jam butty, or whatever, and had no travel expenses because they walked to work.

Now, the cost of earning a living is very large and growing. In almost all walks of life, people have to spend a bit of money on their clothes. They certainly have to have something better for their meals. Most importantly, they have to travel. We do not have the London weighting allowance in the north-west—we have to pay for our transport. It is expensive and the distances covered are becoming greater. I know people from Ashton-under-Lyne who work in Bradford or Eccles. It is quite common for people in all parts of the country to travel 20 or 30 miles to work—distances that used to be the prerogative of London. That has to be paid for out of taxed income. Those costs are wholly, exclusively and necessarily incurred, whatever the Inland Revenue may say, because people cannot earn a living otherwise. However, the costs are not deductible.

I sympathise with the difficulty that the Inland Revenue would have in trying to control such enormous expenditure. It would have to ask questions of every taxpayer. However, it is a manifest injustice that people spend so much of their after-tax income on the essential task of getting to work.

There used to be an earned income allowance. I supported such an allowance and regret its passing. In the early years of this century, the justification for it was that unearned income from dividends or interest was more secure and did not have the vagaries of employment or other forms of income, so it could be taxed more highly. That argument diminished as savings became more widespread. However, the costs of earning a living have increased greatly. I know that there is little enthusiasm for income tax changes, but when such changes become respectable again—when income tax becomes a more acceptable form of taxation than I fear it has been recently—that anomaly will have to be looked at.

As I said at the outset, the prime economic task of the Government is to prepare for entry to the single currency. I should like there to be a programme that set that out as our highest economic priority.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle): It is always a particular pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) in an economic debate. We have debated the economy across the Floor of the House for many years and I have a high regard for him. When he was a Treasury Minister, he had a magnificent record in trying to restore fiscal prudence to a Labour Government when fiscal matters had got out of control. He will not be surprised to hear that I did not agree with the main thrust of his speech about Europe, but I certainly agreed with his remarks about Mr. Greenspan and the fact that the United States Federal Reserve does not take a narrow view about inflation, but takes a wider view that embraces growth, employment and other social factors.

I welcome the Chief Secretary's carefully worded statement, giving the most categorical assurance to the House and the nation that the Labour Government will veto any attempt by the European Union to impose tax harmonisation on this country. I am sure that he will have the almost unanimous support of Conservative Members in honouring that pledge. However, history has proved that Ministers who give such assurances in all good faith can find it more difficult than they had supposed to fulfil their undertakings.

While the Chief Secretary was speaking, I was handed a piece of paper from the Press Association tape from Brussels, reporting events of only a few hours ago. It said:

"German Finance Minister Oskar Lafontaine today called for majority voting on tax harmonisation in Europe—removing Britain's veto."

Mr. Lafontaine is quoted as saying:

"The principle of unanimity must be broken."

I am sure that that sounds even more impressive in German.

Mr. Byers: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that that was a personal statement by Mr. Lafontaine, rather than a statement on behalf of the German Government?

Sir Peter Tapsell: Yes, Mr. Lafontaine said that. However, when Finance Ministers say, "This is a personal statement and that is a Government statement," I become somewhat anxious. I hope that the Chief Secretary's statement to the House about tax harmonisation was a Government statement rather than a personal one. I am reminded of Harold Wilson's habit, when he had made some great announcement to the country on television or elsewhere, of saying, "This is not just a pledge; it is a promise." Sometimes, he would say, "This is not just a promise; it is a pledge."

I hope that Ministers here and in Europe will not become too schizophrenic and will not think that some public statements can be passed off as just a personal point of view while others count as ministerial statements. All the Finance Ministers of Europe are meeting today. It is such a crucial meeting that our Chancellor feels that it is more important to attend that meeting than the economic debate on the Queen's Speech. In all my years in the House, I cannot remember a Chancellor not being present at this debate. This is the day that the Finance Minister of Germany—the most powerful economy in Europe—has chosen to say that the principle of unanimity on harmonisation of taxation must be broken. Ministers should take that statement seriously.

The Gracious Speech says:

"My Government believe the historic decision to give the Bank of England the power to set interest rates has been crucial to the meeting of its inflation target and credibility in the system."

I hope that it will not sound ungracious if I point out that inflation today is approximately the same rate that the Government inherited from their predecessors and that the credibility of the Bank of England's inflation forecasting machinery has never been lower. It has been difficult in recent months to meet, anywhere in the country, any industrialist of experience—certainly anyone who has worked in the exporting industries—who believes that the Bank of England has been getting its monetary policy right.

The Chancellor is clearly anxious about his hasty and furtive decision to give independence to the Bank of England a few days after the general election and to abandon his ministerial responsibility for monetary policy. That was not in the Labour party's manifesto and it was not agreed with the then shadow Cabinet before the general election. We are told that it was not even put to the full Cabinet for discussion before the announcement.

As I have said in the House before, that decision was one of the most important that the Government have taken; I believe that it will prove to be an albatross around their neck and the neck of the nation for many years to come. The whole project was very much the Chancellor's baby, which is why he keeps saying that it has been a huge success. As its unwisdom becomes ever more evident, we must not forget that he is the man to blame.

[Sir Peter Tapsell]

Lord Healey has pointed out, in his usual frank and genial way, that

"an independent Central Bank is a gimmick to be used as an apologia by failed Chancellors to shuffle off their failures on to the Bank of England."

He speaks with some authority on these matters. The failure of the experiment has already become evident and the shuffling off has already begun. As soon as it became evident to everyone that the Bank of England had pushed up interest rates too far, Ministers scurried around briefing everyone, on and off the record, saying that they favoured a cut in interest rates. By then, however, the damage had been done.

For a year, the academic economists—none of whom has had much experience in industry or any form of business—have been fighting the battle on the wrong front, looking over their shoulders at past inflationary problems rather than forward to the darkening skies of what will almost certainly be the most serious world recession since the war.

Six increases in the bank rate—making our interest rates the highest in the developed world—produced a seriously over-valued pound for a prolonged period. The speculators were happy to take the enhanced income that was offered to them, but the price was paid by our export manufacturers and farmers, for whom this monetary mismanagement has been a disaster.

The Bank of England and those on the Treasury Bench cannot accuse their critics of being wise after the event. For more than a year, some of us have been warning the Chancellor that 1999 would be a year not of inflation but of recession, or worse. On each occasion I have put that point to the Chancellor in the House—when one can catch him here on one of his flying visits from Europe—he has invariably dismissed it with his usual cocky bombast. He has uttered the meaningless slogan that he had no intention of pursuing a policy of boom and bust—as though anyone had asked him to do so. Now the penny has finally dropped, even for him. Boom is no longer on the British economic agenda, even as a slogan, but bust most certainly may be.

The academic economists have now cut interest rates and will doubtless cut them again, if not on their own initiative at least every time that Mr. Greenspan gives them the lead. The damage has already been done, however. There is always a time lag before changes in monetary policy are felt throughout an economy—it may be 12 or 15 months or longer. The damage caused by the Government's mistaken monetary policy—they cannot shuffle off the ultimate responsibility, certainly not in the eyes of the electorate—will be felt for a long time. Some exporters and farmers will never recover, but will be forced out of business.

The decision to give independence to the Bank of England has been a disastrous failure so far. The Chancellor is looking more and more like Philip Snowden and less and less like Maynard Keynes. As hon. Members from both sides of the House have pointed out in the past 18 months, if one puts a central bank in sole charge of monetary policy and gives it a target for inflation but not for growth or employment, one is bound to end up with an excessively tight monetary policy and rising unemployment.

That is exactly what happened in continental Europe, which was the main reason why Chancellor Kohl lost the German election on 27 September and why President Chirac lost his conservative parliamentary majority in the French Assembly. Mr. Lafontaine, the new German Finance Minister, seems to understand that well. In recent years, the record of the previous German and French Governments, whether of the left or of the right, has been disgraceful in the crucial matter of employment.

At a conference in Berlin at the beginning of the year, I pointed that out in a private conversation with a senior Minister in the previous German Government. I asked him whether he was concerned that unemployment in Germany was approaching the level that brought Hitler to power. He replied, "The situation today is quite different. Our social benefits are now so good that many Germans, particularly in the east, are better off out of work than in work and many of them don't want to work anyhow." No doubt that reply was realistic, but it represents a lamentable way to run an economy. That approach will eventually produce a lack of international competitiveness, which will be a threat to the welfare budget as well as to employment.

That is exactly what is likely to happen when fiscal and monetary policies are separated. Governments run an even laxer fiscal policy to cope with social discontent and the independent central bank tightens monetary policy to offset the lax fiscal policy. One ends up simultaneously with a monetary policy that is too tight and a fiscal policy that is too loose. That is the almost inevitable consequence of putting responsibility for the control of those two levers of economic management in different hands. The result is bound to be higher unemployment than is necessary to maintain a reasonably stable currency.

As Aneurin Bevan was fond of saying, "You do not have to look into the crystal ball when you can read the book." Turn to almost any page of that book in recent years and the writing is clear—it is set out in capital letters. In the 1980s, the United States Administration ran a lax fiscal policy, the Fed responded by running a tight monetary policy and American unemployment soared. In Germany, in the 1990s, the German Government ran a lax fiscal policy, the Bundesbank responded with a tight monetary policy and unemployment soared. In Britain, while we were members of the exchange rate mechanism, we followed the same policy mix, with the same dismal result.

In opposition, one of the most intellectually attractive aspects of new Labour thinking was that it appeared to have grasped the message that there must be a close correlation between monetary and fiscal policy. As soon as the new Chancellor, on his fourth day in office, announced that he was abandoning his personal responsibility for the difficult and politically burdensome task of fixing interest rates—a vital decision, which he had hidden from the electorate and, apparently, from most of his colleagues throughout the election campaign—I realised that the self-proclaimed iron Chancellor was clad in tin. So it has proved. After one year of boasting about his fiscal prudence, and as the Bank of England pushed interest rates higher, the right hon. Gentleman suddenly announced a popular and much looser fiscal policy and increased expenditure substantially over previous levels on assumptions about future growth that no one but he thinks are attainable. New Labour had transformed itself into the new Bourbons.

Mr. Lafontaine is a highly intelligent, outspoken man, full of interesting ideas. He is clearly destined to be a left-wing Newt Gingrich in Europe in the years to come, which will be tremendous fun. For all our sakes, we must wish him well, not least because of his declared intention to run our economy and tax system as well as his own. However much he may favour his general approach to Europe, our Chancellor is already jealous of Mr. Lafontaine because he is a real intellectual as well as being a real socialist. When I first entered the House, there were many people like that around and I rather miss them, so at this stage I feel well disposed towards Mr. Lafontaine, so long as he confines his activities to a purely German context. He clearly agrees with me about central banks, and he has made it clear that the lack of democratic accountability of the European central bank is unacceptable and that it must have obligations about employment and growth as well as inflation.

I seem to remember some of us—including, dare I say, my honoured Whip, my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Cran), who is sitting on the Opposition Front Bench—pointing that out during debates on the Maastricht treaty and being much scorned by those on the Labour Front Bench for doing so. Of course, Mr. Lafontaine's suggestions for clipping the wings of central banks have produced howls of protest from bank governors everywhere. I cannot recall an occasion on which there has been such unanimity between governors. When they attend International Monetary Fund meetings in Washington every September, they are usually at each other's throats.

Mr. Lafontaine is also right to put the reduction in unemployment in Germany and Europe as his top priority. The political class in the European Community has shamefully betrayed its people on that issue for too long. At last, we seem to have a European Finance Minister who is determined to reverse the process, and all power to his elbow. Unfortunately, and this is where Britain must be careful, he seems so far to be less preoccupied with reducing supply-side rigidities in Germany and Europe than with emphasising the social chapter aspects of economic policy as his method of reducing unemployment. That would be a serious error if it were continued—an error into which the British Government are already falling. Like Britain, Europe needs—particularly if the world is heading for a deep recession, as I believe it is—flexible labour markets, enhanced skills and the encouragement of entrepreneurship to maintain competitiveness.

Attractive though they may superficially appear, shorter working hours, minimum wages, longer statutory holidays and extra social provisions are ultimately a direct threat to high levels of employment, as Germany and France have been demonstrating for some time. It is bad news for Britain that Labour seems to be going down that road and throwing away the benefits of some of our opt-outs from the Maastricht treaty.

Finally, contrary to what many hon. Members may expect, if there has to be a single European currency, I hope that it will be a success. It is in everyone's interests that it should be. A Europe in economic, social and political chaos would be bad for Britain. The fact that the single currency was a success in the continental sense would not be a reason for Britain joining it—but I will not develop my reasons for that now, as it would take too long and I hope to say something on the subject on a future occasion.

The nightmare scenario for the euro will be one of Governments pursuing lax fiscal policies while the European central bank counterbalances them by a tight monetary policy. However, that seems to be the most likely prospect for 1999 in our part of the world as those all around us move towards recession and, perhaps, to slump.

5.57 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (North Durham): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell), who always speaks with great style and brio. Indeed, he made a much better speech, or certainly a much more thoughtful speech, than the shadow Chancellor.

Dr. George Turner: Not very difficult.

Mr. Radice: Being a naturally polite person, I would not put it like that, but I congratulate the hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle on his speech although I do not agree with some of his views, as he knows. However, I agree that this Queen's Speech takes place against an uncertain world economic situation after the events in the far east and Russia, although it is perhaps slightly less uncertain than it was a month ago, thanks to decisive action by the Federal Reserve. In his praise for the Federal Reserve, I agree with the hon. Gentleman.

The world economic situation creates difficult problems for all western policy makers, but it is a particular problem for the United Kingdom given the fact that we were already deliberately slowing down our economy because of the dangers of overheating when we first came to power. The trick is to continue that slowdown without tipping over into recession.

The Opposition charge is that the pre-Budget report is far too optimistic in its forecasts and has left a black hole in public finances. No serious commentator agrees with the black hole argument; forecasts are always slightly suspect because no one knows the future, although I note that the Bank of England forecast is almost the same as that of the Government. Also, the Monetary Policy Committee has cut interest rates, for which it is to be congratulated. Incidentally, a distinction must be drawn between the Bank of England and the European central bank, in that the former has an inflation target and, if there is a danger of undershooting the target, the MPC is obliged to cut rates. That provides some defence against a recession, which I do not think that the hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle acknowledged.

It would be absurd for the Government to start to cut public spending on the flimsy ground that they got their forecast wrong. No responsible Government would do that. It is precisely when the dangers of recession are evident that public spending should not be cut. On the contrary, the automatic stabilisers must be allowed to work. The Government are following a sensible policy. With luck and good judgment, we will manage to avoid a recession in this country.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), with whose speech I concurred almost completely, that the big economic event—only a month away—is the coming of the euro. The euro is enormously important not only for the 11 members who are joining in the first wave but for the United Kingdom, which is staying out for the time being. We may have decided not to join the euro for the moment, but there is no way in which we can keep the euro out of the UK. That is the reality. It is bound to impact, one way or another, on the value of sterling. So far, sterling may have benefited from being used as a hedge against volatility in the euro, but if—as many people, including the Governor of the Bank of England, believe—the euro proves to be a strong and stable currency, sterling may experience a bumpy ride, going down as well as up. We do not know what will happen to the pound, but it could well be volatile.

There is also the impact on business. The Government are right to stress the need for preparation. Earlier this year, the Treasury Select Committee held hearings on the preparations for economic and monetary union. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Ms Kelly), before she was translated into a Parliamentary Private Secretary, was there. Leading British firms such as ICI, British Steel and Vauxhall told us how they would be using the euro widely and expected their suppliers to do likewise. As Dr. Sykes of ICI told us,

"Euro liquidity will naturally spread throughout the economy".

That will happen whether people like or not.

Of course, there will be a major impact on the City. As I learned from the Bank of England's third euro symposium at the end of October, the City believes that it is ready for the coming of the euro. It expects to become the "international financial centre for the euro".

The euro is that important for us.

I strongly support the Government's changeover plan, which will be published in the new year and will set out for business the steps that need to be taken to prepare for entry when we decide. The Government's policy of prepare and decide is a vast improvement on the wait and see of the Tory Government, let alone the 10-year delay of the Tory Opposition. The question is whether the Government's policy goes far enough.

Business leaders have told me and others that, although they much appreciate what the Government are doing, and although some are prepared to go ahead on the basis of risk, they would much prefer, and would welcome, a clearer sign than the Government have given so far that they will decide to join the euro once economic convergence is achieved.

Ms Abbott: Does my hon. Friend think that the Government's timidity about going into economic and monetary union is based on a technical objection, or on being terrified of the Murdoch press?

Mr. Radice: I think that the five conditions are very important, but it is also clear that the Government are realistic: they have to win a referendum. They must be certain, or pretty certain, before they call it that they will win it. That is only common prudence, because it would be a disaster not only for the Government but for the country if it were lost.

At the beginning of last week, more than 100 business leaders, from firms whose turnover represents more than a quarter of gross domestic product, signed a statement in the Financial Times. They concluded:

"Britain's best economic interest is likely to involve joining soon after EMU is established, and the best policy for Britain is one based on the assumption that we will join".

Since then, a further 150 business leaders have signed the statement.

On Monday, the officers and members of the advisory committee of the European Movement—including the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor)—the all-party group that was founded by Winston Churchill, of which I have the honour to be chairman, published a letter in The Independent. Its concluding paragraph stated:

"The best course for our country is to prepare now to be able to join EMU when the economics are right. The government's policy of commitment in principle to UK entry is welcome. We now need an unequivocal statement by the government of its intention to join EMU as soon as proper convergence of our economic cycles is achieved, matched by an assurance that pursuing such convergence will be a key element of domestic policy in coming years."

We are not asking for a specific date but, like my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne, we ask the Government to move from if to when.

In the concluding part of my speech, I want to comment on tax, because we have heard some extraordinary scare stories on it in the British press, and an echo of them from the shadow Chancellor this afternoon. To believe what we read in the Daily Mail, The Daily Telegraph or The Sun, we would have to believe that the British will have to put up their income tax at the behest of Brussels, that the UK is forced to put VAT on children's clothes, food and newsprint and that it is forced to adopt German rates of corporation tax. I need not bother to comment on the income tax scare, because no evidence whatsoever has been produced for that.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for inviting evidence on the fact that income tax would have to go up. Is he aware of the publication "UK Economic Prospects", printed last December by Oxford Economic Forecasting, based on a well-known economic model? It said that income tax would have to rise if we entered the single currency.

Mr. Radice: That is a prediction by a forecasting body, and good luck to it. It is not a firm proposal from Brussels or anyone else.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Radice: No. The hon. Gentleman has not been sitting in the body of the kirk and he came in late. On that basis, I am not prepared to give way to him.

It is worth commenting on The Sun story on VAT, which was a collector's item, because newspapers should not be allowed to get away with barefaced lies. I realised that even The Sun knew that it was treading on thin ice when its political editor, Mr. Trevor Kavanagh, was sent to make the rounds of the television studios last night. If the going gets rough, "Send Kavanagh" seems to be the newspaper's line. Its headline yesterday was "Euro tax on kids' clothes—We reveal secret VAT stitch up." It said:

"The tax grab plan was signed and sealed behind closed doors at the 1996 EU summit in Dublin . . . and Britain must agree if we join the single currency. The scheme is spelled out in EC document (96)328. The Sun has seen a copy."

So have I.

It is hardly surprising that The Sun has seen a copy, because the so-called "secret" VAT document was a Commission White Paper published in 1996. Perhaps it was not brought to Mr. Kavanagh's attention then. Obviously no one told him that the proposals in the document were not accepted by the Council of the European Union.

What The Sun did not say is that there are no EU proposals to get rid of zero-rating of VAT. That was confirmed on Radio 4 three days ago by Mario Monti, the Commissioner in charge of taxation. If there were any such proposals, they would have to be agreed unanimously by all member states. The United Kingdom is not alone in that respect: there are six other countries with zero-rating—Belgium, Denmark, Ireland, Italy, Finland and Sweden. Therefore, it is extremely unlikely that there will be any agreement to get rid of zero-rating. Certainly, that issue has nothing to do with the single currency or with UK entry into the single currency.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bercow: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Radice: I shall give way, for the last time, to the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack).

Mr. Jack: Given the hon. Gentleman's anger about Mr. Kavanagh's misreporting, does he propose, as Chairman of the Select Committee on the Treasury, to invite that journalist to give evidence to his Committee and to explain that misreporting, so that we may all understand a little better how The Sun operates?

Mr. Radice: I think that The Sun has had quite enough publicity for that barefaced lie, so I certainly shall not do as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

It is absolutely true that Oskar Lafontaine, who has been so heralded by the hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle—never was a socialist so praised by a Conservative; normally one has to be dead to be praised, but apparently in this case one has to be German and a Keynesian—has said that he thinks that there should be a minimum rate of corporation tax. However, that is not yet a proposal of his own Government. I can state quite categorically that there is no question of Britain adopting German rates of corporation tax. Any proposal would have to be agreed unanimously and seven member states—not just Britain—have low corporation tax regimes, so it is hardly likely that those seven countries would agree to put up their corporation tax to German levels.

A code of conduct for business taxation was signed last December, a fact not commented on by those who criticised it—[Interruption.] Well, one person may have mentioned it, but no one else has. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary chairs the group on the subject, which will be reporting soon. The so-called tax harmonisation scare has little to do with the single currency, but everything to do with the single market, which emerged from the Single European Act. The Conservative party introduced that legislation and the vast majority of Euro-sceptics voted for it, so let us not hear too many complaints from them when those issues are raised.

The United States model is of one country with a single currency but many tax rates, especially business tax rates. I welcome the Government's statement on taxes today. If there is tax harmonisation over the next 20, 30 or 40 years, it will happen because all countries, including the United Kingdom, want it. I predict that any harmonisation will be downwards, not upwards. That is why the comments that we have heard this evening are so misplaced. I shall vote for the Queen's Speech with especial confidence tonight, because of the Government's sensible policies on the economy and on Europe.

Sir Raymond Whitney (Wycombe): I am sure that the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) will not be surprised to learn that the passages of his speech with which I had the most difficulty were those dealing with the domestic economy. He suggested that the statistics on the likely growth rate of the economy over the next few years are flimsy and should therefore be disregarded.

Mr. Radice: I did not say that.

Sir Raymond Whitney: If I have misrepresented the hon. Gentleman, I beg his pardon. I understood him to say that the statistics were flimsy.

Mr. Radice: I said that all forecasts are just that—forecasts. We cannot foretell the future.

Sir Raymond Whitney: We certainly agree that forecasts are forecasts and that we have to handle them carefully, but we also have to govern the economy and I would suggest that the way not to govern the economy is to rely on the forecasts put forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. Member for North Durham also referred to spending and I understood him to say that he wants even more spending—again, I hope that I do not misrepresent him—although he is happy with the Chancellor's spending proposals. It seems to me that the spirit of Keynesianism is alive and well on the Labour Benches, although my hon. Friend the Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell) might have something to say about that.

I am sorry that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is unable to be here and I endorse the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Louth and Horncastle that the right hon. Gentleman's absence is quite extraordinary. In my experience, which is rather shorter than my hon. Friend's, it is a unique omission that we do not have the benefit of the Chancellor's presence. Because the economy is at such a delicate and important juncture, it is crucial that the Chancellor should come to the nation and, indeed, the House, tell us what is going wrong, and give his explanation for it.

Preparing for the debate, I did a little research into the years running up to the election in May last year, and what a different song the gentleman who is now the Chancellor of the Exchequer sang then. In one famous—even notorious—speech, we were told about new ideas and the "new economic approach" to be vouchsafed to us. He spoke about "the growth of post-neo-classical endogenous growth theory and the symbiotic relationships between growth and investment in people and infrastructure".

[Sir Raymond Whitney]

We were promised

"a new understanding of how labour markets really work", and he referred to

"a new agenda for the future".

That future has now arrived and it is a fairly worrying state of affairs. The Conservatives' legacy has been squandered. I know how sensitive Labour Members are to reminders of that economic legacy, but it is important that they should be reminded regularly of it. They inherited the longest period of low inflation for 50 years and faster growth and lower unemployment than any other economy in western Europe, but the forecast for next year is that we shall be at the bottom of the growth cycle.

The Government's forgetfulness of the realities of 1 to 2 May 1997 was echoed today by the Chief Secretary, as it was in the Gracious Speech, when we heard that the Government had "reduced . . . borrowing by £20 billion in its first year".

What do they think happened on 2 May 1997? Do they think that a bonanza occurred, that a tree covered with lollipops and bananas was suddenly produced and down fell borrowing? That £20 billion reduction reflects the success of the economy and the legacy from the previous Government that the present Government constantly deride. That is the reason why Treasury receipts are riding so high and how that £20 billion reduction in Government borrowing, about which we have heard time and again, was achieved. I hope that all Ministers will be prepared to recognise that reality in future.

The growth forecasts are a serious embarrassment, even to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who as we all know does not embarrass easily. Nevertheless, he still insists that growth, which will clearly be less than 1 per cent. next year, will somehow and miraculously have risen to—I must get it right, as I do not want to do the right hon. Gentleman an injustice—2.25 per cent. in 2000. As one leading international bank said, that forecast is "hopelessly optimistic". Not even the Prime Minister believes that forecast—as he demonstrated in his speech at the Lord Mayor's banquet and, it is reported, in his speech to the parliamentary Labour party.

It becomes increasingly clear that the Government's promises—about which we hear daily—about the growth in public sector spending over the Parliament cannot be met. The Government allege that growth will continue at 2.75 per cent., year on year, throughout the Parliament. As my right hon. and hon. Friends have pointed out, something has to give. It will mean either higher taxation or massive inflation, and that is the real challenge facing the Government. It is bad news for the economy, particularly when we are facing turbulence, which is an international phenomenon.

One of the tragedies of this Government's record is that £37 billion of that increased spending—almost as much as the combined increase in the health and education budgets—will be allocated to social services. Meanwhile, the pressures on industry and the manufacturing and commercial sectors—which create the wealth on which the growth will be built—will increase as a result of the Government's actions. Increased taxation and the so-called "fairness at work" legislation will create further pressures. We all want fairness at work, but we know from bitter experience that trade union powers can be easily misused. Ensuring the rights of one worker may mean putting another out of a job. Industry is facing that and other existing pressures.

The pressures on individuals have been well documented. Most notable is the damage that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has done to pensions. I believe that the penny has yet to drop with the British public. When it does, it will have a serious political impact—as it should. It is particularly ironic that that attack on pensions and thrift has occurred at a time when Ministers are stressing the importance of personal private pensions. The lacuna in the Gracious Speech is what the Government plan to do about personal pensions. There was very little information about that in the Gracious Speech, and none at all in Ministers' speeches during the series of debates about it.

I take no pleasure in offering this gloomy perspective of the state of the economy, but it is undoubtedly true. Even more alarming is the bigoted complacency of the Government—most notably, of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Receiverships and bankruptcies are increasing and the recession is in prospect. Barclays bank's latest briefing states:

"Forward-looking survey data are pointing to a deep recession".

During the Queen's Speech debates, the Government have offered no solutions and demonstrated the emptiness and vacuity of new Labour and the third way, about which we know nothing. The theories that the Chancellor of the Exchequer offered before the election—his endogenous theories to which I referred—have been shown to be empty and naive offerings. The Chancellor must come to the House and acknowledge and accept the reality facing us in the coming year.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I expected the hon. Member for Wycombe (Sir R. Whitney) to speak about the euro, and hon. Members probably expect me to refer to that subject. However, like the hon. Gentleman, I will not. I have been mildly surprised by, and taken some pleasure in, the four speeches—including that of the Chief Secretary and those from the Labour and Liberal Benches—about the euro in this debate. The European movement is clearly in a bit of a panic.

It has been a bad week for euro enthusiasts. I know that because they have come to this place and co-ordinated or harmonised—I hate to say "orchestrated", as I am sure that that is too strong a word—their views. That is what we have heard today. I do not need to say anything about the euro because panic has clearly set in. I await with interest further debates about the veto, which will no doubt occur after the Chief Secretary has been liberal with Britain's use of it. I shall wait and see what happens.

I intend to speak about the Gracious Speech and the Government's reiteration of their commitment to an economic orthodoxy that prevailed for much of the 1980s and throughout the whole of the 1990s. That orthodoxy is now apparently summed up in one word. The word is stability and stability is the word. As I understand it, "stability" encapsulates three separate economic strands: price stability, balanced budgets and the oligarchy of the central bankers. Those three create a kind of economic trinity. So the word becomes three and the three become the word.

In his recent speech to the City, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is reported to have said—I only read the headlines these days—that stability is "sexy". As a Welsh Calvinist, I am not quite sure what he meant. However, I cannot help thinking that sex sometimes unleashes powerful forces that can make a mess of stability. So I am not sure whether the two always go together. To extend that analogy to the economy, there are powerful forces at work in the global economy and they are the antithesis of the powerful forces that begat the present economic orthodoxy.

The powerful forces that begat the economic trinity were the forces of inflation. However, the powerful forces that we see at work in the economy now are the forces of deflation. Therefore, the danger as I see it—nobody can foretell the future—is that stability and the present orthodoxy not only are unable to provide any bulwark against global deflation, but will give a fresh impetus to global deflation, driving prices even lower.

It is difficult to predict the future and to analyse the present. However, most people would agree that prices—not their general level, but the rate of inflation—are falling in most western countries. Farmers are getting less money for their produce. Hon. Members will be interested to learn that a newspaper states today that the price of hogs on the Chicago merchandise mart is at its lowest level in 27 years. The pig cycle is really loose in the land. I do not know about the economic cycle, about which Treasury Ministers talk. I do not know whether that lasts for seven years, 14 years or what. Clearly the pig or hog cycle is still with us.

The price of crude oil is now $10.30 a barrel, which is its lowest price for a long time. The prices of manufactured goods are falling in most western countries. In September, in euroland—the area encompassing the 11 countries that will join the single currency on 1 January—the retail price index or its equivalent was 1 per cent., so prices were rising generally by 1 per cent. In Germany, price inflation is close to zero, and in France, it is not much higher.

There is no need for me to go into detail about why there has been a fall in prices. Most hon. Members understand that global economic forces, the freedom of trade and capital and a lack of barriers have brought us back to a pre-1914 world where trade and capital move freely. The technological changes of the past 20 or 30 years have brought about a reduction in costs and greater efficiency and made it easier for other countries to compete with western nations. Enormous global competitive pressure, quite apart from macro-economic policy, is pushing prices down. To maintain their profit margins, larger companies increase their capacity. They produce more goods at the lower prices. We have an industrial hog cycle, as prices are driven down even further.

We tend to forget that the first country that suffered from all that—Japan—is the second most powerful in the world. That was some time ago. Whatever we think of price stability, Japan has plenty of it. I do not know whether the Japanese are enjoying it, but they do not need it. With the fall in prices in Japan came a fall in interest rates. I do not know whether interest rates automatically follow prices or whether the Japanese central bank reduces interest rates as a result of a fall in prices, but the two are connected. The bank rate of interest, or its equivalent, in Japan is now about 0.5 per cent. Low interest rates did not stop the fall in prices because there is now general deflation in Japan as price rises fall below zero.

The fall in interest rates had two consequences. First, it reduced banks' profits. Banks are certainly not popular on Government Benches and perhaps they are not popular in the country as a whole, but even banks have to make profits. If interest rates fall to 0.5 per cent., there is not much room for banks to make profits. No doubt, banks can charge more for cashing cheques or other services, but, in the main, bankers make their money by borrowing at one rate and lending at another. An interest rate of 0.5 per cent. did not give Japanese banks much of an opportunity to make profits, and that had an effect on the Japanese economy.

Secondly, and more importantly, low interest rates led to asset inflation. Retail prices may have fallen but being able to borrow at such low interest rates meant that the Japanese were able to purchase shares. More importantly in Japan, they were able to purchase more land and property. That asset boom eventually went bust, and the Japanese economy is still in a terrible state.

I shall deal now with the largest and most important economy in the world—that of the United States. We have heard in this debate and read in the newspapers what a wizard Dr. Alan Greenspan is. I am sure that he is, but let us, on these Government Benches, be radical for a change and dare to criticise him. I heard a sharp intake of breath from one of my hon. Friends, but I shall chance it.

Dr. Alan Greenspan, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, is not a happy bunny. I do not know whether one should call chairmen of central banks bunnies, but he is certainly not happy. For some time, I have detected panic in his pronouncements. Before the Russian crisis, Wall street was soaring to dizzy heights. Dr. Greenspan could do nothing. He went before Congress; he wrung his hands. Sometimes he sounded more like an amateur psychologist than the governor of a central bank when he deplored the irrational exuberance of Wall street. I do not know whether exuberance can ever be rational. He was worried, but the Russians gave him an escape route, at least for a short time. He did not have to put up interest rates to stop asset inflation on Wall street because the Russian crisis meant that there was deflation anyway.

Dr. Greenspan panicked again. He tried to save a ropy secondary bank, which is now called a hedge fund, and reduced interest rates three times in two weeks. Things were all right for a while, but share prices in the United States are rising again. They did not go up today or yesterday, but they are almost back to the pre-Russian crisis levels. Why? Because the costs of borrowing have been reduced and people can again borrow to buy shares.

Dr. Greenspan is worried about his constituency. He may be a central banker, but he has a constituency—Wall street. American consumers are not saving money and are using asset inflation on Wall street to buy goods. They are also almost totally dependent on share prices in Wall street for their retirement pensions. Dr. Greenspan is therefore locked into his constituency of Wall street. He is desperate and he is afraid to put up interest rates in case he brings down share prices. That affects American consumption, which affects most of the world.

[Mr. Denzil Davies]

Dr. Greenspan is not a happy bunny, but one central banker—Mr. Duisenberg—is a very happy bunny. I hope that I have pronounced his name correctly.

Mr. Radice: It is pronounced Doysenberg.

Mr. Davies: My colleague from the European Movement tells me that it is Doysenberg.

Mr. Duisenberg is a happy bunny. He is the happiest central banker in the world. He has a job that will last eight years; nobody can sack him. He is accountable to no person, only to a treaty, which must be nice because there is nothing behind the treaty apart from the European Court of Justice. He does not have to worry about a single Government or a powerful stock market, as does poor Dr. Greenspan. There is no Wall street to worry about when Mr. Duisenberg makes decisions. All he has to do is ensure price stability, and he is getting there. Inflation is down to 1 per cent. One more heave and Mr. Duisenberg will have achieved zero price inflation in western Europe. He is indeed a happy bunny.

There may be 16 million or 17 million unemployed people in western Europe. I do not know how many there are in euroland, but the figure is probably about 15 million. Mr. Duisenberg does not have to worry about that. He is accountable to the treaty, which includes only a few bland words about high employment.

What about the Bank of England? I do not know whether steady Eddie is a happy bunny. He is probably fairly happy because he has not done too badly. He has hit the 2.5 per cent. inflation target three times. As the hon. Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell) mentioned, there used to be leads and lags. I do not know what has happened to them these days. I wonder whether the hitting of the target three times is due to the brilliance of the Monetary Policy Committee or to a fluke. Perhaps we will never know.

As we have been reminded, the target is 2.5 per cent. My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice), Chairman of the Treasury Committee, nods in agreement. If inflation falls below 2.5 per cent., we can push it up again. We need some inflation—not for us zero price stability. In the British system, inflation must be 2.5 per cent.—not more, not less. Apparently, interest rates will be reduced in order to bring inflation back up. If it goes down to 2.4 per cent., we cut interest rates by a quarter of 1 per cent., and up goes inflation again to 2.5 per cent.

I am amazed that those who believe in the ideology of the free market and who condemn Government intervention also believe, somehow, in the ability of centralised banks to control an economy such as ours merely by pushing up or bringing down interest rates. My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) probably remembers that, in the 1970s, we were considerably criticised for fine tuning the economy.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): I suffer great confusion about all those measurements. Under the standardised European measure of inflation, as used for the Maastricht criteria, inflation in this country is only 1.5 per cent. I appreciate that that is higher than the average in euroland, which is—I think—1.1 per cent. How does that affect the burden of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, given that he is considering an inflation rate of 2.5 per cent., which is set by the Bank of England? Does that not magnify the effect of his point?

Mr. Davies: In this part of my speech, I am being a little Englander. I am looking just at the retail prices index and the Bank of England. Obviously, different figures have different consequences.

I was trying to make the point that there is remarkable control of the economy—this fine tuning. I gather from The Times this morning that we should call such control not fine tuning but monetary activism—fine tuning bad, monetary activism good. These fashions come and go, and now monetary activism is fashionable. A member of the Soviet Union would be delighted to hear that the Governor of the Bank of England is able, in this western capitalist economy, to control the economy in such a way merely by reducing or increasing interest rates by a quarter of 1 per cent. The danger is to believe that we can stop the fall in prices merely by reducing interest rates. It might not work; inflation might fall to 1.2 or 1 per cent. The problem is that interest rates would have to follow, and then banks would be affected.

I cannot foretell the future, but I believe that a transition may have to be engineered from the present orthodoxy, which is based on inflationary forces, to a new one, which takes account of deflationary forces. Whether western Governments, Finance Ministers and central bank governors have any longer the will to engineer such a transition—indeed, whether Governments have the leverage and power to do so—I do not know. But, if we cannot engineer such a transition, the industrial economies of the west will be greatly endangered. To paraphrase poor old Tacitus, who has been paraphrased so often, if we do not engineer a transition from one orthodoxy to the other, there is a very great danger that we will create a desert but continue to preach and advocate stability.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), who made a thoughtful and witty speech in which he may have sowed the odd seed of destabilisation in his Front-Bench team. I studied economics by reading Samuelson—one of the text books of the day—and recall that he talked much of the hog cycle. A useful addition to the next edition would be to incorporate the right hon. Gentleman's concept of sexy stability.

It is right and proper that the Opposition probe, question and, indeed, criticise Government economic policy in this debate on the Loyal Address. The Chief Secretary's speech mirrored the absolute complacency of the Gracious Speech's treatment of the economy. One would not think that there were a great deal to trouble the economic waters of the world. All we heard were some words straight from a BBC weather forecast: that the Government are "making the United Kingdom well placed not just to weather the international financial storms but to emerge stronger from them."

That is no-problem-at-all language.

The Government's central domestic economic objectives in the Queen's Speech, which were reflected in the Chief Secretary's entirely complacent speech, are:

"high and stable levels of economic growth and employment".

That is never mind the fact that, potentially, we are heading for zero growth, rising unemployment, economic uncertainty and a mis-reading of what is happening in the world economy.

I spoke recently to bankers and retailers who have been to the far east, who say that we have mis-read the depth of economic activity in that part of the world, that it will visit itself on us in no uncertain terms and that, as right hon. and hon. Members have said, the Government's and the Chancellor's assumptions of growth are way out. I therefore regard the words in the Queen's Speech as a complacent approach to the economy.

Why is it important that the Government are more accurate in their forecasting and more realistic in what they say about the economy? I attended the agricultural show at Smithfield market earlier today, where I talked to an agricultural machinery manufacturer who has seen a 40 per cent. drop in sales as a result of the Government's economic policies. [Interruption.] No Labour Members were where it was at—where British manufacturing was trying to sell its products. The manufacturer pointed out that, when people in the agriculture business heard that things would become bad, even those who were planning to make an investment decided not to do so.

Such forecasts engender strong precautionary motives on investment. The Government do not seem to understand that numbers in economic forecasting are important, but that just as important is the psychological frame of mind of industrialists. If the Government are over-ambitious with their target for growth, and it is missed, as all independent forecasters predict, the message will go out that the Government have got it wrong, and seeds of doubt will be sown once more in the minds of potential investors, as they wonder exactly which way the economy is going.

It is important to be honest and straightforward with the economy. Having been in the Treasury, I know what goes on. Officials present a gloomy or difficult set of figures, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer says he cannot possibly sell politically in the wide world. Under the new regime in the Treasury, a few of his mates get together—officials are removed from the room—to work out what they will sell politically. They ask, "What numbers can we create to make all this sound terribly respectable and saleable?" They emerge with the kind of rubbish that we have heard in Government economic forecasting. That is what happens. It is an attempt to put political spin on the situation but ignore the real world.

Mr. Sheerman: The right hon. Gentleman has spent a long time in the House, and today he has witnessed a typical example of the Opposition's attempts to talk up doom and disaster, and to exaggerate the problems in our economy and in the European and world economy. The Leader of the Opposition, in what he said the other day, and the shadow Chancellor, in what he said today—not to mention many other Conservative Members—have been irresponsible.

Mr. Jack: If that is the best that the hon. Gentleman can do, obviously he has not read the average growth forecast of the group of independent advisers who advised the Treasury. They talk about 0.8 per cent. growth in 1999 and 1.6 per cent. growth in 2000. The latter figure is well below the Chancellor's forecasts of between 2.25 and 2.75 per cent. growth in 2000. Obviously, the hon. Gentleman also has not looked at table A7 in the Budget report, which points out that even the Chancellor admits that there is error to the tune of 1.5 per cent. of GDP in his own forecast. If one applies that scope for error to the figures for the current financial year, one is down to 0 per cent. growth.

I am asking only for honesty and proper language in dealing with these matters, because of the psychology of potential investors. I return to what I said earlier. In the real world of agriculture, people are influenced by the mood of what is happening, and over-optimistic statements by Ministers will do the country's future investment decisions no good.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jack: No; I want to make a little progress, if I may.

In terms of transparency of thought, I believe that an implication of the over-optimistic growth forecasts will be an under-recovery in tax revenues. I should like an answer tonight to the following question: why are Treasury Ministers stalwartly unwilling to publish, on a monthly basis, forecasts of receipts for taxes in this country? We should have that information, to enable us to monitor carefully a key element of economic activity. The Treasury publishes figures for the actual receipts, but we have no idea how the flow of taxes—something that is an important monitoring point for future tax revenue—and, therefore, Government borrowing are going. In this day and age of open government, it is time that the Financial Secretary stopped making excuses in parliamentary answers to me, and provided that information.

While we are considering the performance of the economy, I have a chance to put the Government straight on some aspects of the previous Government's record. First, the Prime Minister triumphs in the fact that, in his judgment, it was the previous Government who had interest rates at 15 per cent. I remind him and his right hon. and hon. Friends that the previous Labour Government, before 1979, had interest rates at a similar level. Secondly, I remind him that, in the 1992 to 1997 Government, interest rates were not officially imposed at 15 per cent.

Thirdly, the Prime Minister triumphs in the present 2.5 per cent. inflation rate, but at the same time his right hon. Friend the Chancellor is fond of telling us that interest rate decisions taken 18 months ago affect the inflationary position now. I remind Treasury Ministers that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) set the interest rates that got us the present inflation rate. It is a triumph not for the new Labour Government but for his expertise in blending together data from the Treasury and the Bank of England and—most important—the touch and feel of the real-world economy. The latter is lacking under the current regime.

Ms Keeble: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that, since the general election, the rate on index-linked Government bonds has decreased from 4 per cent. to 2.5 per cent., which, in the real world, means that the price of building a hospital has reduced by about £1 million? That is the real world of inflation and interest rates.

Mr. Jack: That bears out the point that I have been making—that the previous Government were set on reducing inflation, and that the present Government have continued in the same mould.

Finally, I reiterate the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Sir R. Whitney). The reduction in borrowing for which the Government take all the credit had started under the previous Conservative Government. The fact that the new Government inherited our spending plans, combined with the strength of the economy and rising tax revenues, is the reason that borrowing has reached the present level.

The position on inflation and borrowing, which has been good news for the economy, has been achieved at a price. Although interest rates are now falling, we should always remind our citizens that they have paid a price for the Labour Government's approach on interest rate setting. Taking into account MIRAS reductions, the average mortgage of £40,000 now costs some £32 a month more than it did at the time of the general election. That payment, by those people, is a price that will haunt the Government when they go to the ballot box.

Setting interest rates is not a scientific activity; it requires real-world touch and judgment. I am disappointed that, in the Queen's Speech, there is no hint that the Government have considered reviewing section 11 of the Bank of England Act 1998. That section says that "the objectives of the Bank of England"

"to maintain price stability, and subject to that"— as the right hon. Member for Llanelli said—

"to support the economic policy of Her Majesty's Government, including its objectives for growth and employment."

The fact that the Bank's most important objective is to maintain price stability is one of the main reasons why interest rates have not been used more sensitively. Although interest rates have an important long-term effect on inflation, they also have a profound short-term effect. In the short term, the effect of interest rate decisions was to drive up sterling, decimating the prospects of manufacturing industry and sending agricultural activity well and truly into recession.

The fact that Barclays bank, in its forecasts, talks about unemployment rising by 500,000 in the next three years may be a sign of the real-world damage of the lack of sensitivity and touch. That is where my right hon. and learned Friend the former Chancellor got it right. He listened to what the real world was saying. The one thing lacking from those who currently set interest rates is a large dollop of real-world common sense.

It should be incumbent on the Government to produce a review of section 11 of the Bank of England Act 1998, to see whether it might be modified to give the Bank—if its independent stance is to be maintained—an opportunity to take into account wider issues. Another part of the 1998 Act gives the Chancellor the opportunity to intervene if situations merit such intervention. The Bank should be able to take into account the facts that we shall miss the growth forecast; that we have the biggest trade gap ever; and that, if the growth forecast is 1 per cent. adrift, another £7 billion of borrowing will be needed.

The Queen's Speech gives us no clues as to the Government's philosophy on, and approaches to, taxation. Previous Treasury documents contain a lot of waffly nonsense about fairness in the tax system, without defining "fairness". We get the idea that it has something to do with spending more public money and redistribution, but we do not know the Government's tax philosophy.

The previous Government made things clear. They aimed at a policy of low marginal rates; they aimed to encourage work—an objective that the present Government claim to share. However, I am not sure where the Government stand on overall tax policy.

In the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" for July 1997, tax receipts were forecast to be £382 billion. In the latest Treasury publication, for the financial year 2001–02, that figure has increased to £390 billion. The present Government have introduced 17 new forms of tax increase. Their total extra tax take in the 1999–2000 tax year will be an additional £7.135 billion, and all the data clearly show that tax, as a percentage of GDP, is rising under this Labour Government.

What statistical evidence is before the House that sets out the Government's philosophy and approach towards tax? I do not know, but it is about time that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his ministerial colleagues produced the evidence. We need to know what the Government are doing. We are not certain whether they are trying to broaden the tax base. There are signs that taxes on aggregates, pesticides and car parking—small taxation measures that will produce £200 million, £300 million or £400 million in the winnowing of extra tax—are the way in which the Government will proceed. We certainly know that they will continue with the tax assault on the motorist. This will be done to maintain the only thing that we know about Government tax policy—the maintenance of the basic and the higher rates of tax.

It is about time that the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a clear speech on his tax philosophy. Apart from more tax in cash terms and as a percentage of gross domestic product, we are seeing a growing reliance on Inland Revenue tax as a source of revenue for the economy. In 1998–99, 55.7 per cent. of revenue will come from that source. It is important that we understand where the Government are going in that respect.

More people are paying tax under the Labour Government, even against the background of a start in an increase in unemployment. The previous Government tried hard to take people out of paying tax but the Labour Government have not made clear their objectives.

On many occasions, the Government have advertised the introduction of the 10p tax. It is Labour's big idea to try to give an incentive to work through the tax system. Again, unfortunately, the Government have not come clean. They will not tell us what the 10p tax will look like in reality. Let us explore some of the real-world implications. A 10p tax to replace the 20p tax would cost roughly £10 billion. I do not think that anyone on either side of the House would suggest that the Government have £10 billion to spend on a 10p tax, so let us look at the proposal in another way.

If the Government decided that they wanted to spend on the introduction of a 10p tax the equivalent of 1p off the basic rate of tax, that would mean spending £1.8 billion. If, at the same time, they scrapped the existing 20p band, we would find that the Government could afford a 10p rate of tax on the first £1,400 of taxable income. That is a far less exciting prospect than all of the blandishments about a 10p tax.

It is interesting to recall the number of ways in which the 10p tax proposal has been recycled. In November 1992, it was advertised as a measure to "maximise the rewards from work". By the time that we reached the March 1998 Budget it was advertised as follows:

"When it is right for the economy, I will introduce a 10p starting rate of tax".—[Official Report, 17 March 1998; Vol. 308, c. 1104.]

That was with no other blandishments. By 23 April, we are told:

"When it is economically right to do so, and so that work pays more, we will introduce the 10p starting rate of income tax."

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): My right hon. Friend is making a most interesting point. Does he agree that there is another slight oddity about the 10p rate of tax in addition to the oddities that he has mentioned? It is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has brought it about through the working families tax credit that those who would be affected by the 10p marginal rate will be paying a 69p per cent. marginal rate in any event.

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend makes a telling point. He is illustrating another key technical feature, which again the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not talked about. There is a crucial interaction, for example, with the married couple's allowance, which will cause great problems. The result would be that those on a 10p rate would not get the benefit of it. It is about time that the Government came clean and set out clearly the framework of the proposed tax.

I appreciate that the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot tell us exactly about the timing of any tax change, but at least he should be honest with the British people and stop conning the people into believing that everyone will benefit from a 10p rate of tax. That will not happen. The right hon. Gentleman should make it clear whether he will restrict the 10p rate, for example, to those who are on basic rate or to those who are currently on the lower rate. Let us make it clear and let us stop, once and for all, the endless recycling of the same announcement, which so typifies much of what the Government do.

Let us come clean and make it clear that the 10p tax will do nothing to improve the work incentive. The Government say that the working families tax credit will have that effect. The Government must either get rid of the 10p tax rate or introduce it. If they do introduce a 10p rate of tax, there will be the problem of 10p, 20p, 23p and 40p rates of tax. That is complexity. We have nothing in the Queen's Speech about removing complexity from the tax system. We have heard nothing about the work that is taking place to improve clarity and further the reform of tax law. Where is the reference in the Queen's Speech to a Bill that reflects the work of the tax law re-write committee? There is nothing about that in the Queen's Speech, and it is about time that on this aspect of tax policy, and on others, the Government came clean.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. I remind the House that Madam Speaker has put a limit of 15 minutes on Back-Bench speeches between 7 and 9 o'clock.

7.6 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston): Two weeks ago, in his Mansion House speech, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister spelt out his views on the state of the British economy in the face of the global meltdown. What began last year as a local and regional crisis has spread from Asia to Europe and north and south America, becoming what is now a global crisis that is affecting us all. Against that background is the intention to steer a course of stability. My right hon. Friend then said that he wished to "combat social exclusion and create a society of opportunity extended to all."

I fully endorse such a commitment and I commend the measures to achieve that in the Queen's Speech. I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his commitment to help some of the poorest. I want to apply the same logic and commitment to the wider world, more particularly, to some of the poorest countries. I fear that, unless there is significant change in the international financial framework, progress will be made much more difficult.

Over the past few months, we have heard much about the world financial system running out of control. For many this has not been a surprise—financial markets wield enormous influence in a precarious setting. Such is their influence that adjusting to the international economy—above all, to global financial markets—has become a fixed point of orientation in economic policy. Much of the activity of financial markets is speculative. It is often driven by short-term economic considerations and based, above all, on extracting gain from expansion and the velocity of financial turnover in currency, shares, options, futures and the rest. By watching capital look for the highest return, Governments have raised its price and inadvertently caused investment to shrink. There has been a race to the top for the highest short-term return.

It is held that Governments cannot successfully second guess market decisions, and it is implied that they should not try. That view might be defensible if financial market operators had a monopoly of market expertise, but they do not. The consequences of letting the market take the lead without a clearly defined global strategy are very serious.

It is true that there has been huge growth in consumption, but that does not tell us the full story. There is no doubt that current policies on trade and investment have been accompanied by increasing disparities between rich and poor, both between and within countries.

The recent tragedies in Honduras and Nicaragua were natural disasters and no single person was to blame. Nevertheless, we can see how aspects of the global market played a part in the disaster. Many aid agencies say that, economically, it was an accident waiting to happen.

[Mr. Tom Clarke]

Structural adjustment programmes, sometimes naively enforced by external agencies to develop export industries such as forestry to enable the country to pay off debt, mean that 30 per cent. of Honduras's forest has been lost since 1960.

According to United Nations figures, more than 70 per cent. of the Nicaraguan population was already living in conditions of poverty before Hurricane Mitch—a situation aggravated by the application of structural adjustment policies which dictate, among other things, acute cuts in public spending. Tragically, from the lakeside communities of Managua to the country's rural communities, it is precisely the poorer sectors that have been most affected by the recent disaster. The damage inflicted on a developing country, still struggling to pay off the crippling foreign debt while it emerges from a war and a long economic crisis, could prove to be devastating.

The already insufficient infrastructure has been badly battered, with roads, bridges and basic services terribly damaged. The Nicaraguan President claims that Nicaraguan development has been set back at least 30 years, although even before the hurricane struck the country had fallen 20 or 30 years behind the 1977 growth levels as a result of a war and the economic problems of the 1980s.

Structural adjustment programmes are precarious because they are blanket approaches which ignore the enormous differences between debtor countries, and do not always give priority to social and political contexts. If democracy is to mean anything, it is surely right to permit countries to shape their economies and societies, rather than to abandon the process to the dictates of the market alone.

The claim is often advanced that Governments can do little to alter the twists and turns of world markets, but that is wrong. Globalisation is not like the weather; it is not a natural phenomenon that we are unable to change. It is a systematic framework, which we have created and which can and should now be changed. We have global problems that will require global solutions. In short, we need greater change to harness extremes.

We must examine the volatility of international financial markets and their speculative pursuit of short-term gain and profit, over and above the welfare of some of the world's poorest regions. Some have suggested that a global tax on currency speculation, such as that proposed by the economist James Tobin, may be an example of the regulation that could render world markets more stable and productive. There may be huge difficulties, but the idea at least deserves discussion—I put it no higher.

New forms of economic co-ordination are crucial and worthy of debate. Organisations such as the International Monetary Fund, the World bank and the G7 often operate with separate agendas. Policy making is fragmented. That is not as fanciful as it may seem; we need only to think of the establishment of new multilateral bodies such as the World Trade Organisation.

By linking such bodies to measures aimed at alleviating avoidable economic suffering—by radically reducing the debt of many developing countries, and by generating new economic facilities at organisations such as the IMF and the World bank for development purposes—we would create the basis for entrenching global economics in a set of humanitarian and democratic mechanisms and procedures. The fundamental challenge is to improve the flows of high-quality investment that make a positive contribution to the host country's development path. That must include long-term commitment to the communities most affected by that investment.

The less-developed world needs more buying power, more aid transfers on generous terms and more intelligent support in its efforts to alleviate chronic poverty. Jubilee 2000 asserts that "for every one dollar in aid given to developing countries, eight dollars comes back in debt service."

According to the 1997 United Nations Development Programme human development report,

"relieved of their annual debt repayments, the severely indebted countries could use the funds for investment that in Africa alone would save the lives of about 21 million children by 2000 and provide 90 million girls and women with access to basic services."

That is a powerful challenge to us all. Thus far, the global economy has excluded far too many. This year's UNDP human development report tells us that the poorest 20 per cent. of the world's people have been left out of the consumption explosion. Globally, the 20 per cent. of the world's people in the highest income countries account for a massive 86 per cent. of total private consumption expenditure. The poorest 20 per cent. account for a minuscule 1.3 per cent. Moreover, the least-developed countries account for about only 0.5 per cent. of world trade and investment. If that is not global exclusion, I do not know what it is.

Until the poor are brought into the international system with real influence, the global economy cannot be stable for long. The G7 countries plus the rest of the European Union represent a mere 14 per cent. of the world's population, yet those countries have 56 per cent. of the votes on the IMF executive board.

Change will not be easy, but come it must. Kofi Annan, the Secretary-General of the United Nations, has already called for a UN role in financial reform. I believe passionately that that is possible and that we must make speedy progress. For the good of the world, we need a dialogue of rich and poor, working in partnership.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was right when he told us of the new role for Government in economic management, which I applaud, and measures that combat social exclusion and create a society of opportunity extended to all. We should employ the potential of all our people because we cannot tolerate a society that writes off its potential work force through poor education or social exclusion. There still remains an economic case for tackling poverty and unemployment at home and abroad.

I know that the Government recognise that we have a moral and economic duty to project and apply those arguments at a global level. We must acknowledge that it is in our own interest to offer hope to the poorest people of the poorest countries, by working towards a genuine practical solution encompassing the resources that they currently transfer. Without change, the global financial system will not lead to the prosperity that we want for developing nations and will never be realised. Hope, above all, must triumph over disenchantment.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton): The right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) has obviously worked hard on his speech and thought the issues through. In respect of the Gracious Speech, he was clearly referring to the privatisation of the Commonwealth Development Corporation as one of the measures that he welcomes.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Taylor: I should be grateful to the right hon. Gentleman if I could get under way.

Mr. Clarke: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Taylor: Of course.

Mr. Clarke: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman. First, I thank him for his kind remarks, but, secondly, all my remarks related to the third paragraph of Her Majesty's Gracious Speech.

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that clarification, as is the House. Nevertheless, I hope that he welcomes the privatisation of the CDC, the proposal for which I was delighted to see in the Gracious Speech.

When I was a Minister at the Department of Trade and Industry I did quite a bit to achieve a leap forward for the CDC. On a visit to Havana, I was face to face with President Castro. CDC negotiations to do something to help Cuba—that exemplaire of potential capitalism under President Castro—had run into the sand. I decided to push them through as best I could, and I persuaded President Castro to remove the only remaining obstacle to the agreement with the CDC, which was the reduction of some taxes. President Castro said, "Is that what you recommend?" I said yes, and he turned to his Finance Minister and said, "Reduce taxation; we are going to sign this deal tomorrow."

That is the way that things can be done in an enlightened regime, and the CDC is still active on the island of Cuba. I hope that its new-found freedom, which was referred to in the Gracious Speech, will give it even more power to do deals. I genuinely think that the CDC does some excellent work around the world, and is clearly no longer confined to the territory of the Commonwealth.

I was not minded to refer too much to the euro, but I was galvanised by the now-absent right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), who decided that the European Movement was in a state of agitation because we seemed to be co-ordinated. I was also inspired, in the opposite way than he intended, by the Chief Secretary, who failed to respond to my intervention.

The reality is that it is not the European Movement that is becoming agitated; as usual, those of us who are part of it are calm and collected as we approach the first day of the euro. The people who are agitated are those who have suddenly realised that the euro is a serious, practical currency which is about to be dealt in within what is effectively 80 per cent. of the single market—the single market that we created as Conservatives, under the great leadership of Baroness Thatcher.

We created the single market, and 80 per cent. of it will have a single currency within a matter of days, yet too many people seem to think that that is something that we do not need to bother about because it is only another foreign currency, or they believe—even more alarmingly—that it is something that we have to froth at the mouth about.

Unlike the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice), I am not referring to The Sun, but to that real third-rate broadsheet, The Sunday Telegraph. It not only frothed at the mouth, but, so weak are the grounds for its argument for opposition to the euro, it decided that it had to put on the front page of last Sunday's edition an opinion poll that was largely conducted between January and April 1997. That is hardly something that would usually be contemporary enough to get on to the front page of what used to be a quality newspaper.

Far from The Sunday Telegraph headline being accurate, it revealed that, even on the terms that it expressed about its own opinion poll, opposition to the euro had reached its lowest level for quite some time. In other words, opinion was gradually moving in favour of at least considering the euro.

I know that public opinion is still against by a larger factor than I care to contemplate, but let us ask ourselves why. For a start, very few of the positive arguments about the euro have been put forward. Secondly, the Government—to be fair—are saying that they could conceive of entry and that it is a possibility, and that they have a few criteria—five, at the moment—which, although they are subjective rather than objective, could be met at any stage. Those criteria give them a fig leaf that enables them to say, "Perhaps we have to watch this for a little bit longer."

Although they are at least doing that, the Government refused to state explicitly in the Queen's Speech or in the debate—so did the Chief Secretary, when challenged by me—that their policies on the economy are designed to enable this country to make the decision to join the euro, if the other economic conditions and circumstances are correct.

Whether one is for or against the euro, we can all agree that entry will not occur by accident. There must be clear political will for it to occur, and the policies that will enable us to converge. We must prepare not only industry—which is at least mentioned in the Gracious Speech—to start dealing immediately in what will be one of the most powerful reserve currencies in the world and something that will rapidly condition the way that our domestic economy is run, but the technical aspects, which are part of conversion and preparedness.

Many companies are saying to hon. Members on the Conservative Benches—and to hon. Members on other Benches as well—that they want a clearer steer from the Government. They do not want nice, comfortable waffle and they do not want the Government to say, "Perhaps industry should take the lead, because we do not want to offend the Murdoch press." Companies want the Government to be explicit about their intentions and how they will deliver them.

How will the Government so change their fiscal policy to accommodate the fact that, if they are serious about entering the euro within a matter of years, interest rates are likely to fall? Indeed, they will have to, unless continental rates converge towards ours, something that

[Mr. Taylor]

Oskar Lafontaine may provoke. I am afraid that my hon. Friend the Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell) has left the Chamber. He concentrated on the role of Oskar Lafontaine in the European debate, but I am referring to practical matters. If interest rates in the United Kingdom are to fall, what fiscal measures will be put in place so that the economy can deliver growth and stability, which the Government have said are their benchmarks for economic management?

The other vital factor—

Sir Teddy Taylor: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Taylor: We have a 15-minute limit on speeches, but bearing in mind our long-standing friendship, of course I shall give way to my hon. Friend.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Is it not the case that there are low interest rates in Europe and rather higher ones in Britain because unemployment is high in Europe and not so high in Britain? Is that untrue?

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who leads me right into my next point. The euro is not destined automatically to succeed. Those of us who are prepared to contemplate entry do not also say that it must succeed because we would like it to succeed. That would require a series of clear political decisions which could influence its ability to succeed. Perhaps the euro will drift sideways, or perhaps it will fail. Failure is widely understood by those on the Conservative Benches not to be in Britain's national interest.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) is right: some key decisions will be made. How will the economic and stability committee—the Euro XI—make up its mind about how management of the fiscal elements of policy should be set alongside the European central bank's management of monetary affairs? What signals will be given? Will the central bank decide that it will target an external exchange rate for the euro?

Those are big questions, and there are many more. How will labour flexibility be used? What adjustments will be made between regions and countries within a single monetary policy zone? Those of us who are in favour of the euro do not deny that those questions exist. We are saying to the Government, "What is your position on each of those issues?" If we intend to join, we must make sure that the character of the euro is something with which we are comfortable. We must make our voice and our views heard in the European Union, although we are not part of the Euro XI committee.

There will, of course, be differences between Opposition Members and Labour Members in regard to the answers to some of those questions. In what must inevitably be a short speech, I shall not go into what those differences might be; but, regardless of whether differences arise over the way in which the economy, the Euro XI committee and the central bank should govern themselves, we must contribute to the debate. A letter published in The Independent on 30 November, which I signed, along with the Chairman of the Civil Service Select Committee—who also chairs the European Movement—states:

> "On the key issues now emerging—whether to adopt an external exchange-rate policy for the euro, how to operate the growth and stability pact and whether or not tax approximation may be desirable in a single currency zone—Britain's voice must be at the centre, not the margin, of policy formation."

The possibility of such an influence is a much clearer indication that the Government intend to join the currency. I urge Ministers not just to say, "Here is a positive European in the Conservative party: we can pat him on the head", but to give me—a Conservative who is also a positive European—some concrete answers. Some of us are anxious to be given such answers. If others are not prepared to ask the questions, I am. They are difficult questions, and they need careful consideration.

Over the next day or two, the European issue will continue to bubble, but by the beginning of January many people in this country will realise that something that will increasingly influence the way in which they conduct their business, and the way in which we conduct our domestic economy, is something that the British Government are fudging, in terms of commitment. Perhaps I am wrong; perhaps the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was right to tell the Confederation of British Industry that it was "only a question of when". I should like the Minister who replies to tell me that the Secretary of State was right.

Perhaps the Secretary of State's predecessor is anxious to intervene and tell me that now, given the loyalty that exists between Ministers and their successors. I hope, however, that a clearer commitment will be given. The only reference to the euro in the Gracious Speech is a reference to the need to prepare British industry for it—and, as we have seen from an advertisement in the Financial Times last week relating to more than 100 business men and the 150 who have followed, British industry wants a good deal more from the Government than it is currently receiving. If it does not receive more, there will be considerable tensions during the next few months. Moreover, as ICI's chief economist has pointed out, if we are likely to be out of the euro for a protracted period, that will have a severe effect on British investment decisions, which can mean only one thing: more British companies will decide to locate within 80 per cent. of the European single market, rather than in the United Kingdom.

I would have liked to say more about the role of technology. The Government have done a constructive job in highlighting some of the issues that I tried to highlight when I was a DTI Minister, relating to the role of technology in the economy. Electronic commerce is incredibly important, and, if we do not do what is necessary to provide the right framework, the nation will suffer economically—in terms of every aspect of the economy. I know that Conservative Front Benchers are a little more hesitant, but I welcome the move to try to provide a framework for digital encryption and digital signatures. Without those, we shall not benefit from the advances that may be made by the United States and other competing economies.

The development of electronic commerce will be monumental. At present, at least 100 million people are connected to the internet; only 40 million were connected in 1996. That rapid expansion demonstrates the importance of the internet to the United Kingdom economy. I hope that the Government will continue to concentrate on the issue, and will give us further details.

7.35 pm

Ms Ruth Kelly (Bolton, West): It is always an honour to speak in one of the debates on the Gracious Speech, especially when the Gracious Speech features such an ambitious agenda.

The right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) said that the second Gracious Speech of a new Government should involve the maximum purposeful activity. I asked myself what he meant, and, having looked at the Gracious Speech, could only conclude that it involved precisely that. In what other way could we describe a programme that introduces, for the first time, a working families tax credit that will make work pay for thousands of families? How else could we describe a programme that will introduce a minimum wage that will set a floor for earnings, and will end the scandal of in-work poverty pay? The new deal has already created opportunities for thousands of young people, and I am delighted that it is to be extended to cover even more groups.

I consider the macro-economic agenda equally impressive. The Government are taking action to create an economy that is capable of sustained and steady growth. It is essential, over the next year, for them to build on what they have already achieved, steering a careful course even when growth in world trade has fallen by two thirds.

I welcome the Government's commitment to new fiscal rules and to more transparency in our national policy-making, but I believe that vigilance in national economic policies must be matched by a willingness to reform the international financial system to secure greater international stability. The Opposition may argue that the slowdown forecast for Britain was made in Downing street, but it is clear to all but a few that the impact of the crisis in east Asia has reverberated across the developed world. We ignore at our peril the fact that a quarter of the world economy is now in recession, including the economy of Japan. The right hon. Member for Horsham mocked the Chancellor's attempt to forge a new financial infrastructure for the global economy. In that, too, he is isolated and increasingly extreme.

I was very interested by the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke), and intend to build on some of what he said.

A key challenge for the Government over the next year must be the devising of new international rules of the game to build confidence and credibility in the global system. It is worth recalling the remarkable growth that has taken place in the foreign exchange markets over the past 25 years. Since 1973, the foreign exchange market has grown fourteenfold, thriving in a world free of capital controls. The $1.3 trillion traded daily in the foreign exchange market that was registered in 1995 represents an increase of 50 per cent. since 1992. Unfortunately, however, the global financial infrastructure has become increasingly outdated.

The events of the past few months have demonstrated the deep-rooted inadequacies of our understanding of the relationships between financial markets and between countries—especially in regard to developing, emerging market economies, the quality of risk assessment and gaps in the international regulatory structure. That is why it is particularly appropriate for the Chancellor to be at the forefront of international attempts to rethink the financial institutions. I accept that capital market liberalisation can bring enormous benefits to developing countries. The theory is that freer capital markets can give developing countries access to global savings, so that they can invest more in order to grow faster. Until recently, Asia seemed to prove that case.

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): I recognise the efforts that the Chancellor may be making outside the United Kingdom. However, as we heard today from my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), 1,200 jobs were lost today at the Courtauld textiles factory, and only last week—on black Friday—4,000 jobs were lost. What does the hon. Lady think should be done to protect jobs at home?

Ms Kelly: The hon. Gentleman completely misses the point. Does he not realise that 400,000 jobs have been created since the Government came to power, that interest rates are falling and that the inflation rate is on target for the third time? It is time to look at our domestic economic policies to see how that transparency can be injected into the global financial system.

It is clear that capital liberalisation can bring important benefits to developing countries, giving them access to savings that they might not otherwise have had. As east Asian countries erased capital controls during the 1990s, they enjoyed inflows of money amounting to between 5 and 10 per cent. of gross domestic product. That went hand in hand with faster growth, but fast liberalisation of capital markets can have its dangers. The 1990s witnessed a movement of capital to emerging market economies on a scale relative to GDP not seen since the gold standard era of the late 1880s to early 1900s.

Let us take the five countries that have been most damaged by the recent crisis—Indonesia, Malaysia, South Korea, Thailand and the Philippines. Between them, they had net inflows of $41 billion in 1994. By 1996, that had jumped to $93 billion. Over the years, inflows substantially exceeded the current account deficit, allowing Governments to accumulate $37 billion in additional reserves.

When panic hit last year, the net inflow turned into an estimated outflow of $12 billion. The swing in the net supply of private capital was a staggering 10 per cent. of the combined pre-crisis GDP of the five economies.

The response has been dramatic. Countries have had to slash domestic spending and rein back trade deficits, sometimes sharply. Malaysia has so far been alone in reimposing capital controls to shield itself from the frenzy of the markets and to buy itself some breathing space, but, by doing so, it deepened the crisis in other parts of the region, and undermined confidence among international investors in east Asia even further.

Many commentators, including the International Monetary Fund, have blamed the emerging market economies themselves for their problems. They have argued that any international help should be accompanied by even greater capital liberalisation and yet harsher economic policies, policies that the eminent United States economist, Paul Krugman, describes as "playing the confidence game"—trying to win back the confidence of the international markets.

[Ms Kelly]

Of course, the IMF is right in some respects. Some of the problems were home-grown and valuable lessons have been learnt. The evidence suggests that the extent to which capital movements are destabilising depends largely on the strength of a country's financial system and the soundness of its economic policies, but how on earth can anyone argue that the punishment that those countries face fits the crime? What the crisis has exposed far more than any policy "crimes" is the inadequacy of the international financial system in the face of an increasingly interdependent global economy, in which capital flows are virtually instantaneous.

For 50 years, our policies for regulation, supervision, transparency and—yes, I will say it—stability have been devised and developed for a world of relatively sheltered national economies, with limited capital markets. Now that markets transcend national boundaries, that system needs to be completely rethought. I congratulate the Chancellor on playing his part in international forums that are trying to do that.

What is now called for is a new Bretton Woods—not a system of fixed exchange rates, like the old system, but a new financial infrastructure. The Chancellor was right to underline the need for greater transparency and openness, including the implementation of codes of practice and conduct in monetary and fiscal policy and corporate governance. Those should strengthen incentives on Governments to pursue sound economic policies and enable market participants to price risk more effectively.

Financial supervision and regulation must also be improved and early warning mechanisms put in place to help to prevent further crises. Short-term mechanisms must exist in case crises do strike, with the international community able to mobilise capital quickly to underpin economies of countries whose policies are clearly sound.

Although we should recognise the benefits of free capital movements, international leaders and developing economies need to approach the concept of capital market liberalisation with a little more caution. As long as countries are open to massive movements of hot money, there will be problems. As long as capital flows freely, nations will be vulnerable to speculative attack and policy makers will be forced to play the confidence game.

Of course, it is not easy to limit the movement of international capital, at least not without threatening the strangulation of international trade, but we cannot sanction a system that allows developing countries to be exploited by foreign capital that they do not need and which then forces them to resort to panic controls on capital outflows when crisis hits.

I have been an advocate of a small tax, devised by the Nobel laureate, James Tobin, on foreign exchange transactions. That would make speculation more costly, while having little effect on long-term investment, but I accept some of the criticisms of the tax. Enforcement would be difficult and it would not necessarily solve problems such as have arisen in east Asia, where the biggest sellers of local currencies were not speculators; they were local firms desperately trying to hedge or to repay debts denominated in dollars. However, we could act to protect developing markets from the sort of onslaught that we have recently witnessed by encouraging them to liberalise their capital markets more slowly and cautiously. There are encouraging examples of the dividends that can be reaped from caution.

Take Chile, for example. In 1982, it had a crisis strikingly similar to that in east Asia. Since then, despite being a robust supporter of the free market, it has actively sought to discourage short-term inflows of foreign capital. All loans and bank deposits from abroad are, effectively, taxed. When a company borrows abroad, for example, 30 per cent. of the loan must be deposited for one year in a non-interest-bearing account at the central bank. The controls are likely to explain partly why Chile has enjoyed steadier growth than most other emerging economies over the past decade.

Would it not have been preferable if Thailand and Indonesia had restricted borrowing from abroad in a like manner, rather than encouraged it? Perhaps South Korea might have avoided such a run on its reserves if controls on short-term borrowing had limited its exposure to foreign banks.

Once financial and regulatory systems are well established, capital markets can be opened fully, perhaps with a new world financial authority standing ready to police global capital flows, ensuring that the necessary international standards are in place. In the event of a crisis and where a country adopts good policies, I would like a world financial authority to sanction temporary debt standstills by lending into arrears.

As Jean-Michel Camdessus, the IMF managing director, has put it, the IMF's goal should be to ensure that the world has adequate protection against the risks of globalisation, together with the chance to embrace the opportunities it provides. That should be our goal too.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington): I was interested in the remarks of the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Ms Kelly), but may I bring the House back to the broader canvas of the immediate problems that are addressed by the Queen's Speech?

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury attempted to give his remarks some sort of theme by using the word "modernisation". Modernisation is a totally empty concept. It can include anything that we say has changed. It does not address the Labour party's traditional problem of finding a way in which to improve the mechanisms for delivering economic growth.

When Jim Callaghan, now Lord Callaghan, was Chancellor of the Exchequer and addressed the Labour party conference—the President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons may recall this—Hugh Scanlon, no less, stood up in the middle of his peroration and said, "Aye, but Jim, where's the mechanism?" Callaghan reached behind the podium and, with a rather oratorical flourish, waved a document and said, "Here, Hugh. Here's the mechanism." It was the national plan, which lasted about another three months. That is the Labour party's traditional problem in addressing economic problems.

Mr. Woolas: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Horam: We are on a time limit. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me.

The Labour party does not understand the need to address continuously the mechanisms for delivering economic growth. The Queen's Speech shows its lack of thought in that respect.

The great strength of Conservative Governments in the 1980s and 1990s was that they understood the importance of addressing and readdressing the supply side problems of the economy and coming forward with specific measures to help. Thus it was that we denationalised, deregulated and lowered taxes, all of which had a strong positive effect on economic performance, such that Paul Ormerod—no defender of the Conservative party—was able to say in his recent book that a great triumph of those Conservative Governments was to establish a framework for enterprise. That is precisely what we did.

The enterprise framework created by the Conservative Government was widely admired abroad, and other economies adopted the privatisation methods pioneered by that Government. The hon. Member for Bolton, West was talking about international economics. The Indian economy, for example, has been released totally by finally forsaking London school of economics-Fabian-socialist economics and adopting a sensible market approach.

The Conservative Government of those years tackled not only the private sector but the public sector. That reform, indeed, was modernisation and creation of a method of delivering services that was recognised around the world as pioneering. When I was a Minister in that Government, we reckoned on reducing public sector costs by at least 30 per cent. every time we put something out to competitive tender. Equally, over 10 years, using those means, public sector costs were reduced by £1 billion. Over 10 years, the number of civil servants was reduced from 1 million to 750,000.

We did not stop that work even when a general election was imminent. When I was at the Cabinet Office, for example, we continued—within a year of the previous general election—to privatise Her Majesty's Stationery Office, the Recruitment and Assessment Service and the occupational health service. When I was a Health Minister, we managed to get the NHS supplies company to a point at which it could be privatised. In only the last year of the previous Government, my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) continued with his deregulation, abolishing 1,000 regulations.

Politically, perhaps all that was done foolishly, as we were accused of trying to do too much while electoral defeat might have been staring us in the face. At least it showed that that Conservative Government were committed to using the power they had for positive purposes, and for the good of the economy and of the British people. I was proud to be associated with that record, which I should be happy to defend.

I was appalled by the Queen's Speech because of its absence of such a drive to make improvements, which seem to have dried up to a trickle. However, there is one exception. I congratulate the Government on one rather technical matter that no hon. Member has mentioned in the debate. The Queen's Speech states:

"A Bill will be introduced to transfer the Contributions Agency to the Inland Revenue, paving the way for better and simpler collection of National Insurance Contributions and tax."

I warmly welcome that very good measure and simplification. Labour Members may not be aware—even Ministers, as they do not see the papers of the previous Government, may not be aware of it—that I myself spent three years at work on the matter. Undoubtedly, a similar measure would have been introduced had a Conservative Government remained in office. However, I unreservedly welcome that part of the Queen's Speech.

Most of the other paragraphs in the Queen's Speech—such as that on new trade union legislation—will have a retrograde effect. The Speech states that the Government "will bring forward measures to establish a forward-looking balance of rights and responsibilities".

"Forward-looking" is an interesting spin on a measure that is precisely backward looking, in bringing back measures that had been abolished to help the economy. Nevertheless, in an astonishing piece of pedantry, Ministers call it forward looking.

The Queen's Speech states:

"My Government will introduce legislation to modernise local government in England and Wales and secure delivery of high quality local services on a sound financial footing."

Of course that means dropping competitive tendering, which is called something different now—value for money or something like that. The fact is that the drive to reduce costs and to outsource properly and sensibly in local authorities will go. The commitment to reduce costs will be eliminated.

The Queen's Speech states:

"Regional Development Agencies will be established in England, decentralising decision-taking to the English regions."

It is another piece of bureaucracy and interference in the planning mechanism. The other day, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was making much of the McKinsey report on productivity and efficiency. However, one of the points in the report was precisely that the planning mechanism inhibits enterprise. Now Ministers are introducing another element into current United Kingdom planning mechanisms. It is very strange proposal to promote economic growth.

The Queen's Speech states:

"Legislation will be introduced to create a new Greater London Authority . . . There will be a range of powers to make London a world class city".

There will also be an industrial development agency for London—what nonsense! We need such an agency like we need a hole in the head—as if we do not already have enough support for industry in our capital city. It will simply complicate the business of releasing enterprise.

Like other hon. Members, I welcome legislation to create a financial services authority. We go around that course again every 12 years or so, but it is very important that we get the legislation right. I support other Conservative Members in saying that, so far, there has been scant evidence that the draft legislation either is finished or will deal with many of the problems.

I should like to draw an important point to the attention of the House. I have a report from the Real Time Club, entitled "Funding Technology-Based SMEs—Key issues to be resolved in the 1998/9 Financial Services Act", which states:

"Following a series of investigations by the Bank of England and others, it is now generally agreed that technology-based SMEs, particularly in their early stages, have considerable difficulty in obtaining adequate funding. As a consequence the UK economy loses out in the creation of wealth, in new jobs, in the balance of payments, and in forgoing tax revenues . . . The paper therefore proposes that the current review being undertaken in the context of the forthcoming 1999 Financial Services Act should be used to remedy these deficiencies."

All the information that I have from sources close to the current negotiations and discussions reveal that Ministers have taken on board none of the points made by those who are well versed in that extremely important issue. I hope that the Paymaster General is listening to the comments on the issue—rather than reading a rather extensive tome—because he can do something about it.

Technology-based small and medium enterprises in the United Kingdom are not receiving the right funding. In providing funding, we are well behind the United States, and we are increasingly falling behind many countries in Europe. If the Paymaster General would like to address those issues before the financial services authority Bill is introduced, the House should be grateful to him. Some progress must be made on the issue. However, from the information that I have, I believe that there is scant evidence that any is being made. The Government are not listening to the serious points being made by people who know a great deal about the matter.

The sad thing about the Queen's Speech is that it does not deal with the United Kingdom's fundamental economic problems—which is what we are debating today—or command confidence. I agree that many of the measures that I have mentioned—like an increase in interest rates or taxation—will not come into effect and have consequences for the economy immediately. However, over time, the failure to keep up with the drive to continue making improvements in the supply side of the economy, and the introduction of measures to restrict and impose costs on the supply side, will insidiously erode the enterprise culture so successfully established by the previous Government. Therefore, despite all that the Prime Minister would like us to believe, I do not think that they are a modern and reforming Government.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in tonight's debate. I hope that the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) will forgive me if I do not follow him down the curious byways of his selective memory and his interesting political career.

Between 1983 and 1985, I was a member of the Treasury Select Committee, but having spent 13 years on the Front Bench developing policy on just one issue—the arts—I welcome the opportunity to resume my contribution from the Back Benches to the somewhat wider debate on the economy. However, I wish that it were taking place in happier circumstances.

There is too much evidence, which has been rehearsed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, that economic storm clouds are gathering around the world. The reasons for this darkening situation are beyond the control of any one nation, even the United States, but that makes it all the more important that we do all that we can by way of economic and fiscal policies to put our national economy in the best possible state to withstand any damage. That is why my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is absolutely right to press for reform of international economic institutions, not to cut public expenditure, to work as closely as possible with other European Finance Ministers and to do as much as he can to prepare for economic and monetary union.

As my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury said at the start of his speech, the main theme of the Queen's Speech is modernisation—as essential a contribution as any to preparing the economy for the hard times ahead. Indeed, the word "modernise" appears no fewer than 11 times in the text. It is used to describe the Government's approach to the law, the welfare state, local government, parliamentary and constitutional reform and industry. After 18 years of poor government, it is vital that we tackle the neglect of our predecessors, but using one word in so many contexts is not necessarily an aid to clarity.

What do we mean by modernisation, particularly in relation to industry and the economy? In our first Session, we cut corporation tax, introduced a national minimum wage and gave independence to the Bank of England—all modernising and very necessary initiatives.

Mr. Woodward: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fisher: I am limited to 15 minutes. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be able to make his own speech.

In this Queen's Speech, the Government address the growth of electronic commerce. On Wednesday, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry told the House that we had to adapt our legal and regulatory environment from one that addressed the needs of trade and material goods to one that met the requirements of electronic commerce. He called for a national crusade to make us world leaders in internet business. I welcome that.

At last the Government recognise the commercial importance of information in a way that quite eluded Ministers in the previous Administration, with the honourable exception of the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor), who spoke earlier. His Cassandra-like warnings that we were being left behind in the race to develop new technologies were ignored by his ministerial colleagues. That market, which is conducted in the English language, is growing every day, is already generating substantial profits and can play a major part in reducing costs. For example, the electronic booking of an airline ticket can reduce the cost of the transaction from $8 to $1. However, I hope that we are not so glamorised by the thrill of the new star, electronic commerce, that we allow the old trouper, manufacturing industry, to shuffle off the stage. That there could or should be a choice between them is a delusion.

Although it is not a fashionable view, I believe that manufacturing remains of great importance to our economy. Lady Thatcher and Lord Lawson refused to accept that. They looked at the statistics and pronounced the terminal decline of manufacturing, declaring that we were a service economy. That was a simplistic judgment which we must not repeat in our pursuit of modernisation.

It is true that, partly as a result of the policies of the previous Government, manufacturing jobs fell from 6.75 million in 1979 to 4.8 million in 1986 and to just over 4 million today. It is also true that growth in manufacturing, which, on average, has been 1.8 per cent. a year since 1986, is well behind growth in services of 3 per cent. a year and growth in the general economy of 2.5 per cent. and that the contribution to general domestic product of production industries of 25.4 per cent. compares unfavourably with that of the service industries at 67.9 per cent. However, the figures conceal a more complicated and, I believe, more positive picture.

The service sector is not, as it may appear, a coherent whole. It is made up of a number of disparate parts: transport, communications, leisure, catering and financial services. Our economy continues to comprise three major players: finance and the financial sector, at 22.4 per cent.; public administration, at 22.2 per cent.; and manufacturing, at 20.6 per cent. We cannot afford to ignore the importance of manufacturing industry. Crucially, manufacturing remains central to our balance of trade and export performance as it contributes 63 per cent. of total exports. That percentage has been constant over the past decade, compared with the contribution of services of between 20 and 30 per cent—last year, it was 24 per cent.

To maintain that export performance, manufacturing industries, such as ceramics in my constituency, have not waited for the Government's call to modernise.

Mr. Woodward: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fisher: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity to make his own speech. I would have been happy to give way had it not been for the 15-minutes rule.

Manufacturing industries have done much to modernise products, develop new markets and harness new technologies such as robotics in production and computer-aided design to improve productivity.

What role is there for the Government to support the modernisation that is already taking place? In recent months, the CBI, employers' organisations, such as the Engineering Employers Federation, and almost all the trade unions have called for a cut in interest rates to reduce the level of the pound. Although the recent cuts are welcome, they are not sufficient. I believe that more would be beneficial, and they will come. The reason for caution that the Governor of the Bank of England consistently gave throughout the summer was the desire to avoid overheating the economy. Sadly, that is no longer a problem. Nor would a cut in interest rates be an artificial help to manufacturing industry; it would be good sense. It is in our national interest that the goods that we produce, as long as they are well designed, well marketed and competitive in every other way, should be able to compete, particularly in Germany, France and Italy, without being inhibited by the level of the pound.

The economy generally and manufacturing industry in particular would be helped if the Government widened the remit given to the Bank of England as part of its new independence to consider factors such as growth and employment as well as inflation. As hon. Members have said, Dr. Alan Greenspan's remit at the Federal Reserve bank is considerable wider than that of Mr. Eddie George.

Perhaps of even greater general importance to manufacturing industry is the Government's attitude. If they can bring the same concern, energy and imagination to manufacturing industry as they are undoubtedly bringing to electronic commerce and new technologies, that will be a huge improvement.

I would have liked to relate the theme of modernisation in the Queen's Speech to one piece of legislation that will not be introduced this year—a freedom of information Bill. It is a crucial element in modernisation and could be important in helping industry and therefore the economy. Freedom of information legislation could have helped the previous Government to identify some of the problems of bovine spongiform encephalopathy far earlier, thus avoiding much of the consequent damage to agriculture. However, the 15-minutes rule is against me and I look forward to plenty of opportunities in this Session to participate in the scrutiny of the draft freedom of information legislation that the Queen's Speech promises. I welcome that as an imaginative and important way of airing the difficult choices that lie behind the introduction of such legislation.

I look forward to the Government's implementation of the Queen's Speech and to a Queen's Speech next year that includes legislation on freedom of information and, I hope, some evidence of a sustained revival in manufacturing industry. Both contribute to the modernisation of society that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has set as our goal and both will demonstrate that modernisation is not a catch-all or a mantra, but a complex process with many facets through which we can and will enrich our society and our economy if we learn the lessons of the past as well as looking to the future. I believe that it will prove to be the best bulwark against the hard economic times whose shadow is, I fear, spreading across the globe.

8.10 pm

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): The majority of speeches so far have concentrated on the macro-economy and the euro. I want to concentrate on a central plank of the Government's economic policy that has been mentioned, only briefly, by the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Ms Kelly) and the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), who is no longer in his seat: the working families tax credit.

The working families tax credit puts me in a quandary. It is £1.5 billion for the low paid. Perhaps low paid is stretching it a bit, given that it will reach higher rate taxpayers, but in principle it is for the lower paid. On the whole, I tend to favour extra money for the poor and the low paid. However, that is about the only good thing that I can say about the scheme, because it is incredible how little evidence there is for the Government's views on how that £1.5 billion should be spent.

It is said that the working families tax credit will make work pay. That sounds laudable. It is said to be good for work incentives. Whom is it supposed to encourage into work? It applies to only two groups—lone parents and working couples or couples with children. The biggest barriers for lone parents are not primarily low pay or the incentive structure, but the availability of child care and jobs. In the debate some months ago on cutting lone parent benefit, the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) said that there were barely any vacancies at her local job centre, but there were dozens of lone parents looking for work. The failure to tackle the supply of jobs will not help incentives.

[Mr. Steve Webb]

There is a more fundamental issue. The Chancellor has cut the taper in the working families tax credit. Clearly, that will mean that fewer people will lose 70p in the pound at the margin, but more people will lose 50p in the pound at the margin. Is that unambiguously good for incentives? Where is the evidence? The Chancellor has not put any forward and I do not suppose that there is any. It is an act of faith.

What about the argument that paying the benefit through the pay packet rather than through the social security system will reduce stigma? Where is the evidence for that? The money will still have to be claimed. Where is the evidence that the take-up of the working families tax credit will be greater than the high take-up of family credit? There is none.

The key evidence that we have is that, when people on income support are asked what the biggest barriers are to moving off income support, they talk not about child care or the lack of in-work benefits for being a family, but about the lack of help with housing costs. If they take a low-paid job, they lose help with their mortgage or their rent rebate falls rapidly. The Government have missed a golden opportunity to address that. Those who take a low-paid job will lose all help with their mortgage. That is why people in my constituency tell me that they cannot afford to take a job. They will get a little extra help through the tax credit, but that will not come anywhere near covering mortgage repayments of, say, £400 a month.

What about child care? The child care subsidy seems to have been structured bizarrely. It will take us right up to the reaches of higher rate taxpayers. How can it be rational for state subsidy to reduce the cost of child care for higher rate taxpayers? The state will pay up to £100 a week towards the child care costs of children being looked after by their grandparents, provided that the grandparents jump through the hoop of becoming registered child minders. That is insulting on two grounds. First, why should the state be involved in subsidising grandparents looking after their grandchildren and, secondly, why should grandparents have to show that they are any good at bringing up children? It is bizarre for the state to be involved.

One of the key issues of the working families tax credit is paying it through the pay packet, typically to the man in a couple. In 80 per cent. of family credit cases, the principal breadwinner in the couple is the man. The Government were embarrassed about that initially and conceded that there would be choice for families, but there are fundamental problems. It will be in the families in which men are not good at passing on money to their wives that the women will have difficulty exercising the choice for the money not to be paid through the pay packet. I predict that the Government will weight the dice to ensure that the system discourages people from opting for anything other than payment through the pay packet. If large numbers of mothers opt to have the money paid through the benefit system rather than the pay packet, will not the Government's fundamental argument—that the big point about the tax credit is that it is better for incentives because there is no stigma because the money goes through the pay packet—be undermined? I intervened on the Chief Secretary on that point, but he did not really respond.

If most of the money does not go through the pay packet, why bother with the administrative mess of the tax credit? We could have the extra money, the lower tapers and the child care assistance through family credit. The key difference between family credit and the tax credit is the use of the pay packet, which the Government are letting people opt out of, so what is the point?

When fraud was mentioned, the Chief Secretary was dismissive of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field)—rather rudely, I thought. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead has a strong reputation for pursuing fraud in the benefit system and the tax system. The key issue is to design systems so that fraud is not an integral part of them. The American evidence on fraud is embarrassing. There was a huge fraud industry associated with the American tax credit scheme. There is every possibility that the same could happen with the British tax credit scheme. For a Treasury Minister to dismiss the issue as the rambling of a has-been is outrageous.

A thought that might be dearer to the heart of the Paymaster General, who is on the Treasury Bench, is the cost to business of administering the working families tax credit. Many small firms will have perhaps one or two employees on relatively low pay. They will have to pay out more on the working families tax credit than they hand over to the Treasury in income tax and national insurance. It has been said that they can claim the money back, but how far in advance can they do that? When will they know how much they have to pay? Wages go up and down as people join firms and others leave. How can small businesses know in advance how much tax credit they will have to pay if the amount keeps changing? Will they have to predict a month in advance to ensure that there is time for the money to come through? How will the cash flow problems of small businesses be addressed? The problem for small businesses is one of the many issues on which we have not yet had an answer. I hope that the Leader of the House will tell us when she sums up that, when the Bill is presented to the House, some of those issues will be addressed rather than brushed under the carpet.

My final point on the tax credit is the way in which it will work during periods of relationship and family breakdown. Family credit goes almost exclusively to the mother in a couple, who is typically the person with responsibility for the children. That is right. Suppose that the Government get their way and the tax credit is paid principally to the father through the pay packet. What happens when a relationship breaks down? We are not necessarily talking about marriage—although marriages also break down—but about any form of cohabiting relationship. Presumably the woman, who may have been a victim of domestic violence, has to contact the authorities to say that she is no longer living with her partner. The authorities then have to contact the employer, who tells the man that he will not be paid any tax credit that month. When he is told why, he says that he is still living with his partner. What happens then, how long will it take and what will the woman live off in the mean time?

The working families tax credit is dogma. It is American, so it sounds good, it sounds new, it sounds modern. It uses the tax system. A negative tax sounds good whereas dreadful old welfare sounds bad. There is precious little evidence to back up the suggestion that it will be any better than similar improvements to family credit would have been. Putting more money into family credit with lower tapers and a better structure of child care would have been admirable. Why all this nonsense about paying it through the pay packet, paying it to men and putting burdens on business? It has not been thought through. I hope that the new Bill will be an improvement on what we have heard so far.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): I welcome the content of the Gracious Speech, including the proposed legislation on the working families tax credit. I have not looked at it in detail, but I am fully aware that it is targeted on low-paid workers and will provide up to £220 a week free of tax. That will mean a minimum of £5.50 an hour for a low-paid worker with one child and of £6.40 an hour for an adult with two children, and that will help to make work pay and to eliminate the poverty trap. I very much welcome those measures.

In the economic arena, I welcome the Bill on financial services and the markets. We know that much better regulation is needed in the City—in the stock exchange and in Lloyd's—and I am sure that the Bill will accomplish that.

The debate has been general, covering many aspects of the British and world economies. I shall direct most of my comments to the prospects for our economy over the next few years. We are all aware that a difficult year lies ahead, partly because of the high pound which we inherited but which went even higher as interest rates were increased and as sterling became a safe haven for those speculating against the euro and the Asian currencies. However, we are now recovering from those problems. Interest rates are falling and the pound has dropped 10 per cent. from its peak value back to the level that we inherited.

Global problems—in Asia, particularly Japan, in Russia and to some extent in south America—mean that the growth forecast for next year has been revised down to 1 to 1.5 per cent. We all hope that that growth will be achieved but other forecasts challenge whether it will be—we shall have to wait and see.

I am pleased that, in the thick of things next year, there will be a large reflationary package at the very time that one is needed—the £40 billion for health and education will come on stream from next April. That will involve capital expenditure, which will be a big boost for the construction industry and those who manufacture health care equipment, for example. It will also involve labour intensive employment, as more teachers, nurses and health care workers will be needed. It will inject demand into the economy at a time when manufacturing continues to face problems.

The minimum wage will also take effect from next April, and that will help hundreds of thousands of low-paid workers. The £2.95 extra in child benefit will particularly help young people with families, who are among the poorest in the community. Those measures will be socially progressive and redistributive; by giving greater spending power to poorer people, they will also help to sustain the economy.

Looking further ahead, I think that interest rates will unquestionably fall, first to 6.75 per cent. Labour Members and people outside the House—from industry and from the trade unions—are calling for further reductions.

In his comments to the TUC last September, Eddie George made it clear that the 2.5 per cent. inflation target was symmetrical—when inflation is more than 2.5 per cent., the Monetary Policy Committee must raise interest rates, but when it seems as though it will in 12 or 18 months be less than 2.5 per cent., the judgment must be to lower interest rates. The system contains an automatic stabiliser. Opposition Members have magnified the doom and gloom this evening; they have tried to talk us into deep recession. However, if what Eddie George says is true, we can look forward to interest rates reducing to 6 or even 5 per cent. by the end of next year.

As interest rates fall, there will be a boost to economic growth. I am sure that Treasury forecasts for 2000–01 are based on the underlying assumption—it cannot be spelt out, as the Chancellor may not reveal market-sensitive figures—that interest rates will fall to below 5 per cent. in one or two years, and that will stimulate growth.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Williams: I will not, as so many Labour Members want to speak and I want to confine my remarks.

The fact that the 2.5 per cent. inflation target is symmetrical makes it much wiser than the target of the European central bank. The European economy generally is suffering. One of the dangers for the euro is that the European target is for an inflation rate of less than 2.5 per cent. There is no automatic mechanism whereby, when inflation is at 1.5 or 1 per cent., interest rates will be reduced. In Germany, for example, interest rates are holding up despite the fact that inflation is not a problem—it is virtually zero—whereas unemployment certainly is one.

I hope that, over the next few years, through the influence of Oskar Lafontaine and eventually ourselves, the European central bank will operate on the same terms as the Bank of England, so that interest rates are automatically reduced to stimulate demand when the rate of inflation falls below its 2.5 per cent.

I believe that, in three to five years, the problem will be how to control the boom. Interest rates are destined to fall to 6 or even 5 per cent., but we want Britain to be able to join the euro by the time of the next general election, so interest rates must have fallen not only to 4 or 3 per cent. but to whatever level European interest rates are in 2001.

If the Bank of England reduces interest rates too rapidly, there is a real danger of an uncontrolled boom in property and land prices. However, we have dealt with the problems that may arise in the next 12 months very well thanks to the package of public expenditure that will come into effect next April. The problem at the time of the next general election will be how to control the demand that will be injected into the economy when interest rates fall to 4 and 3 per cent.

On the euro, there is no question but that the European economy needs massive reflation and a co-ordinated expansion. On the world scene, Europe has a balance of payments surplus of $100 billion, whereas the United States carries a deficit of $200 billion—and thank goodness for that, as it is propping up the world economy. We need expansion in Europe not only to absorb Asian goods and the exports of countries that are drifting into deeper recession, but to provide employment for our people.

[Mr. Williams]

I know that the Government's policy is to encourage at European summits a strategy for jobs, growth and economic expansion. The slack exists for that and the world economy requires it. I feel that 1998–99 will be difficult but, beyond that, I am very optimistic that the Government are on track for solid growth and achievement in Britain's economy.

8.30 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I hope that the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Mr. Williams) is right in his positive approach to the economy, but I take the gloomy end of expectations. No former Soviet Union country has yet got back to its gross domestic product of 1989, and their targets mean, if they are successful, that they will return to such levels in about 2002. Similarly, Indonesia, where we are the largest investor, is at a standstill and Japan's problems remain unresolved. The particular importance of all this to the United Kingdom is that we are proportionately the largest exporter among all the major countries. If other countries cannot afford to import, we will be proportionately the heaviest losers. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is not responsible for economies overseas but he is responsible for his forecasts, for sticking to one that no one else believes and, above all, for the blunder of fixing public expenditure for three years in his first Budget. He will live with that for the next two years.

I want to restrict myself to the matter in respect of which the Government probably raised the highest hopes about thinking the unthinkable: pension provision. The right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) was given the brief of following through the Labour party manifesto pledge to "lay the foundations for a modern welfare state in pensions and community care."

After an unhappy 18 months, he found it necessary to leave. This is a crucial, much misunderstood sector. I have a declarable interest in that I am chairman of a pension fund. I am not a beneficiary but it gives me an interest in the subject.

The issue is urgent. A recent NatWest survey showed that a weekly income of £179 a week per person is needed to provide what was defined as "financial contentment" in retirement. A pensioner with less than £106 a week would face financial difficulties. On that basis, one in five people currently working are heading for a comfortable retirement, half are heading for financial difficulty, and a third will be entirely reliant on state benefits. If we compare the figure of £179 for a comfortable retirement with the single pension of rather more than £70 and the couple's pension of rather more than £110, plus income support if relevant—if that is paid, council tax and rent will also be paid—we are way off the level necessary for comfortable retirement.

The half of the population that is funded in pension schemes is well funded. Britain has about £850 billion in pension assets, which is equivalent to 77 per cent. of GDP, compared with a tiny 7 per cent. in France and 14 per cent. in Germany. There is a growing gap in pension provision that the Government, if they were compassionate, would deal with.

I am sure that there is a significant lack of understanding among people about pension provision, partly because it is a long way off and not something that they can really grasp and partly because the sums of money involved are very large. Take the single pension of £70 and consider how much it would cost to increase it to the amount deemed by NatWest to provide comfortable retirement: another £100 a week. To fund that, we need to apply a multiplier of about 16, so £80,000 would be required to yield the necessary £5,000 a year to make someone up from current pension provision to the amount deemed to be comfortable. The amounts are large.

What have the Government done? What could they do? I recognise that this is not the policy of either party, but I believe that it is necessary to increase the basic state pension. When the Conservative Government linked the basic state pension to prices rather than incomes, it was necessary because it was a crucial ingredient in our fight against inflation. However, the comparative diminution of the state retirement pension has gone too far and an integral part of pension planning should be to increase it.

Secondly, we must help those with the lowest incomes to enable them to provide for their own pensions. Significant amounts are involved: something like 15 per cent. of income is necessary to build up that sort of funding. The first tranche of support that an individual at the lowest level gives to his pension merely raises him to the means-tested benefit and so is completely wasted. He would get nothing back for it if his contribution did not take him comfortably above the means-tested level. Compulsion is clearly a necessary element, or there would no reason for the poorest to save for retirement.

In dealing with this conundrum and planning the way ahead, the Government are committed to "deliver significant savings over the longer term"

from the social security budget. We have a conflict: better pensions versus significant savings—how to square the circle. I believe that it can be done. The authority that I quote, rather to my surprise, is Lady Castle, who wrote with Professor Peter Townsend a booklet entitled, "We can afford the Welfare State". The three principles that she spells out are correct. First she says:

"If we want to encourage people to move from welfare to work, we must reduce the area of means-testing, not extend it."

The right hon. Member for Birkenhead understood that, Lady Castle does and I certainly do. It is disappointing that the Government are going down the means-testing road.

Secondly, the booklet states:

"We must resurrect the state basic pension as the foundation of security in old age for everyone."

I agree. Thirdly, it states:

"It should be compulsory for everyone to contribute an adequate second pension."

I agree with that, too.

The Government have gone for the opposite route and run for cover by resorting to means-testing. That is the coward's way out and is unfair. It gives benefit to those in the greatest need, but where does it leave those who have made substantial sacrifices to provide for themselves? It erodes incentive and is socially corrosive. It is also very expensive. A universal benefit costs 2.5 per cent. of the total cost to administer but a means-tested one costs about 7 per cent.

In response to parliamentary questions, I have elicited the fact that heating allowances cost 10 per cent. of their total cost to administer. Those are very large amounts that result in substantial bureaucracy. The basic state pension can be administered for 45p a week while income support costs £5.45 a week. Those differences are so enormous that they must be taken into account with the argument of fairness.

What have the Government done so far on pensions? They have achieved one major act—the abolition of advance corporation tax relief for pension funds. That will reduce the amount available to pension funds by £3.9 billion this year and £5.4 billion next year. As an article in The Economist said on 6 December 1997,

"A Government keener on redistributive clobbering of the middle classes without breaking its pledge not to raise income tax rates might have dreamed up something exactly like this."

It has caused damage to pension funds and those who benefit from them.

The way that it works through means that Kensington and Chelsea has estimated that the changes to advance corporation tax provision mean that it will have to find a further £1 million a year, the equivalent of £12 on the average council tax bill for bands B to D. The Chancellor has cost pension funds over the next 10 years £50 billion. As has been pointed out, Robert Maxwell took only £400 million.

The Government promised legislation on pensions without specifying its content. They have promised a Green Paper. So far, their influence on pensions has been entirely malign and damaging. I urge the Government to do their duty to pensioners, and I urge present and future pensioners to wake up to what the Government are doing to them.

8.40 pm

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South): To hear the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) talk, one would not think that a Tory Government had plundered pension funds and, in the 1980s, encouraged people to go into private pension schemes. He seems to forget that the Labour Government have reduced value added tax to help pensioners, whereas the previous Government increased VAT, thereby punishing pensioners and one-parent families. I am sure that he is well aware that the Labour Government have been considering not only pensions, and will make proposals in that respect at some time in the future, but have at least tried to do something for pensioners in the meantime.

Many pensioners find it difficult to afford their winter fuel bills, so the Government have reduced VAT on fuel and made winter payments to pensioners to help them. I remember that, when we sat on the Opposition Benches, time after time at about this time of year, many of my hon. Friends raised the question of winter chill payments. Year after year, the then Conservative Government turned down my hon. Friends' requests.

I welcome the fact that the Government have put in £250 million to help the national health service deal with winter problems. That, too, will help pensioners, as it is the elderly population in particular that suffers from the general increase in illness this time of year. Despite all the doom and gloom that we have been hearing, I welcome the £40 billion that the Government are to put into health and education over a three-year period.

The Government are doing that despite the economic position that we inherited from the previous Government. The economic measures outlined by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will deal with long-term instabilities in the British economy, while allowing us to steer a stable course through the difficult times that we are experiencing. We are addressing the long-term economic problems that we inherited from the previous Government. I remind Opposition Members that we inherited a 20 per cent. productivity gap between the UK and France and Germany, and one of 40 per cent. between the UK and the United States of America.

Before Opposition Members rush to the barricades, I should say that I am not criticising the workers. Let me make it clear that I am not talking about the average factory worker; I am talking about low levels of investment, which mean that, no matter how hard an individual works, the lack of adequate machinery, tools and technology lowers his productivity. When we look further into the previous Government's record, we find that, when they left office, one in five households had no one working, up from one in 10 in 1979 when the Labour Government left office. We also find lower levels of basic skills in literacy and numeracy than those of other major economies.

No one would deny that we are experiencing a downturn in the world economy. The problem in 1979 was that, when the downturn occurred, the Tories refused to recognise it, preferring to blame the previous Labour Government, just as they blame the current Labour Government now. United Kingdom exports to Indonesia and Malaysia have fallen by 50 per cent.; to South Korea by 55 per cent.; and to Thailand and Philippines by 60 per cent. The crisis affects the whole world, but, to listen to Opposition Members, one would think that it started in May 1997, when the Labour Government took office.

To set the international context, the International Monetary Fund has revised its forecasts for world growth downward, from 4 to 2.5 per cent. That could fall further as the economic situation changes. World trade growth is set to fall by two thirds. Given those problems, we welcome the Government's determination to get things right and address the weaknesses in our system, which was so neglected by the previous Government.

We welcome the new monetary framework for monetary policy, with the Monetary Policy Committee setting interest rates to reach Government targets free from political control. Also welcome are the long-term targets for interest rates, which bring stability to economic planning. Although interest rates have risen, at 6.75 per cent. they are at their lowest for 30 years, and inflation is hitting its 2.5 per cent. target. I remember when, under the Tories, the public sector borrowing requirement grew to £400 billion. They managed by slashing public spending and getting the receipts from privatisation.

The public understand the need for fiscal tightening equal to 3.5 per cent. of gross domestic product over the years 1996–97 to 1999–2000. They also understand why a reduction in borrowing—by £20 billion last year—and tight control over spending are needed to ensure that spending grows at a slower rate during the lifetime of this Parliament. In less than two years, we have achieved a balanced budget, which is something that the Tories did not do in 18 years.

[Mr. Jim Cunningham]

Although I acknowledge manufacturers' short-term concerns, which are of particular concern to me, I welcome the Government's long-term view and determination to avoid boom and bust, which can affect and erode our industrial base. Instability could and would have been worse had the Government not taken the decisions that they took. As manufacturers have pointed out, the recession can be put down to the downturn in the global economy.

Despite all that, the number of jobs continues to grow: 400,000 new jobs have been created since the election; 250,000 people leave the claimant count each month; and 200,000 new vacancies are notified to job centres each month. In addition, the Government have set up rapid reduction units to deal with redundancies and provide localised help where job losses have occurred. They will be welcome in many parts of the country, providing temporary job centres and job advisers, fast-track help with benefits claims, immediate eligibility for training and travel costs for interviews. That demonstrates the benefit of having a Government with a progressive agenda, as opposed to a reactionary Conservative one, with Ministers preaching from on high about problems that they have never had to experience.

Another issue on which the Tories failed was youth unemployment, so I am delighted that the Labour Government have decided to tackle long-term, youth and single-parent unemployment head on. There are 125,000 people on the new deal, with 23,000 already having found work. In addition, the number of lone parents on benefits is falling and many young people have been given hope. We are helping the most vulnerable instead of throwing them to the wolves of uncertainty and helplessness. That will also play a part in tackling crime and disorder.

The wider reforms to the tax and benefits system announced in the Queen's Speech will be well received in many parts of the country. The reduction in national insurance, the new working families tax credit and the minimum wage will help those in greatest need. Although the economic problems that we face are international, the Government have done much to stabilise our economy while, at the same time, protecting the most vulnerable.

Mr. William Thompson (West Tyrone): We have listened to many speeches tonight, some from former Ministers and hon. Members who have Treasury experience and many from those who are economics experts. If one speaker has argued one case, the next has argued the opposite—that is certainly true of the speeches referring to the single currency and economic and monetary union.

I am a Euro-sceptic. I remember our going into the Common Market, as it then was. We were told that every member state had a veto and that, if one member state disagreed with a policy, nothing would happen. Of course, after we had entered, if we disagreed we were told that we were not good partners. After some time, changes were made and majority or weighted voting was introduced. Over the years, we have seen the effect of that in the issuing of a large number of directives, many of which are neither prudent nor necessary, but over which we have had little or no control.

We have now moved towards political union. There is no doubt that many in the European Union are looking forward to political union, and the single currency is the first necessary step towards that union. If one controls the money and the finances, one has, in effect, political union. Those who are enthusiastic about political union at least now acknowledge that public opinion does not favour it. In fact, we have been told—even tonight—that there is no guarantee that political union will work. I think that it would be dangerous to enter an arrangement that has no guarantee of success without some fallback position, or even an idea of what we will do if that arrangement fails. I believe that there are many dangers inherent in the new single currency.

I have no doubt that the Government intend, sooner or later, to take us into economic and monetary union and the single currency. Efforts are being made to prepare us for entry, and no doubt the Government will seek to change public opinion in the referendum that decides our course. When preparations for entry are made, we will be told that we have gone too far and cannot turn back. I believe that the Government's policies are geared to that end. That is dangerous as it will weaken our means of determining our own policies.

I refer hon. Members to the events of the past two years and to our experiences of the beef crisis. When we consider how our European colleagues have acted, we can have no confidence that we would have much say over our affairs in the context of European political union. This Parliament would eventually become powerless.

Northern Ireland benefits greatly from being part of the United Kingdom. Our economy benefits particularly from subventions of about £3 billion or £4 billion a year. We acknowledge and appreciate that advantage. We live beside the Irish Republic, which wishes eventually to take us over. There have been many arguments in the past few months about agreements and the future of Northern Ireland, but little has been said about how we benefit from being part of the United Kingdom. We need to discuss that subject, which must be at the forefront of debates in the days and months ahead. Those who advocate a united Ireland must tell us where they will get the money to finance it.

The Northern Ireland economy is very dependent on agriculture. Some 60,000 people are employed in the agri-food industry, which represents 25 per cent. of our manufacturing base. We welcomed the early lifting of the beef ban, especially in relation to the date-based scheme. We hope that other measures will be taken soon so that more animals and more beef may be exported and our economy will no longer be affected by that great crisis that has hindered us in the past few years.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate on the Queen's Speech. I wish to touch upon the effects that the economic policy outlined in the Queen's Speech will have on the poorest. Hon. Members will know that I represent in Hackney, North and Stoke Newington one of the poorest constituencies in the country, which has one of the highest levels of unemployment in the south-east. I shall examine the Government's economic policy in the light of a very important report about inequalities in health that was published last week. The inquiry was chaired by Sir Donald Acheson.

Earlier this evening, we heard the Chief Secretary advance what has become the Government's mantra: the best route out of poverty is work. Like many of the Government's mantras, that is a truism—the best route out of poverty is work. However, the Government must address, because they have yet to do so with sufficient clarity, what they will do for those sections of society who, with the best will in the world, cannot enter or re-enter the labour market. Sir Donald Acheson put it clearly in his report. He said:

"For the least well-off members of society, it is the benefit system which is the principal determinant of living standards."

When I tried to put to the Chief Secretary Sir Donald Acheson's proposition that certain basic benefits must increase, he said that the report was written before the Government's Budget and our wonderful, progressive child benefit measures. That is quite wrong. Page 34 of the report discusses the Government's Budget measures in full. In the context of those measures, the report says that benefits must increase for the poorest groups. The report states:

"We believe it is important that over time benefits and pensions levels are set at a level sufficient to pay for items and services necessary for health and for participation in society."

Acheson singles out two of the very poorest groups: pensioners and women with very young children.

The Labour party once had a policy of restoring the link between pensions and earnings. It was a sad day when that policy was dropped. Means-tested benefits—which is what the Treasury Bench is offering instead—are not a viable alternative for pensioners, in particular. More than 1 million pensioners fail to claim the means-tested benefits to which they are entitled. More than one in four pensioners who are eligible to claim extra means-tested benefits do not do so. It is not because they are silly or do not understand, it is because they are from a generation that finds claiming such benefits degrading, difficult and humiliating.

The only way to raise standards of living for the poorest pensioners in communities such as Hackney is to increase the level of the basic pension. As for encouraging people of all generations to put more money into the private pensions industry, before the Government press people to secure objectives that were once secured by the welfare state—whether it is security in unemployment, health insurance or private pensions—they must look to regulating the financial services industry. The private pensions mis-selling scandals of the 1980s revealed the structural problems in the financial services area, with commission-driven salesmen and a lack of transparency.

I come now to mothers with young children. The Government seem to be saying to mothers with pre-school-age children that, if they want to raise their standard of living and rise out of poverty, they must go to work. I am a single mother. I was back here voting and playing my part in the work of the House when my son was eight days old. It is precisely because I am a single mother and I know how hard it is to leave a small baby that I would not insist that mothers with children under school age should have to go out to work to secure a decent standard of living. At present, they do not have to make themselves eligible to work, but the trend of Government rhetoric and thinking on that matter worries me.

Despite the many good things that are being done in the name of the working families tax credit—there was a very interesting speech about that earlier—the Government must address the fact that there are people, such as pensioners and women with young children, who will not lift themselves out of poverty by going into the workplace. We need to secure at least for those groups a decent standard of living through the benefit system.

The Government's professed goals on raising standards of living for the poor and lifting people out of poverty are admirable, but none of the measures in the Queen's Speech, including the working families tax credit and the on-going new deal programme, can be effective in the absence of growth. Those who talk about prospects for growth tend to be shouted down by Labour Members and accused of talking down the economy. It is not a question of talk; it is a question of figures. We do not need to look into a crystal ball—we need only to read the book.

Manufacturing sectors are in recession or are about to go into recession. Over time, the sectors that have a problem with the over-valued pound and interest rates will take the entire economy to the bottom of the recessionary cycle. In a recession, it is no good saying that work is the route out of poverty or talking about the new deal.

My next point relates to Europe. I am not hostile to Europe and I deplore the scarcely veiled xenophobia in the tabloid press, but it is important that we begin to have an honest debate about Europe. There may well be a political case for greater European integration and, in my son's lifetime, there may well be something approaching a federal Europe, but I deplore the dishonest debate on Europe in British politics.

Anybody who pretends that we can proceed towards monetary convergence and integration without fiscal convergence and integration following as night follows day is fooling the British public. There may be a political case for that level of economic integration and for moving towards a federal Europe, but it is wrong to pretend to the British public that there can be monetary convergence while different economies in the European Union have free-standing fiscal policies. That cannot happen. The sooner we have a more transparent and honest debate about what the move towards economic and monetary union means for the totality of economic policy, the better that will be for politics and the good name of this House.

There is much to support in the Queen's Speech, but my concern remains what it has been for the 10 years in which I have been in the House—how will the measures of the Government of the day help my constituents in Hackney? I am concerned about the lack of focus on the importance of raising basic benefits for pensioners and the poorest people.

I am also concerned about monetary policy. It is driven by a great man—Eddie George—but he should never have been let loose untrammelled on monetary policy. I am concerned about the deflationary tendency of monetary policy and prospects for growth. I am concerned about the lack of honesty about the big issue facing us at the end of the millennium—what economic and monetary union means and the price that ordinary people such as my constituents might have to pay if we go into EMU without sufficient thought and understanding.

9.3 pm

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): I am grateful for the chance to contribute to a debate on the Gracious Speech, which has at its core a commitment to delivering economic stability.

[Mr. David Ruffley]

One of the central elements of economic stability is the Treasury's ability to set an independent tax policy. Therefore, I was particularly interested to hear the Chief Secretary say earlier that he would be tough about using the veto to prevent any harmonised tax proposals being imposed on this country. We have heard warm words from Ministers over the past couple of days in the face of a backlash from the press and public about the threat to the country's economic management arising from remarks by EU Finance Ministers and Commission officials.

Conservative Members are staggered by Ministers' complacency. They said that such comments were just a Euro-sceptic invention and that, somehow, the people on the continent who were making them were of little significance and of no consequence.

We know that there is a threat of tax harmonisation from Brussels because the Prime Minister says one thing in No. 10 briefings to the press, but Treasury Ministers say another. In the Financial Times this week, the Prime Minister said that he wanted all proposals on tax harmonisation to be considered pragmatically. He is worried that we may be left out of the game as EU partners harmonise more quickly in a headlong rush to make headway in launching the European single currency.

A gentleman called Mario Monti is the EU Commissioner for the single market. I should like to expose the "Full Monty" of a set of proposals referred to as the draft code of conduct for business taxation, to which the Government signed up in October 1997. This draft code is very interesting because, as a result of discussions about it, instead of being in her place, the Financial Secretary is chairing a meeting at which no fewer than 85 tax breaks and reliefs will be abolished. At least 10 of them are enjoyed in this country. They include tax breaks for the British film industry, shipbuilding, small and medium enterprises in Northern Ireland and much else besides.

The Financial Secretary is bargaining away tax breaks, which were certainly enjoyed in this country until the election, because the Government are harmonising tax reliefs. If that is not creeping harmonisation, we on the Opposition Benches do not know what is. Creeping harmonisation is a threat. The press knows it, the public know it and the Opposition will never let Ministers forget it—up to the next election and beyond.

9.7 pm

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): I am grateful to be called in this debate.

In their amendment, the Opposition have set out to criticised the Government for failing to take steps to protect jobs and help businesses. In doing so, they are exercising selective amnesia. They cannot stand only on their six-month record in the run-up to the election. They must stand on the record of their entire 18 years in government, which was not a golden era for the British economy.

In the 1980s, an enormous recession forced the collapse of manufacturing. I saw a steel foundry in Birmingham stripped down and sent off to the third world, and virtually the entire work force of the car industry put on the dole. Unemployment rose so fast that the welfare state collapsed and all Department of Health and Social Security offices shut. It was not the then Tory Government who saved jobs or helped businesses, but a Labour city council, which met the challenge of regenerating the local economy.

In the 1990s, recession in inner London, we saw unemployment rise to 35, 40 and 50 per cent. in key areas, and the creation of a divide between rich and poor that was a disgrace to this city. Measures on unemployment introduced by the Tory Government were aimed at producing headline figures and did not deal with long-term structural problems in inner cities. That is why the new deal is so right.

The new deal targets attention—money and personnel—at the real problems: the long-term unemployed and young people who grew up as a second generation of unemployed in what we call the Tories' golden legacy. Any such legacy went to the selected few and not the many, which is why the economic measures in the Queen's Speech are so important. In conjunction with the steps that the Government have already taken, they will ensure not just stable growth but that the benefits of that growth will be extended to the many.

Our policies for education will give people the skills that they need to participate in the economy; the working families tax credit will ensure that work pays; and the child care tax credit will give many women the first chance to go out to work. In particular, I emphasise the reforms that the Government are making to financial services regulation, which will ensure that more people are empowered to benefit from the economy.

Mrs. Thatcher wanted more people to invest, but she failed to provide the security that people needed to do so with confidence. The Government are encouraging investment by the public—for example, by extending employee share ownership and introducing individual savings accounts—and providing more security by, among other things, passing the financial services and markets Bill.

Let me consider just two forthcoming measures. I am sure that the ability to take civil proceedings in cases of market abuse will help to restore confidence in the probity of the City, which, in turn, can only help to encourage people to invest. A second measure to place the various forms of financial regulation under a single umbrella will benefit the interests of the public by making it easier for them to obtain redress when things go wrong.

The biggest financial commitment that most of my constituents will ever make is the purchase of a home. In the dying days—literally—of the previous Government, I toured housing estates in my constituency to study the problem of repossession. House after house was boarded up—another sad testament to the so-called golden legacy of Tory Britain. By unifying and simplifying regulation, and by providing more safeguards for that most basic of investments, the Government will protect people's long-term financial security, and the long-term future of the financial services industry.

The drive behind the Queen's Speech is to build a sound economy; ultimately, that is what my constituents will judge the Government by. Measures set out in this year's Queen's Speech will ensure that those benefits are extended to the majority of people in our communities. I commend it to the House.

9.11 pm

Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): Tonight's debate has been rehearsed many times and we have discussed the economy many times, but this time the debate is vital, because our country's future depends on getting the economy right. The debate also affords us the opportunity to examine the Gracious Speech, and to anticipate the effects of the Government's proposals for our economy for the next year—so it is very timely.

It is important to pose a series of questions relating to the Government's handling of the economy, and specifically their guiding principles of economic management. Does the Government's approach—and the proposals in the Queen's Speech—make it easier for firms to produce goods at lower cost? Does it make it easier for companies to invest? Does it reduce the tax burden on individuals and companies? Does it make it easier and cheaper for firms to take on staff? Does it make it easier for individuals to invest in their own future?

I fear that all those questions must be answered in the negative. The raid on pension funds; the increased regulation of financial services; the flunked welfare reforms; the increased trade union recognition; the extension of maternity leave to 18 weeks; and the introduction of the working families tax credit add up to a package of damage which can only increase costs and regulation and destroy the competitiveness of the British economy—the economy that the previous Government fought so hard to maintain. All that before we even address the minimum wage and the social chapter.

I believe that most members of the Treasury team have never run a business—except, of course, the Paymaster General; at times, he must wish that he had run several fewer businesses. I have run a business: I know what it is like to run one in hard times. It has been difficult on occasions—difficult for small and medium businesses, which must now face the current economic climate. Those businesses were the backbone of the country's economic success in the 1980s.

The Government must ensure that small business is at the forefront of their economic policy. Let me tell Labour Members that the smaller companies, which represent the bulk of employment and economic activity, are voicing grave concern. As we know, business confidence is at its lowest for 18 years. People and businesses are extremely nervous—in my judgment, rightly so—because times have been tough for them. The international economy has, of course, been a factor, but they have suffered from high interest rates and the high pound and they have suffered in many other ways, as a result of the Government's so-called social legislation.

The Government tell us that the minimum wage and the social chapter are good for those who are in work. Perhaps that is right, but not if the effect of the Government's measures is to pile on costs, make the company uncompetitive, lead to closure and put workers out of a job. The minimum wage and the social chapter are useless for those who are out of work and for those who are seeking to enter employment. The policies that they need are ones that help companies grow through efficiency and by exporting successfully through deregulation and low tax. In short, these are policies that would build on the success that the economy was enjoying before Labour Members got their hands on the levers of power.

Labour has given away one of the levers—the control of interest rates—to the Bank of England. We hear this every Wednesday when the Prime Minister comes here to answer questions. The right hon. Gentleman tells the House each week that the Opposition are against independence for the Bank of England. Each week, he invites my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition to answer his questions. One wonders sometimes whether the Prime Minister would prefer to be on the Opposition Benches asking questions rather than having to suffer the inconvenience of answering questions.

The point of Bank independence is not whether the Opposition are in favour or against it, but that the Government have created a mess of their own making. It was their decision to give independence to the Bank, as it was their decision to set the Bank a narrow remit. It is their choice to pack the Monetary Policy Committee with people with no real experience of the sharp end of business. A serious consequence of their actions is the current state of the economy. It is a cop-out for the Government continually to question the Conservative position on this issue. It is the Government who have to answer for their actions.

To compound the situation, the Chancellor of the Exchequer signed up to the "The New European Way", which commits the Government to the harmonisation of European Union tax policies. By doing so, the right hon. Gentleman has thrown in his hat with the new German Government, who are pledged to take forward economic harmonisation during their European presidency. Having signed that document, how can the Chancellor of the Exchequer declare himself opposed to the harmonisation that it advocates? It does not wash to declare a common system of value added tax and a withholding tax on cross-border savings as being no more than scare stories invented by the Opposition.

We are told that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will use the veto to protect British interests. As has already been said, however, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury chairs a working group of EU Finance Ministers which is drawing up plans to end so-called powerful tax competition among member states. How are we to believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer's protestations when the interim report is said to include more than 80 measures to address what has been described as unfair tax competition, and when some of which, if reports are true, are measures introduced by the Government? The Chancellor cannot have it both ways. He must now make very clear to his colleagues in Europe the promises that he has made to the British electorate that > " tax harmonisation is not the way forward for Europe. Britain's tax decisions will be made in Britain."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer must make clear how he sees the future for personal taxes and for corporate and business taxes. After all, the European tax Commissioner believes that the United Kingdom is "fully on board."

The more economically astute Government Members are beginning to realise that soundbites and spin do not run an economy. A task force here, consultation there and a denial when expedient are no substitute for a clear tax policy and a drive for competitiveness in the British economy. Warm words are little comfort against a background of job losses and fear for the future. For so many years, when in opposition, the Chancellor of the Exchequer predicted recessions, downturns and busts. The right hon. Gentleman may now be about to fulfil his predictions through his own actions.

[Mr. Christopher Fraser]

I have referred before to the fact that my constituency is truly the enterprise centre of Dorset. We have many businesses and a high level of employment. However, 18 months into the Labour Government, the mood of optimism in Dorset is giving way to a degree of concern and pessimism. Businesses in my constituency do not see coherence or substance in the Government's economic policies. They do not believe that the Government have enough understanding of business to create an environment that is friendly to it. The Government are leading the economy into a dark alley. The British people will pay a heavy price for the Government's folly. In turn, they will ensure that the Government pay a price for what they are doing to an economy which was, such a short time ago, the enterprise centre of Europe.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): It is my privilege, for the second year in succession, to wind up for the Opposition in the debate on the Queen's Speech. More than 120 hon. Members have taken part in the debate, including a Prime Minister, a former Prime Minister, a former Deputy Prime Minister, a former Chancellor and a large number of right hon. and hon. Members.

It seems a long time since the Queen's Speech left Bassetlaw and Edinburgh, Pentlands a week ago, but it got off to a cracking pace thanks to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, whose parliamentary performances were rightly recognised by the judges of The Spectator parliamentarian of the year award the following day. Those of us at the ceremony witnessed the pride with which my right hon. Friend accepted that award, and the pleasure that it gave the Deputy Prime Minister to present it to him.

To be impartial, I shall congratulate the Leader of the House on her recent Variety performance in aid of charity, which attracted some colourful, if mixed, comments. One newspaper reporter, a braver man than I am, described her voice as having the potential to "stun charging bullocks" and "keep mosquitoes at bay".

I remind the right hon. Lady of some words that she used not on that occasion, but five years ago when she was shadow Leader of the House, speaking as I am now at the end of the debate on the Address. She said:

> "The Government's programme, as embodied in the Queen's Speech, was rightly described by my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition as thin. Tonight, after six days of debate, we know clearly why... The purpose of this Queen's Speech has been . . . to fob us off with rhetoric, sound bites and scapegoats."—[Official Report, 25 November 1993; Vol. 233, c. 662.]

Those words seem more appropriate tonight than when the right hon. Lady originally spoke them.

Our debate this afternoon was opened by the Chief Secretary. He took some risks by making an assertion in his speech that he was unable to substantiate. We expect him to produce chapter and verse for his assertion that my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) has opposed the £40 billion on health and education. If he cannot produce that substantiation, I know that, as an hon. Member, he would want to withdraw his assertion.

The Chief Secretary sounded more and more like Baroness Thatcher as he outlined with relish how he would use the veto if certain European policies developed in a certain direction. However, he did not answer all the questions posed by my right hon. Friend. Having listened to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in a rather defensive performance on the "Today" programme this morning, and having listened to the Chief Secretary this afternoon, I am not wholly reassured about the Government's policies on tax harmonisation. It is a subject to which we shall want to return on many future occasions.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) made some kind remarks about the Opposition's amendment. I hope that that means that the Liberal Democrats will vote for it. I am sorry to see hon. Members shaking their head, as the hon. Gentleman said that the Opposition amendment was spot on. It is disappointing that the Liberal Democrats will not support us in the Lobby. The hon. Member for Gordon accused the Government of drift on Europe, implying rightly that, behind the facade, there are tensions, pulling the Government in opposite directions and inducing paralysis.

The next speech in the debate, that of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), brought to light some of those tensions on the Government Benches. In a brave speech that was somewhat off-message, he made it clear that he believed that we should be in the first wave when it comes to joining the euro. He referred to some of the risks that would confront the City of London if certain measures went ahead, and he took the House with him on that. He made some eminently sensible comments about the composition of the Monetary Policy Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell) said that we would hold the Government to the commitments that they gave today, and we will. He pointed out that we pay a price in terms of growth and employment if we delegate to the Bank an inflation target, with no other economic targets to go with it.

The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) made a good Keynesian speech, gently chiding the Government for a lack of clarity on policy on EMU. He made a brave attack on The Sun—the sort of attack that an hon. Member can make only if he has a blameless personal life.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Sir R. Whitney) reasserted that we left the economy in good shape. He rightly pointed out that the reduction of £20 billion in the public sector borrowing requirement was due to policies that the Government inherited, rather than policies that they implemented. He queried, as did a number of hon. Members, some of the more optimistic growth forecasts from the Treasury Benches.

I enjoyed the speech of the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies). It was a thoughtful speech that put the economy in a broader context—not just a European, but an international context. He explained economics in words that a child could understand, and his speech should be widely read.

From basic economics to advanced psychology: my right hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) was right to point out that climate, mood, confidence and the feel-good factor are important to economic success. At the moment, as he rightly pointed out, they are not there. He also expressed the hope that the Government would maintain the momentum on streamlining the tax system, into which he invested a lot of effort.

The right hon. Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) was one of the few speakers to focus on the less-developed countries and on the economic problems that confront them. He criticised the short-term approach, which can often harm the long-term development of those countries. He wanted to refocus globalisation to help rather than harm those countries, and he spoke with feeling and knowledge on an important issue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) described how he came face to face with President Castro—face to beard would be a better description of that encounter. My hon. Friend gave a cool assessment of the issues surrounding the launch of the euro and the terms of trade on the debate about the euro. He posed a number of questions, to which I hope that, at some point, the Government will be good enough to reply.

The hon. Member for Bolton, West (Ms Kelly) focused on the international system and made some perceptive comments about the need for reform of the international monetary system to take account of today's markets. She carried the House with her on that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) criticised the lack of vision in the Queen's Speech and outlined some retrograde steps that have been portrayed as forward looking.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) lifted his eyes beyond the horizon of the arts world, which has preoccupied him for so long, and made a thoughtful contribution—based on a realistic assessment of the economy—focusing on electronic trading and its potential. He rightly urged the House not to forget the importance of manufacturing industry.

The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) gave some warnings about the working families tax credit. Every Member on the Treasury Bench should read what he said, reinforcing points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith). The criticisms that he made about the working families tax credit demand a reply.

The hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Mr. Williams) welcomed the reflationary impact of the expenditure on health and education, but in so doing he slightly undermined the case that the Government have made by implying that reflation will be necessary in three years, when the Chancellor has been predicting some robust growth.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) described the impact of the world downturn on our economy and exports, and then spoke about the impact of the economy on pensions. He was the only hon. Member to focus specifically on pensions. He identified the Government's failure to answer a number of pension questions, after some false starts, and some possible solutions, quoting Baroness Castle as an ally.

The hon. Member for West Tyrone (Mr. Thompson) made a robust, Euro-sceptic speech. The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) picked up on the Acheson report and focused on those who cannot work. She invited the Government to come up with a more credible strategy for those for whom work is not an option. It was one of the most supportive speeches that I have heard the hon. Lady make in the House. For that reason, it was a slight disappointment to have to listen to it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) talked about tax harmonisation and rightly pointed out that a number of issues have not been resolved. Even as the debate is taking place, there are threats to the United Kingdom film and shipbuilding industries, to which we shall want to return.

I commend the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) for her patience in sitting all the way through the debate. I listened to what she said about the inner city, drawing on her time as leader of Southwark council. I remember working with her on regenerating some of the difficult estates in Peckham and Camberwell, and I hope that she exempted from her critical remarks the work of the Department of the Environment in the mid-1990s.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid–Dorset and North Poole (Mr. Fraser) focused on the supply side of the economy and rightly reminded us of the need to make sure that our industry remains competitive by looking at supply side measures.

Re-reading the Queen's Speech last night, and looking out for rhetoric and soundbites, I noticed that the word "modernise" appeared 12 times—10 times in the first two pages. It appeared 11 times in a much shorter article on the Queen's Speech written by the Prime Minister for this week's issue of The House Magazine.

That has been the spin—the Chief Secretary referred to that in his opening remarks—but what does it mean? When one considers the measures in the Queen's Speech, I do not think that it means a lot. Forcing GPs into a new relationship about which many of them are unhappy is, apparently, to "continue to build a modern National Health Service".

Taking cash away from some potential claimants on modest incomes is "to modernise legal aid". Saving £500 million from women whose husbands die young is "modernising benefits for widows". Removing incentives from the town hall to improve efficiency and quality of service is "to modernise local government in England and Wales".

Even this Government, however, are unable to describe their proposals for London, involving the appointment of a mayor—a post that dates back several hundred years—as "modernising", using instead the word "new". That shows the absurdity of trying to brand a speech or programme by applying one adjective to it: the verbal elastic simply snaps. Once we take off the label and look at the contents, we see that the Queen's Speech lacks coherence, shape and momentum—a point well made in The Times yesterday by Peter Riddell.

That leads me to my second point. Spending two or three days in my constituency in the middle of a six-day debate on the Queen's Speech demonstrated to me the difference between two worlds: the modernised world of the Queen's Speech, elegantly spun and crafted by wordsmiths—although, sadly, someone overlooked the need to equip the Prime Minister with the decent speech to which he was entitled—and the real world in which we and our constituents lead our daily lives.

In Labour's world, local government will be more efficient and more responsive. In the real world—given tomorrow's revenue support grant statement—all that the public in my constituency and, I suspect, elsewhere will get will be higher council taxes and more pressure on social services, aggravated by the need to make good the shortfall in pension funds caused by the raid in last year's Budget. Without a full local government Bill, the grand strategy for democratic renewal that the Deputy Prime Minister has been trumpeting will have to wait another year.

In Labour's world, on the very day of the Queen's Speech, the Deputy Prime Minister dreamt of bringing back the dawn chorus and the linnet. The Queen's Speech refers to protecting the environment, but, in the real world, the Deputy Prime Minister overrules county councils and makes them develop green-field sites that they do not want to develop. Hampshire county council's structure plan faces the threat of being overruled by the Government; in West Sussex, that has already happened.

In London—Labour's capital—the Government have promised

"a range of powers to help make London a world class city".

Some of us would assert that London was a world-class city long before the people's party arrived on the scene, but, apparently, it is not yet resilient enough to be entrusted to the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone). I must tell the Deputy Prime Minister that, until he implements a policy that will secure resources for London Transport, his strategy will lack credibility. We have heard some tough talk from the Government about improving rail services, but if the Deputy Prime Minister cannot make his Bills run on time, what chance has he of making the trains run on time?

In Labour's world, we are promised "strong arrangements for defence". In the real world, the defence budget has been cut—at a time of growing international uncertainty—and the Territorial Army has been savaged, in the teeth of opposition from the Defence Select Committee. In Labour's world, the wait for operations becomes shorter—if we believe Government figures—but, in the real world, my constituents must wait before even getting on to the waiting list. It has been necessary to wait 37 weeks for an out-patient appointment for treatment for varicose veins, and 31 weeks for endocrinology treatment at North Hampshire Hospitals NHS trust. I do not claim that those are life-threatening illnesses, but the figures show how misleading it is to refer to waiting times for operations when they are only part of the total waiting time.

In Labour's world, GPs will be enfranchised and put in charge of primary care groups. In the real world, doctors fear that they will be short-changed by the reforms, distracted from their professional commitments and turned into reluctant accountants and administrators.

Ms Keeble: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir George Young: I will give way once; then I must make progress.

Ms Keeble: Will the right hon. Gentleman accept my account of what is happening in the real world in my constituency, where GPs piloted GP commissioning? That has produced, for example, emergency pelvic scanning for women, which has probably saved lives and has certainly prevented serious conditions. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that GP commissioning is a powerful tool?

Sir George Young: In Andover in my constituency, there was a pilot for primary care groups—a pilot for stage 4—but, having talked to GPs locally, I know that there is concern that they will not receive Government back-up for the administrative support that they need, and they will be distracted from their primary job of looking after patients.

In Labour's world of industry, the Government talk of partnership. When she was Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the Leader of the House of Commons said that the proposals for union recognition were a new culture of partnership, but, in the real world, we have compulsion. On the economy, the subject of today's debate, the Queen's Speech talks about "high and stable levels of economic growth and employment . . . and greater job opportunities", but, in the real world, Rover has announced 2,500 job losses and people are losing jobs throughout the country—one job is being lost every 10 minutes. Last Friday, 4,200 jobs went in a single day, as firms grappled with the consequences of a high pound and high interest rates. Today, it was announced that another 1,000 jobs are to be lost at Courtaulds.

In Labour's world of education, teachers will be retrained and class sizes reduced, but, in the real world, the Government's pledge to cut class sizes for five to seven-years-olds is having an adverse effect. Class sizes for seven to 11-year-olds are shooting up. Teachers' independence and flexibility is being eroded and their hands are being tied. Successful grammar schools are threatened. In time, people will form their own conclusions as to whether Labour's world corresponds to the real world.

It is usual for the Leader of the House and the shadow leader to say a word about House of Commons matters. The House will know that the Modernisation Committee has been meeting, usually twice a week, grappling with matters of reform. We will be as constructive as we can, but we need to remember that our duties to hold the Government to account, to scrutinise legislation and to represent our constituents should come first, and that some personal inconvenience may be inevitable if that job is to be done properly.

To produce a manageable programme—not least to make way for House of Lords reform—many Bills have been ditched. That proposal will weaken, rather than improve, the scrutiny of legislation and the second Chamber's independence will be reduced.

The decision to abolish the voting rights of hereditary peers is the political equivalent of some French or German emperor who is poised to conquer Europe suddenly deciding to invade Russia. It is not just a diversion from the main objective; it will prejudice its attainment. The Government will get deeper and deeper into strange territory. They will run out of food and ammunition. Winter will close in and take its toll.

I can see only one benefit in rushing to abolish the hereditary peers. It might improve the chances of this House winning the annual tug of war once the upper House loses its fit, well-nourished and virile younger peers.

To compensate for the dearth of new measures in the Queen's Speech, the Government have reannounced some old ones; we are all familiar with the Government's habit of making the same announcements again and again. I understand that they have set a new target for next year: to save scarce resources, 60 per cent. of all new announcements will use recycled money.

In this great debate, what about the Liberal Democrats? It is an interesting phenomenon that, the higher the number of Liberal Democrat Members, the lower their enthusiasm to remain an independent party. If that paradox continued to its logical conclusion and they ever became the largest party, they would immediately apply to join a smaller one.

If I were a Liberal Democrat Member, I would be worried by the latest opinion poll. It shows not only that the Liberal Democrats are losing ground to the Conservatives, but that their leader's status is improving. I invite Liberal Democrat Members to reflect on that for a moment because, if that trends continues, he may be a popular general, but he will not have any troops.

The only real opposition to the Government is the Conservative Opposition. The Liberal Democrats do not oppose the Government; they urge them to go faster, to tax more, to spend more, to regulate and to intervene more.

During the Session, we will explain to our constituents the difference between the world of the spin merchants and the real world. We will explain that the measures in the Queen's Speech do not address the problems of the real world, ignore the priorities of Britain's people and instead pursue the Labour party's narrow, sectional interests.

We shall hold the Government to account. We shall do so, first, in Parliament—an institution that the Government seek to marginalise and sideline and that we Conservatives shall continue to defend. Having won the arguments in the House, we shall carry the arguments to a wider public, and bring about the ultimate defeat of this opportunistic and unprincipled Administration.

9.40 pm

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): The Gracious Speech—the second one of this Labour Administration—provides us with the opportunity of looking ahead to the coming year from the vantage point of 18 months of solid achievement. Although few could deny that achievement, many Opposition Members have tried to do so in this debate. Class sizes for five, six and seven-year-olds are coming down so sharply that we hope to fulfil our pledge on class sizes ahead of time. Hospital waiting lists have been falling monthly. Action is being taken to bring young offenders more speedily before the courts, and the new deal is in place and contributing to increased employment.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: No.

Over 50 pieces of legislation have been enacted, including legislation on modernisation of our constitution and the historic step of setting the first-ever national minimum wage. That action is important on its own, but it is not on its own. It stands in the context of proposals made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a working families tax credit, for a disabled persons tax credit and for the largest-ever increase in child benefit.

Before the general election, our widespread consultations with the business community produced some key concerns: economic stability; ending boom and bust; and, hence, a stable and consistent approach to economic policy. Placing control of interest rates in the hands of the Bank of England—which the Opposition threaten to reverse—was only the first of more widespread measures that contribute to sound management and good government.

Mr. Ruffley: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I have much to say and not much time. I shall give way later, if I can.

Using the public spending programme that we inherited gave us time to assess across government how public funds can best be used to pursue the people's priorities. Our decision was massively to increase investment in education and in health—£40 billion in total in those services over the next three years. That decision, our investment in transport and our decision to make the largest-ever investment in science policy rightly commanded both headlines and public attention.

As significant in the long term will be our action on reforming the management of public spending, setting a firm programme over three years so that Departments and agencies have more freedom sensibly to manage their money in those years, and our decision to ensure that investment of public money is matched by a commitment to both modernisation and reform. Our most difficult, but most crucial, decision was to establish a process whereby we judge the worth of the investment of public money on the outcome—on performance, and on what is delivered—rather than on the amount of money provided initially. All those actions are fundamental and long-overdue changes to the way in which we approach the management of public funds and the uses to which they are put.

The investment itself is made possible by sound economic management. Repayment last year of £20 billion of debt that we inherited from the Conservative Government, the firm grip that we have taken on inflation and—despite recent difficulties around the world—continued employment growth are all clear signs of a Government who know where they are going and how they intend to get there.

Mr. Ruffley: Will the right hon. Lady explain why the European Commission is predicting that, next year, UK economic growth will put us at the bottom of the European Union growth league?

Mrs. Beckett: The average of forecasts of the economy—of 44 independent forecasters—ties in with the forecasts made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

Mr. Ruffley: That does not answer the question.

Mrs. Beckett: Yes, it does. I assume that the hon. Gentleman, who presumes to be economically literate, realises that we are at a different stage in the economic cycle from the rest of Europe, as we were under the previous Government.

Mr. Bercow: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: No; I must get on.

As we lay the basis for economic prosperity, we take action to ensure that that prosperity and the opportunity that it brings are fairly shared—not because doing so is right in itself, although it is, but because it is in the interests of all. Britain can no longer afford for our people to be ill-trained and under-equipped. We can no longer afford a damaging and deteriorating transport infrastructure. We can no longer afford merely to wring our hands over the numbers of discoveries made in Britain but turned to economic advantage across the world by the economies of our competitors. To this Government has fallen the herculean task of changing those, Britain's historic weaknesses. Just as our management of the economy and public finances sets a long-term context in this Parliament and beyond, so too does our approach to legislation.

The proposals for constitutional reform in last year's and this year's Queen's Speech create a new democratic settlement in the United Kingdom. In our approach to health service reform, we seek a new and enduring direction for the delivery of health care, just as we seek to create a fresh balance—a fairer balance—that will contribute to improving Britain's competitiveness by our proposals for fairness in the workplace. In all those areas, we seek a fresh settlement which we hope will endure for years.

Last year, my right hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury, my predecessor in this post, brought to the House proposals to improve the way in which we work. I hope to take that process forward.

This coming year, we will publish more Bills in draft. We will submit more of those draft Bills to various methods of pre-legislative scrutiny. Pension sharing on divorce has already been examined by the Social Security Committee. Both Houses of Parliament will be asked to appoint a joint committee to examine the financial services and markets Bill and we hope that, next year, the Administration Committee will have an opportunity to report on our draft freedom of information Bill. The asylum and immigration Bill will go to a Special Standing Committee, allowing the taking of evidence.

From the start of this Session, every Government Bill will be accompanied by a statement as to whether it is compatible with the European convention on human rights and all Bills will be accompanied by new-style and better explanatory notes.

The House has also recently agreed to improve the scrutiny of European Union legislation and we will certainly seek agreement to bring into effect another procedure recently agreed—to start one or two Bills in the Commons late this Session and carry them over into the third Session to allow proper scrutiny.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to the Leader of the House for giving way. In disowning tax harmonisation this afternoon, should not the Chief Secretary also have disowned its euphemism, tax co-ordination, which, regrettably, has been enthusiastically supported by the German Finance Minister, Oskar Lafontaine?

Mrs. Beckett: As Mr. Lafontaine said this evening, he was speaking personally. He certainly was not speaking for the Government, as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary made crystal clear earlier. Mr. Lafontaine did not even claim to speak for the German Government, let alone ours.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister set the scene for the debates on the Queen's Speech, drawing on our commitment to modernise and reform to meet the priorities that we set ourselves and the people endorsed in the last general election. He set out how this year's Queen's Speech takes forward that programme. He drew attention to the strides already made on our first priority—education—the four pieces of legislation passed last Session, the additional £19 billion of expenditure allocated to our schools over the next three years and the series of programmes that those resources make possible that will allow us to pursue our aim that every child in every school in every part of the country will get a decent education. We shall continue to make proposals such as the Green Paper which will be shortly published on the teaching profession—a further building block in providing an improved education service.

Alongside our programme to improve standards in education is our drive to develop and strengthen our health service, not merely to care for those who fall sick, but to tackle the problems that create or foster ill health. We will invest in our health service some £21 billion over the next three years, with the biggest hospital-building programme in the history of the health service—certainly one far larger than the Liberal Democrats promised at the general election or since. Most important of all, and key to the Queen's Speech, we will be able to ensure that the money that is made available goes into patient care rather than bureaucracy.

I was astonished to hear the Leader of the Opposition say that our NHS Bill would increase bureaucracy. No British Government have ever weighed down the health service with bureaucracy as the Conservatives did. We will reverse that trend.

Cross-departmental working should deliver care geared to people's needs rather than to the boundaries of health or social care. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. There are far too many private conversations going on in the House. The House must settle down.

Mrs. Beckett: We shall promote an approach to clinical excellence and high standards of health care that builds on the best of the well-deserved reputation of our NHS.

In the week of the publication of the Acheson report, commissioned by this Government, which highlights the widening divide created by the Conservatives between the quality of life of the less-well-off and that of the wealthiest in our society, it is appropriate that we debated the health service and welfare reform on the same day. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security pointed out, the anticipated rate of increase in social security spending in this Parliament is half that of the previous Parliament. In part, that is a consequence of growing employment and the Government's policies of getting people into work, but it is also a consequence of our gradual reforms to provide work for those who can and real security for those who cannot.

Crucially, we shall make work pay. I am astonished—I suspect that it will become a source of grief to the Conservatives—that their social security spokesman and their leader have committed them to rejecting the working families tax credit and with it, presumably, the disabled persons tax credit. The single gateway to the benefit system should create a better, more meaningful service for those who need support. It is 50 years since the Beveridge proposals were drawn up—years during which patterns of work—

Mr. Jack: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In his response to the debate, my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) followed the precedents and courtesies of the House in picking up on the contributions made by individual right hon. and hon. Members. The Leader of the House has not mentioned any contribution by any right hon. or hon. Member. Is she in order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The debate on the Queen's Speech has gone on over many days. The right hon. Lady is allowed to answer the debate as she sees fit. She has been in perfect order. Had she been otherwise, I should have said so.

Mrs. Beckett: I recall the right hon. Gentleman's contribution. I thought that I was doing him a favour by not drawing attention to it.

It is 50 years since the Beveridge proposals were drawn up—years during which patterns of work and family life have been transformed out of recognition, yet the benefit system still assumes a single breadwinner working for the same employer for more than 40 years without sustained interruption or ill health. A fundamental reassessment of that structure is long overdue. The improvements that we have already announced are welcome.

Tough measures were introduced during the previous Session to combat crime. That process will continue with the strengthening of the youth courts and the modernisation of many of our justice procedures. Little has been said about that during the debate on the Loyal Address, because the Opposition chose, bizarrely, not to debate home affairs in general, but to concentrate all their attention on the constitutional outrage that they detect in the Government's determination to take the Conservative party at its word and abolish the hereditary principle in the House of Lords. I do not want to be unfair to the Conservative party. I recognise that the word in question was not given by this generation of politicians. Politically, if not personally—at least not in this House—it was their fathers and grandfathers who, 87 years ago, accepted on behalf of the Conservative party—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Lady once again, but the House must come to order and allow her to respond to the debate.

Mrs. Beckett: I suspect that the Conservative party does not want to hear anything further about reform of the House of Lords.

As I was saying, 87 years ago, Conservative Members' fathers and grandfathers politically accepted that the retention of power in a legislature dominated by hereditary peers could no longer be defended by the Conservative party.

Conservative Members gave way on the principle then, but in the 87 years since, they have not lifted a finger to advance it. They have considered with great care all the proposals put forward by other Governments, but they have never managed to find one that suits them better. That is the nub of the matter—to have the second Chamber of our legislature permanently in the hands of their party with a 3:1 majority suits them right down to the ground.

It has been evident throughout the debate—it is evident now in the behaviour of Conservative Members—that the Conservative party feels that it has the right to rule, irrespective of the will of the people. In the other place, of course, that is exactly what it does—it rules irrespective of the will of the people with a 3:1 majority over the Labour party. It would continue to have a majority in the other place even if we abolished the voting right of every hereditary peer tomorrow. That is what Conservative Members call independence—people who agree with them.

Today, the debate has focused on economic issues. I would say that we had focused on them afresh were it not for the fact that everything that Conservative Members said was boringly familiar. They pretend that the Government inherited an economy without problems and that all the problems that we do face are a result of the personal doings of the Chancellor or the Prime Minister.

That is, of course, the world in which they would prefer to live; sadly for them, it bears little relation to the world in which we actually live—a world in which they doubled public debt and ignored the dangers of increasing inflation to avoid electoral unpopularity by raising interest rates.

Mr. Maude: Where are the Chancellor and the Prime Minister?

Mrs. Beckett: The shadow Chancellor, who is heckling from the Front Bench, knows perfectly well that the Chancellor is attending an Economic and Financial Council meeting in Brussels. The shadow Chancellor rejected our offer to have this debate yesterday so that the Chancellor could be here, so I want to hear no more from him.

Since the Labour party came to power, public debt has been massively repaid and our sound programme for investment in much-needed public services has been announced. We have cut corporation taxes and done much else to strengthen the country's productive potential. Inflation is under control and long-term interest rates are at their lowest level for 35 years.

We have taken on the problems that our predecessors shirked and set the economy on the right course for the long term. That has been a consistent theme of all our work, from the Prime Minster's decision to secure a fresh settlement in Northern Ireland all the way through to the economic and social programme that we are pursuing.

There has also been a consistent pattern in the Opposition's behaviour. Sadly, it has been one of snap judgments and misjudgments. They oppose our programme for investment in health and education.

[Mrs. Beckett]

The shadow Chancellor challenged us to say when he had called that investment reckless. On Friday 24 July, the Conservative party issued a press release in which he said:

"The Chancellor announced last week he is to embark on a reckless spending spree".

Those are the shadow Chancellor's words, issued by his party office.

The Conservatives have opposed the investment that we propose to make, they oppose the national minimum wage and they oppose the working families tax credit. They are against everything that the Government have proposed—the new deal, health service and welfare reforms and reform of the other place.

The Gracious Speech is work in progress in this Parliament. It outlines work to deliver on the priorities of the people at the general election, today and in the future. Those were the Government's priorities then and they our priorities now; that is our programme and the programme of the Gracious Speech.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add,

But humbly regret, while supporting some proposals in the Gracious Speech, such as those which address the issues of ending the voting rights of hereditary peers and improving the administration of the tax and national insurance system, the absence of key measures in the Gracious Speech to modernise the United Kingdom, including a comprehensive package of environmental policies to tackle pollution, reduce car journeys and switch travel to public transport, a second tier pension scheme, a judicial process to replace the Child Support Agency and the introduction of a parliamentary committee to scrutinise arms exports; believe that additional measures to improve public health, reduce class sizes, abolish tuition fees, widen the provision of early years education and to tackle age discrimination and other forms of inequality should have been brought forward; call for urgent measures to pave the way for Britain's membership of a successful single currency and to grant proper financial independence and a fair and proportional voting system to local government; further regret any delays in introducing a Food Standards Agency; deprecate the absence of rapid progress on measures to ensure a wide-ranging Freedom of Information Act, to pave the way for a referendum on a fair voting system for the House of Commons and to deliver a fully reformed and predominantly elected Second Chamber; and support all possible early steps to speed the passage of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill in order to allow the 1999 European parliamentary elections to be held under a fairer, proportional, voting system.—[Mr. Beith.]

Resolved,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as follows:

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to European Community documents.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Standing Committees),

AGRIMONETARY ARRANGEMENTS

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 9597/98, two draft Council Regulations establishing agrimonetary arrangements and the transitional arrangements to be applied under the Common Agricultural Policy with a view to the introduction of the euro; and supports the Government's intention to support the proposals which simplify the current agrimonetary arrangements by moving to a system which more closely reflects market realities, reducing the costs to taxpayers, consumers and businesses, and also the scope for distortions of competition whilst respecting UK international obligations without discriminating against those Member States not participating in the euro.

EC DEVELOPMENT AID (SOUTH AFRICA)

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 9690/98, the European Court of Auditors Special Report No. 7/98 on the European Development Aid Programme for South Africa (1986–1996) and its recommendations to the Commission; and supports the Government's position that these recommendations are practical and sensible and that the Government will work with Member States and other partners in all European Community development assistance programmes, and particularly in detailed arrangements to succeed the present EPRD in South Africa, after 1999, to ensure that these recommendations are fully implemented.—[Mr. Pope.]

Question agreed to.

PETITIONS

Bus Service (York)

10.40 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): With permission, I shall present a petition from the residents of Wheatfield lane in the city of York area of the Vale of York. The petition has 200 signatures—petitioners who are residents of Wheatfield lane and who are deeply concerned by the withdrawal of the local bus service operated by First York for a number of years. They are especially concerned that the service is not fitting in with the Government's promise to improve public transport.

It gives me great pleasure to present the petition of the residents to the House of Commons. The petition states:

The Petition of the residents of Wheatfield Lane,

Declares that we are concerned at the decision to alter the Wigginton, Haxby, York bus service so that it no longer serves Wheatfield Lane, thus inconveniencing many residents, the elderly in particular.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to require increased services and better standards from bus operators.

All the petitioners remain faithfully yours.

To lie upon the Table.

Bootlegging

10.41 pm

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): On the day that tobacco duties rise and we look forward to an increase in duty on alcohol—which will reduce revenues to the Treasury, undermine the rule of law and subvert the health policies of reducing the consumption of tobacco and of alcohol—it is a great honour to present to the House of Commons the petition of 1,000 signatures from Independent Retail News, store owners and customers. The petition reads:

Declares that the bootlegging of hand-rolling tobacco, cigarettes and alcohol has reached crisis levels.

Honest shop owners are being driven out of business by bootleggers, who are also robbing the Exchequer of £1 billion per year.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons should urge the Chancellor of the Exchequer to work with HM Customs and Excise in taking further measures to ensure the relevant legislation prohibiting this illegal trade is vigorously enforced.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Gas Supply (Consumer Protection)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Pope.]

10.42 pm

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): I am pleased to have the opportunity to bring to the attention of the House what I believe to be a denial of justice for my constituent—Mr. Neil Bailey, from the Wednesfield area of my constituency—by an arm of British Gas known as British Gas Trading, post-privatisation and subsequent reorganisation.

Mr. Bailey became an innocent victim following the digging up of the pavement outside his home by Transco, to repair gas pipes. Transco is another former part of British Gas. It carried out the work and, on completion, the Transco engineer knocked on the door of my constituent's house and asked that he may be allowed into the garage to bleed the system of air, after putting the gas supply back on.

Unfortunately, my constituent's wife, Mrs. Bailey, was unable to give access to the engineer: the meter was located in the garage, to which she did not have access while her husband was away at his work in Birmingham. She was unable to convince the engineer that she had no access, and, in the end, telephoned for Mr. Bailey to leave his work in Birmingham to come to Wolverhampton to allow the engineer into the garage.

I should explain that Mrs. Bailey has a bone disease, which makes life very difficult for her, as well as arthritis and a heart condition, for which she will shortly undergo a double bypass operation.

On Mr. Bailey's return, he not only gave access to the engineer, but loaned him the tools necessary to do the job. He also explained how the engineer might find the person next door to gain access to his premises.

A short while later, when Mr. Bailey was about to return to work, the engineer came up the path again and asked if he could have access once more, through the garage, to the meters. My constituent explained that there was a secure door, which would require a little work, and that in any event it was now time for him to go back to Birmingham and resume his work. He could not put up with further delays.

When Mr. Bailey came home, late in the afternoon, he was met by three people. One was a policeman; the others were from the gas companies. The policeman had a warrant to search the premises, on the ground that Mr. Bailey was suspected of stealing gas from British Gas Trading. It was alleged that he put in and took out a second meter according to the time of arrival of the quarterly bill, this gaining access to gas that he should not have had. That was alleged by the Transco man, who said that he had seen the meter earlier.

A thorough search of the premises was carried out by the police officer and the gas company employees, who—surprise, surprise—found no sign of another meter. End of story, the House may think, perhaps rounded off by an apology; but no—the gas meter was removed, and Mr. Bailey was arrested, taken to the police station and charged with stealing gas.

The forensic examination found nothing wrong, and the Crown Prosecution Service decided not to prosecute by reason of insufficient evidence, there being only the word of the Transco engineer.

End of story now, the House may think. Again, an apology would have helped—but no: British Gas Trading decided that Mr. Bailey was guilty, and told him that it calculated that he had stolen gas from it to the value of £189. To be reconnected, he would need to repay that amount, as well as paying a reconnection charge of £39.

Hon. Members can imagine the exasperation felt by my constituent. He had been arrested, charged and taken to a police station; no evidence had been found. The Crown Prosecution Service had said, "Don't take it any further," but British Gas Trading decided to charge him, try him and find him guilty, without any evidence worth talking about.

This has been going on for nearly 12 months. The incident happened in January. Hon. Members should bear in mind the great distress caused to my constituent and his disabled wife.

Mr. Bailey engaged a solicitor to take on the case, but with no success. The gas company simply cited its decision, and justified it under its powers to protect its revenue. I do not oppose such powers; it is right and proper for the industry to be able to protect its revenue. I merely ask it do so in a proper and sensible way, by referring as fully as possible to evidence that it may have.

My own correspondence on the matter has produced no better result. I have written, on behalf of Mr. Bailey, to every big noise in each of the companies—Transco, Centrica, British Gas Home Energy, British Gas Trading and the Gas Consumers Council—to no avail. The defence of the gas companies was repeated like a mantra, ad nauseam, by the chairmen and their understrappers. I believe that the chairmen should take the blame for not responding to a reasoned and sensible series of letters from a Member of Parliament, and should have taken it on themselves to investigate the matter properly and thoroughly. They knew all the circumstances; they were left in no doubt of the position. None the less, they chose merely to repeat the mantra, "We have the powers; we will protect our revenue."

My constituent has two killer pieces of evidence on his side. First, he has retained all his gas bills for the 20 years during which he has lived in the house—gas bills relating to when the meter was first read, stating "zero, zero, zero". He also has his rates bill, his water bill, his electricity bill and all the household bills that so many of us always manage to mislay somewhere or other. He is the perfect book-keeper. They show a consistency in the use of gas over the years, and the gas companies in a better light in the past four years, when the increase in gas bills has been relatively stable because of the falling gas price. The gas companies knew he had all those bills. I believe that the Gas Consumers Council saw the bills.

When my constituent said to me, "I have all my bills," I said, "I am sure you do. I believe you." He was not satisfied that I believed him. The next week, he brought the gas bills to my surgery for me to see, so he was determined to show me that everything that he had was above board and available for any one to inspect any time they wanted.

The second piece of killer evidence is that the chap who has been reading my constituent's gas meter all these years lives a few doors away. He said to my constituent in the local social club, "I have seen your meter over all the years. I can swear on oath that that is the gas meter that has always been there."

Bearing in mind that my constituent had perhaps up to half an hour to change his gas meter on the first call, and perhaps another half an hour when he returned from work, it stretches credibility to believe that he would change the gas meter, but, there we are, the chap who has been reading the meter for years lives close by. He and my constituent socialise anyway, meeting occasionally in the local social club. He would say under oath that this is the meter that he has always been used to reading.

The gas authorities know both those things, but even that has not moved British Gas Trading—that is, hon. Members will be pleased know, until my Adjournment debate was announced. I am sure that it is an absolute and total coincidence that an offer has now been made—an offer that, frankly, is almost as bad as the initial problems that British Gas Trading has caused for my constituent.

The offer calls for my constituent to make a deposit of £250, which is more than it would have cost him to have the thing reconnected, but of course he would have been accused of being guilty had he met those unjust and unjustified bills. I assure the authorities that he will not settle for that. He needs to have the thing settled properly: to have an apology, with the whole thing reconnected without any further charges.

Much of this has been caused by the nature of the organisation and the apparent continual reorganisation that it has been undergoing. There has also been an element of stubbornness not to recognise that this was a matter that could have been resolved by someone visiting my constituent, looking at the evidence and understanding that, almost certainly, when the Transco engineer looked at the meter, there was a haze: a simple, honourable mistake, none the less compounded in the engineer's mind by the fact that my constituent, having left Birmingham and arrived in Wolverhampton, then wanted to return to his work—that was reasonable and fair in the circumstances—and did not want to open the garage the second time.

Ofgas has powers to intervene, but they are not sufficient. My constituent and his disabled wife could say, "Please investigate my case," but, in the meantime, his gas would remain unreconnected; it would probably be unreconnected well past Christmas while investigations took place. Indeed, it may be a difficult case to investigate, but the whole raft of difficulties could have been resolved by an early intervention.

When reviewing these matters, the Minister may consider whether a duty should be placed on gas companies—more than one is involved throughout the country—to refer to, and consult with, Ofgas to avoid what has become a Winslow Boy-type affair, which none of us wants, and which has deprived my constituent and his disabled wife of the fuel that they need to heat their house. I ask that the matter be investigated properly and thoroughly.

I hope that British Gas Trading—having heard the matter articulated in this debate, not simply reading about it—will understand that it is incumbent on it to make a proper, sensible and final offer that will absolve my constituent Mr. Bailey and reconnect his gas supply.

The Minister for Energy and Industry (Mr. John Battle): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) for raising his constituent's case. Although some may say that it is inappropriate to deal with individuals' problems in the House, I do not agree with them. Quite often, we discover in our constituency cases and surgeries how laws, Budgets and the practices of private companies impact on individuals. It is certainly appropriate that we should stand up in the House for those whom we feel have been treated unjustly, speak out for them and raise their cases. I therefore welcome the fact that my hon. Friend has dealt with his constituent's case, and the way in which he has done so.

My hon. Friend said that his constituent kept careful accounts and old bills. How often do people do so? Nevertheless, I should say that generally—I shall comment in a moment on the individual case—many of our constituents do their homework, have been conscientious in dealing with matters and deserve to be treated with the utmost respect and seriousness. If the word "customer" is to mean anything, customers have to be treated with absolute respect and be treated as companies' first priority.

The purpose of the Government's proposals in our fair deal for consumers is to renew and refresh regulation and to put consumers at the heart of the process, so that they really do come first. The law states that not people but establishing competition should be the first priority, but competition should benefit people. If it does not work for people, why have it?

I cannot go into the details of the individual case raised by my hon. Friend. It would be inappropriate for me to do so, especially as the case between the parties is unresolved. The case went to the Gas Consumers Council, which did not refer it—as, perhaps, it should have—to Ofgas, as the case was to go to court. The council perhaps felt that it should not act further on the matter.

Mr. Purchase: The case did not get to court.

Mr. Battle: Perhaps the appropriate course would have been for the Gas Consumers Council to have referred the case to Ofgas. Those at Ofgas were seemingly unaware of the case until my officials alerted them to it, because of this debate. It does seem a bit odd that, before Ofgas would take the case seriously, my hon. Friend had to go to the effort of writing to Madam Speaker to request an Adjournment debate. There seems to be a gap in the system.

We shall fill that gap by giving power to the Gas Consumers Council to be the sole point of contact when we change the regulatory rules, so that people know clearly where to go, and so that the council will champion cases right the way through the system and take on the companies.

I hope that the case will be resolved by a revised offer by the supplier. I have been informed that the parties will be meeting, when the matter can perhaps be resolved. Ofgas can use its formal powers to resolve such disputes. Gas companies and suppliers are obligated to use their licences to ensure that customers' domestic properties are supplied with gas. Should Ofgas—having considered the evidence from all parties in a dispute—decide that a disconnection is unjustified, the Director General of Gas Supply, the regulator of Ofgas, can use enforcement powers to require a reconnection. Mr. Bailey could have asked—he still could ask—Ofgas to use those legal powers.

[Mr. Battle]

Gas competition was opened up under the previous Administration and the process was completed on 23 May. There has now been a roll-out of 10 other suppliers which compete with British Gas. In the past year, that has resulted in consumer-related problems, including doorstep selling. I raised the matter with the Director General of Gas Supply last year, soon after taking office, and insisted on the introduction of a marketing licence condition that regulates the practices of companies involved in doorstep selling.

There is now a clear code of conduct and companies risk losing their licences and being fined if they abuse their customers—our constituents—in that way. We consider improper marketing tactics and doorstep sales unacceptable and we will not tolerate them. The Department is currently consulting on modifications to strengthen the Consumer Protection (Cancellation of Contracts Concluded Away from Business Premises) 1987 Regulations.

It is clear that some consumers continue to experience problems when they switch gas supplier. In that respect, some gas suppliers are proving worse than others. Problems can range from delays in transferring to a new supplier to disputes about billing. We should be aware of the distress caused to consumers, particularly the elderly and disadvantaged, if they are billed wrongly and suddenly receive a huge bill. They are then told that they are in dispute with their supplier. When they dealt with one nationalised company, consumers did not face the difficulties that inevitably arise now that there are more than 20 companies. Ofgas is aware of the switching problems and is working with the industry to get it right.

Customers are also experiencing erroneous transfer because of doorstep selling or administrative problems. They can be switched to a new supplier without having requested a transfer. That is unacceptable and Ofgas is tightening up the transfer procedures.

Since April 1996, the number of competing suppliers has doubled to about 20 and some 3 million out of 19 million households have switched supplier. There is great turmoil in the marketplace. The introduction of competition on such a scale and in such a time scale has been a considerable achievement and problems were inevitable.

Following my expressions of concern, the Association of Energy Suppliers has put together a code of practice revising the practice of doorstep selling so that companies have to hand over clear written information about their tariffs—they can no longer sign up people on the doorstep. We hope that the practice will now be jettisoned. All members of the association have signed up to the revised code and I have made it clear to the gas and electricity regulators that I expect them to take action in respect of companies that do not adhere to the new code.

All gas suppliers have a duty to establish procedures to handle disconnection complaints. If a consumer cannot resolve a problem with a gas supplier, the first port of call should be the Gas Consumers Council. If the GCC cannot resolve a problem on behalf of a consumer, it should be referred to Ofgas for arbitration.

It would be wrong and misleading to pretend that the regulatory framework was perfect when we took office. The hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), the shadow spokesman on energy issues, is in his place and he would concede that.

Our Green Paper "A Fair Deal for Consumers: Modernising the Framework for Utility Regulation" proposes changes to utility regulation. We want to put consumers at the heart of regulation. We set out many proposals, including the merger of Offer and Ofgas, new powers for Ministers to issue statutory guidance on social obligations and environmental objectives and measures to improve the transparency of regulation of the energy industries and decisions to replace energy and telecoms regulators with small boards. We propose a new primary duty on regulators to protect and promote the interests of consumers wherever possible, through promoting competition but ensuring that the Government establish consumer councils for each of the utilities. A consumer council for energy will be established on a fully independent and statutory basis, backed up by resources. We envisage that consumer council playing a key role in articulating a strategic and independent view of consumer interests to the regulators, companies, Parliament and the media. It will be the single point of contact for people and it will have to take action.

We also want to strengthen the position of consumers by ensuring that all the regulators have the powers already held by some to impose financial penalties on companies for breaches of overall and individual customer service standards. Companies will be fined in retrospect if they get it wrong. That should strengthen the system.

We plan to encourage stronger links between customer service standards and the price caps on energy and directors' pay, to tie it in more rigorously than has been the case. We did not inherit a perfect system. We have had to overhaul the regulatory framework. We have put forward proposals on that and are looking for support to take those proposals that require legislation through the House. The new regulator will be the first energy regulator to bring together gas and electricity and build in our new guidelines.

The independent regulator will have a statutory duty to investigate and take enforcement action to prevent licence breaches. Ofgas is already working closely with the industry to solve the problems that consumers are experiencing and to tighten up the codes of practice and the licence conditions. The Gas Consumers Council, which is an independent statutory body set up to deal with consumer complaints, will be strengthened as the first point of contact. We are also reviewing utility regulation with the key aim of building into law that the consumer should be at the heart of the regulatory framework and should take precedence. The law that we inherited says that setting competition in train should be the primary duty of the regulators. That will be changed to make the primary duty protecting the consumer. If consumers do not like the service that they receive, they can and should demonstrate their concerns. They can change to other suppliers, but it is important that their supplier delivers the right quality of service.

Price is important in regulation and people naturally want lower bills, but they deserve quality and back-up in their service. That is paramount. If gas companies talk about consumer service, they ought to take their customers seriously and treat them with ultimate respect. We shall ensure that the law backs that up.

There will be a single point of contact. There is a competitive market for energy, but we shall ensure that the marketplace is regulated. We shall ensure that the poor are not priced out—that is imperative—that environmental responsibilities are taken seriously and that when there are breaches of licence conditions, action is taken against the companies concerned.

I thank my hon. Friend for raising the subject. The individual case that he has mentioned shows that we have to ensure that the structure exists to deal with future cases so that people get full justice.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eight minutes past Eleven o'clock.

Vaccine Damage (Compensation)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kevin Hughes.]

9.33 am

Mr. Ian Stewart (Eccles): I am delighted, after several unsuccessful attempts in the ballot, to have secured this debate today. This matter was last debated in the House in April 1996, when my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) presented a Bill to review and amend the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979. He has given much commitment and hard work to the cause and he hopes to attend the debate later. I pay tribute also to the campaigning work done by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General before his elevation to the Government.

My particular interest in the issue results from my meeting two constituents, Brendan Hanlon and Gary Hunt, whose lives and those of their families have been blighted by vaccine damage. Gary Hunt, who is 30, is profoundly mentally and physically handicapped and needs 24-hour care seven days a week, 365 days a year. He is wheelchair bound, cannot feed himself, is blind and epileptic, still wears nappies because he is doubly incontinent and, to top it all, cannot speak. Three days a week he attends the Links day care centre in Salford.

Brendan Hanlon, who is 37, has an academic age of a child under two. He suffers from unpredictable and severe epileptic fits, which frequently lead to physical injury. Only yesterday, his mother and sister took him to hospital for treatment for an ankle injury. Brendan must be accompanied outside by two people at all times, which considerably restricts his life style. He attends Craig Hall day care centre at Irlam in Eccles most weekdays, fits permitting.

We commonly talk about vaccine-damaged children, although, like my constituents, victims of vaccine damage are often well past the age of majority. Those children and adults have a spectrum of needs. They and their families are all different and try to cope in their own, unique way. Some children live at home and some are in residential accommodation. Some families rely on respite care and others rely on the extended family to give that support. All families want the greatest degree of independence and choice. I want fair and comprehensive compensation for my disabled constituents and their parents.

Following a parliamentary lobby in May, a cross-party group for vaccine-damaged children was formed by Members of Parliament. The group's aims are to assist parents and children in obtaining fair compensation and to further the reform of the vaccine damage payments system. Officers of the group had a meeting with the Minister of State, Department of Social Security, my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) last month to press the case for additional compensation. We told him that we hoped that the parliamentary group would be the shortest lived ever. The time has come for a just and adequate settlement for damaged people and their families.

This week I met two parents' groups—the Association of Parents of Vaccine Damaged Children and the Vaccine Victims Support Group—to discuss and agree on the components of a fair and adequate compensation scheme. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that he arranges a meeting with them in the near future to hear their proposals.

I make it clear from the outset that the parents of those children and adults and the cross-party group for vaccine-damaged children are 100 per cent. behind a public vaccination programme. We are discussing today what responsibility the Government have adequately to compensate people when accidents occur.

Earlier this year I attended a briefing for Back-Bench Members on the measles, mumps and rubella vaccine. The Minister for Public Health and the recently retired chief public health officer, Sir Kenneth Calman, were present. Sir Kenneth made the point that politicians will always have to make hard decisions about any proposed Government vaccination programme in the full knowledge that there will always be accidents. I put it to him that if politicians make those hard decisions in the light of the wider public interest, it is surely politically, socially and morally right that before implementing the decisions, a system of adequate compensation for accident victims should be devised, and that funding should be shouldered jointly by the Government and the pharmaceutical industry. He replied simply, "Yes, I agree with you."

I am not here today to debate whether, or to what extent, vaccination is responsible for my constituents' disabilities. I know that the recent attempt to reopen that debate in a prominent Sunday newspaper has been very painful for parents. In my opinion, the Government accepted responsibility for vaccine victims with the 1979 Act and the scheme that was established a couple of years earlier. Successive Governments have honoured that responsibility—albeit inadequately—by periodically uprating the payment. The £10,000 payment of 1979 was increased to £20,000 in 1985, to £30,000 in 1991 and to £40,000 this year for new cases.

I shall focus on people damaged by the diphtheria, tetanus and whooping cough vaccination—DTP—and on the level of financial help given, although I shall mention the six-year time limit for claiming payments and the 80 per cent. disability threshold currently in operation. Other hon. Members may wish to speak about these issues and their concerns about the measles, mumps and rubella vaccine.

In the early 1970s, parents of vaccine-damaged children argued for compensation on the ground that they were encouraged to have their children vaccinated as much for public health reasons as for the interests of the individual child. The then Labour Government established a royal commission on civil liability and compensation for personal injury, known popularly as the Pearson commission. It reported in March 1978. Recommendation 158 concluded that there was "a special case for paying tort compensation for vaccine damage, where vaccination is recommended by the state and is undertaken to protect the community."

The 1974–79 Labour Government, keen to ensure an early measure of help, introduced the 1979 Act. The then Health Secretary, the late Lord Ennals, said that the payment would not

"pre-empt decisions which the Government still have to take" on the Pearson recommendations. Answering a Member who expressed great dismay that the payment was so small, he said:

"This is not saying, 'This is the end. We are wiping the slate clean'. This is some way in which we can help these people now".—[Official Report, 9 May 1979; Vol. 949, c. 977-80.]

However, when the Conservative Government took office in 1979, parents were told that the £10,000 was a full and final payment.

The value of the scheme has deteriorated considerably between upratings. In 1984-85, the real value of the £10,000 was about £5,600. In 1985, the payment was increased to £20,000. Upratings have been irregular; families waited until 1991 for another increase, and a further seven years for the latest increase.

Many Members of Parliament, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield, tried hard to persuade the previous Conservative Government to improve the level and scope of compensation. Their entreaties fell on deaf ears. I am glad that now several Conservative Members feel that they can support the case for adequate compensation and a review of the criteria laid down in the 1979 Act.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): Does my hon. Friend accept that although the Government have set up a vaccine damage unit in Blackpool—in recognition of the fact that things can go wrong and that people should be compensated—in the case of some vaccinations, such as the triple MMR and also just measles and rubella, the Government refuse to believe that there might be a link between vaccination and damage to a child? Does my hon. Friend also accept that it is difficult to prove that the vaccination led to the damage, even when a perfectly healthy child who has never had a day's illness becomes seriously ill within minutes of vaccination? Is it his opinion that the Government should introduce a scheme whereby, instead of its being the parents' responsibility to prove that the child was damaged by the vaccination, it is the responsibility of the Government and the pharmaceutical industry to prove that the child was not damaged by that vaccination?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, I accept the validity of some of the points made by my hon. Friend. However, today I shall focus wholly on the DTP and the 1979 Act.

In April 1996, an early-day motion was tabled calling for comprehensive improvements to the 1979 Act. The motion attracted about 300 signatories, including 26 Labour Members who are now Ministers and several more who are now Whips. They include my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-West (Mr. Robinson), my right hon. Friends the Members for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers) and for Dulwich and West Norwood (Ms Jowell) and my hon. Friend the Member for East Ham (Mr. Timms). My call for improved compensation therefore has supporters at the Department of Health and the Department of Social Security and—perhaps most important—I believe that it has friends at the Treasury.

On 23 June 1998, my hon. Friend the Minister told the First Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation:

"The vaccine damage payment scheme provides a substantial measure of preference for those . . . severely disabled as a result of vaccination over those . . . equally severely disabled from some other source."

That acknowledgment of preference tells me that the Government have reviewed the evidence, identified vaccine damage victims as a special case and given some special support. However, I am afraid that I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Minister when he says that the preference is substantial. I believe that it is neither substantial nor remotely adequate.

My hon. Friend told the Committee that United Kingdom vaccination programmes had been very successful. We all agree. He said that, between 1951 and 1955, there were 627,033 cases of whooping cough in England and Wales, resulting in 1,103 deaths. Between 1991 and 1995, when vaccine coverage rates reached 94 per cent., there were only 1,873 reported cases and, thankfully, only five deaths. My hon. Friend said:

"The continued success of the immunisation programme is of enormous importance to individuals, their families and the country as a whole in reducing the incidence and effect of serious communicable diseases. Where, rarely, on the balance of probability, the programme does result in severe damage, the vaccine damage payments scheme provides a measure of financial help."—[Official Report, First Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation, 23 June 1998; c. 4-5.]

Essentially, we are arguing about what is the right measure. The £10,000 received by Brendan Hanlon is an inadequate measure. Even the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) said that the figure was missing a nought or even more. It would have helped if the Conservative Government had shown the compassion and responsibility that some individual Conservative Members are now showing. If all the children who received the original £10,000 were to receive £100,000, it would cost only £79.5 million; and we all know of recent medical compensation cases in which payments of £1 million or more have been awarded to individuals.

As of June 1998, 890 payments had been made under the 1979 Act and the scheme which briefly pre-dated it. That is from a total of 3,999 claims—a success rate of just 22 per cent. The vast majority of payments—some 795 of the 890—have been at the £10,000 level. I believe that the low success rate is related to the highly restrictive 80 per cent. rule. Parents find it hard to accept that a child can have a considerable disability yet get no compensation. The 1979 Act also includes a six-year time limit on the period during which claims must be made. That disadvantages parents who might not have access to full information about the scheme. It might be well publicised now, but that has not always been the case.

It could and can take time for parents to become aware of the cause of their child's injury, and it can take many more months or even years before the necessary medical information is compiled. Up to 31 March 1995, 210 claims fell foul of the six-year rule. I am today calling for a review of the limitation on actions to relax those restrictions.

The Government must not hide behind the mantra that additional compensation is for the courts to decide, and my hon. Friend the Minister cannot continue to say that legal aid is not a matter for him. The Government are committed to a policy of co-ordination—joined-up thinking, as it is now routinely called.

Litigation is a dead duck for most parents, although I was delighted that on 17 November the Legal Aid Board allowed 16 families the right to re-apply for legal aid certificates to fight cases on behalf of their children where medical negligence is alleged. My constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Hanlon, had their legal aid certificate withdrawn in 1994 after 13 years. They are among the 16 families who can now re-apply for a certificate. Mr. and Mrs. Hanlon are 74 and 78 years old respectively, and they are tired of getting on and off the legal merry-go-round.

For many parents, the courts offer no solution. The relevant documents are missing, and vaccine batch numbers are lost, destroyed or missing. The Government's proposed changes to the qualifying criteria for legal aid may make such cases even more difficult to pursue. It has been argued that the conditional fee agreement that the Government are recommending would be particularly difficult in medical liability cases.

Victims of vaccine damage and their parents are looking to the Government to provide a decent and adequate compensation scheme. I know that various proposals have been advanced. One suggestion is for a substantial lump sum. Other proposals are for the payment of a severe disability pension like that paid for industrial or war injuries. Both suggestions may be appropriate. It is also time to revisit the Pearson report, which gave the issue a thorough investigation. I do not want to be too prescriptive, but the parents of vaccine-damaged children and I are looking to the Government to present some realistic options that will move the matter forward quickly.

A new or revised scheme should acknowledge five principles. First, it should recognise the need for a lump-sum payment which takes account of the wide spectrum of need among vaccine damage victims and the variety of suitable care provisions, ranging from full-time home care to full-time residential care. Families should have the financial wherewithal to make choices about the best care for their child now and in the future.

Secondly, it should be acknowledged that the longest suffering children and families have had the most expense and the least help. Any proposed settlement should recognise that. Thirdly, it must be accepted that in any vaccine programme, even in the future, inevitably there will be a small number of accidents. Therefore, an adequate and fair system of benefits and/or pensions should be established. Fourthly, the funding of such compensation should be the joint responsibility of Government and the pharmaceutical industry. Fifthly, the 80 per cent. and six-year criteria should be relaxed.

Since the early 1970s, parents have done all the right things. They have lobbied, they have tried litigation, they have persuaded sympathetic Members of Parliament to raise the matter, they have had an early-day motion tabled and they have lobbied Ministers, most recently in May this year at the House of Commons. I know that for many families it was a great struggle to get here, and that it was expensive for those who came from far-flung parts of the United Kingdom. They did so despite having to attend to the constant needs of severely disabled children and adults. Now they want action. They want their sons and daughters' futures to be secured and they want an end to almost three decades of fighting for justice.

To my mind, the parents and sisters of Brendan Hanlon spoke for all the families and all the damaged children when they wrote:

"We have been extremely patient for many years, but the urgency of providing our sons and daughters with the financial muscle to purchase dignified care is ever pressing."

Mr. and Mrs. Hanlon, who are in their 70s, want to ensure that during their lifetime they have secured and provided for the future care of their child. In that sense they are no different from all the other parents who have mature vaccine-damaged children. They know that they are stoic. They have been told that they are heroes, and undoubtedly they are, but time is running out. They want justice and concrete proposals for proper compensation now. I am confident that my hon. Friend the Minister and the Government will meet that challenge.

9.56 am

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): I congratulate the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Stewart) on raising the matter in the House and on his eloquent and moving speech, in which he put the arguments extremely well. I whole-heartedly support a great deal of what he said. He made a strong case and brought to the attention of the House, and, I hope, of the Government, the needs of families with a child damaged as a result of the vaccination programme.

I endorse what the hon. Gentleman said about the importance of that programme. However, one thing that should not come out of the House today is any scare story about the vaccination programme in general. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that it has proved an enormous success, leading to a huge reduction in the incidence of diseases, which have almost been eradicated from our country, and a huge reduction in the number of deaths, especially of young children, as a result of those diseases.

Our generation owes the greatest debt of gratitude to the medical services, as we were the first generation to enjoy the full benefits of the vaccination programme. In my very early years the vaccinations were just being introduced. As a result, most of my friends and my generation have not suffered as previous generations did.

It is important that the vaccination programme should continue. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that even the families of children who have suffered as a result of accidents following vaccinations are aware of the need for the programme to continue for the sake of the public. It is inevitable that there have been and always will be one or two children who are damaged as a result of vaccinations. We must take care of them. It is in the best traditions of the hon. Gentleman's party and of mine that in the House we should consider not just the public as a whole, but the individuals who, in one or two cases, may have suffered from what is in the best interests of society at large.

Mr. Llew Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that we are speaking not about one or two cases, but about thousands of cases? If he is in any doubt about that, perhaps he should consult some of the solicitors and barristers dealing with those cases.

Mr. Rendel: I apologise if I gave the hon. Gentleman the impression that I was trying to minimise the importance of the matter. The number of people damaged by vaccines, as opposed to other causes, is in dispute. The numbers now are small in comparison with the huge numbers being vaccinated in the overall vaccination programme.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): It is not only the numbers that are in dispute, but whether the vaccine is responsible for what has happened in some cases. I attended the same meeting as my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Stewart) with the chief medical officer. For every statistic that we could throw up, the chief medical officer threw up a counter-statistic. Does that not tell us that more research is needed, so that we can establish whether and when vaccines are responsible? That would allow the people described by my hon. Friend to be adequately compensated when it is clear that the vaccine caused the damage.

Mr. Rendel: I am sure that we would all welcome more research, but for some families it is already too late—the damage has been done. We should concentrate on what can be done to help the families of people who have already been affected.

Many hon. Members have probably had the opportunity—the privilege—to visit such families, as I have, and will know how severe the effects of vaccine damage can be. Those affected may need direct care for as much as 24 hours a day. Young children who are disruptive as a result of mental disability must be watched for every moment of their lives, because they may be a danger to themselves and others. As the hon. Member for Eccles said, the current programme does not provide enough compensation to enable such people to be looked after properly.

In other cases involving medical accidents, compensation has run into millions of pounds. If we are to retain the system whereby lump sums are provided in compensation for some medical accidents—and I am not sure that it is the right system—such sums must be large enough to give the family a continuing income, so that proper care can be paid for. Compensation should be higher than the £40,000 agreed in the summer.

The hon. Gentleman was also right to point out that there are different degrees of damage. Some people will need more care than others. There is a good case for a sliding scale, and for a reduction in the current highly restrictive requirement for sufferers to be 80 per cent. disabled to receive compensation.

That the 80 per cent. requirement is restrictive was demonstrated last summer, when the Minister told us that the number of cases receiving compensation had fallen to about five a year. The hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) said that the figures that I had mentioned might be too low in relation to needs. Certainly, compensating a mere five families a year will not require much in terms of public resources.

There has also been a problem in regard to legal aid. I am delighted to learn that in a number of cases that is apparently being resolved, but if we are to continue with the programme as it is now we must consider the needs of families, many of whom, because of their difficulties, have few resources of their own. They should be given a chance to take their cases to court and to obtain compensation.

We have been told that a review of the whole scheme is under way, but the process seems to be rather slow. The Government are very keen on reviews: they are reviewing all sorts of things, and setting up working parties. Admittedly the issue is difficult, and, as has been said, a number of the medical problems have not been fully resolved. I accept that a review must be proper and thorough, but I hope that the Government will not consider the fact that fairly small numbers are involved to be an excuse for allowing this review to drag on and on. It should be speeded up as much as possible because the issue is critical for those involved, although they form a relatively small proportion of the population.

The Government may wish to consider a no-fault compensation scheme as a way of resolving not only this problem, but other medical problems. It is time that they did so. Many people have special needs as a result of medical damage of some kind, whether or not that damage was a result of negligence on the part of a doctor, and those caring for them experience difficulties in providing for those needs. Surely we should do what we can for them, regardless of the cause of the problem.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey): One good reason for the Government to establish such a scheme is the possibility of avoiding endless actions against different health authorities and trusts which must then arrange for administrators and staff to deal with the litigation. A central system tied in with no-fault compensation would hugely reduce administration costs in the national health service, as well as making matters much easier for claimants.

Mr. Rendel: My hon. Friend is right. Sadly, the only people who are likely to benefit from the retention of the current system are the lawyers who, year after year, deal with these lengthy cases in the courts. It would be better for some of the money to be given to the victims of medical accidents. My hon. Friend was also right to mention trusts. A number of trusts are known to be in great difficulty after losing cases that they expected to win, and being stung for large amounts of compensation.

I ask the Minister to respond to the points that I have made, and to tell us whether he is considering a no-fault compensation scheme. I feel that that must be the answer in the end, and I hope that that end will come sooner than seems likely at present.

10.7 am

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Stewart) on securing the debate, and apologise to him, and to my hon. Friend the Minister, for the fact that I shall be unable to stay until the end.

I have been interested in vaccine damage for some time. In the last Parliament, I introduced a ten-minute Bill and tabled an early-day motion on the subject. Significantly, the early-day motion secured more than 200 signatures from hon. Members on both sides of the House, which demonstrates the strength of feeling in all parties.

My involvement, like that of many other hon. Members, began as a result of a constituency case. I pay tribute to Mrs. Olivia Price, and to all the other parents of vaccine-damaged children who have worked so hard over the years and have shown such resilience in campaigning for justice.

"Vaccine-damaged children" is, in a sense, a misnomer. As my hon. Friend pointed out, we are now dealing mainly with vaccine-damaged adults. That certainly applies to the cases approved under the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979. The parents of those concerned are getting on in years, and the time has come for us to address the issue. Indeed, such action may be overdue.

The position was clear back in 1978. The Pearson commission recommended a weekly disability benefit for all severely disabled children,

"irrespective of cause of disablement".

It went on to say that "the Government or local authority concerned should be strictly liable in tort for severe damages suffered by anyone (adult or child) as a result of vaccination which has been recommended in the interests of the community".

That, surely, is the key issue. The vaccination programme, which I support, is a public health measure. Vastly more children have benefited from it than have suffered. Given that it is a public health measure, however—a measure promoted by the public for public health reasons—and given that there will always be a small number of children who are adversely affected by vaccines, we, as a community, have an obligation to look after them and their families. That is all that parents have been saying for all these years. The obligation is important not just in terms of justice for those families, but in terms of the credibility of the vaccination programme.

There are legitimate arguments about the MMR—measles, mumps and rubella—vaccine and other issues, on both sides. I am a supporter of vaccination, but, in all seriousness, I say to my hon. Friend the Minister that until we sort out the issue of compensation for the small number of families who have been affected, those two matters will continue to get mixed up. The credibility of the vaccination programme will suffer as a result of the issue of compensation not being adequately addressed.

Although I accept in many ways what the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) said about the need to examine an overall no-fault compensation scheme, we should not leave the addressing of the issue of compensation until we tackle those broader questions. This has gone on for too long already, and there are some fairly simple things that can and should be done. First, as my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles said, the level of compensation should be dramatically increased for all those affected. That is a vital component.

Secondly, we should remove the 80 per cent. rule, which has unjustly ruled out too many families. Thirdly, we should do something about the six-year rule, which has had a corrosive effect. That would not cost a great deal of money. The parents deserve it, and we as a community have an obligation to the families involved and to the credibility of the vaccination programme.

Ms Jean Corston (Bristol, East): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Stewart) on securing the debate and on the moving content of his speech. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden), who did so much during the previous Parliament to call public attention to the number of children who have been casualties of an immunisation programme to which we are all committed and to which we want parents to be committed.

I am vice-chair of the newly formed all-party group on vaccine damage, and I put on record the fact that we are working to put pressure on the Government about promises and obligations that we think rightly fall on them. We have been assisted by my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor–General, who, before his elevation to that august post, was an active member of our group.

I shall use the time available to me to detail a particular case in my constituency—that of Matthew Needs. Matthew, and his parents Enid and Ivor, became my constituents as a result of boundary changes following the general election. Before that, they had been the constituents of, in reverse order, my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Berry); Mr. Rob Hayward, who was Conservative Member for Kingswood for a time; and my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), who at that time was the Member for Bristol, South-East. Mr. and Mrs. Needs have worked with all those Members of Parliament to try to achieve justice for Matthew.

The total sum of compensation available in the statutory scheme is slightly more than two years of the average wage. At the same time, children who have been damaged at birth or who have had a disability, and have been in the fortunate position of being able to prove negligence in civil law, are receiving damages counted in millions because of the cost of care for a lifetime. That is what is involved: a lifetime of care from parents, many of whom are reaching retirement, as my hon. Friends have said.

Matthew was born on 11 June 1975. There were no complications in his birth, and he held up his head at between six and seven weeks, which is quite forward. He sat up at six months, in December 1975. On 16 September 1975, he had his routine three-month check at the local authority children's health clinic. The doctor who saw him, Dr. Joan Boyd, had 43 years experience as a child health doctor by the time of her retirement. She said:

"My clinical examination in conjunction with peri-natal and post-natal hospital tests showed a very long baby with tests within the norm for his age, in my opinion."

On 8 January 1976, Matthew had his first injection of the vaccine DTP—diphtheria, tetanus and pertussis. Pertussis is commonly known as whooping cough. Afterwards, his mother said that he had a prolonged screaming fit, became drowsy and slept for 17 hours. His behaviour was noticeably different when he woke, and he was unable to recognise his mother, which is extraordinary in a child of seven months.

Quite a long way down the road, and after lots of pennies had been put in the legal meter, a medical opinion was sought from two eminent specialists—Dr. F. Clifford Rose of Harley street and the Charing Cross hospital neurology department, and Professor G.T. Stewart of the University of Glasgow. They said:

"On the evidence submitted to us it would appear that he had a severe adverse reaction a few hours after this injection."

Mrs. Needs said that he "seemed suddenly lifeless and floppy . . . like a rag doll".

[Ms Jean Corston]

A couple of days later—on or about 10 January—Matthew had brief seizures in which his body became rigid and his eyes stared for a few seconds. Mrs. Needs reported that to the clinic and to her doctor, but she was told that there was no need for concern, but Matthew remained backward and disturbed in the weeks thereafter. Dr. Clifford Rose and Professor Stewart said:

"We interpret this as a global disturbance of cerebral function which was followed immediately, as the record shows, by severe mental and physical retardation."

At that point, some hearing loss was noticed, and Matthew saw a doctor at a hearing clinic in March. Nevertheless, on 4 March 1976 he had his second injection of the triple vaccine, because Mrs. Needs was told that there was no cause for concern. After that, Matthew had another prolonged screaming fit and the retardation increased.

On 16 March 1976, Matthew had his nine-month check-up with the same doctor, Dr. Boyd, at the children's clinic. She said:

"Clinical examination by me showed a very long child again with, in my opinion, poor muscle tone and some delay in the development of locomotive skills.

I considered that development delay needed further investigation at specialist level. An appointment for Dr. Brian Speidel of Southmead Hospital, Bristol, to see Matthew in Out patients was made."

Obviously he was being referred to a consultant because of the inexplicable deterioration in his condition, from being a normal baby at three months to a slow child at eight months.

On 7 May 1976, in Southmead hospital, it was discovered that Matthew was unable to sit unsupported. He later saw Dr. Carpenter at Purdown hospital in Bristol. He had an appointment with a paediatrician, who said that the child's condition was not related to vaccination. That seems to be the sole bit of evidence on which the Department relies in shutting Matthew out of the scheme altogether. My hon. Friends have made the point that the scheme as it stands is inadequate to compensate these children—most of whom are now adults—and their parents, but Matthew's parents have never received a penny because the Department relies on that one written comment from a paediatrician.

On 1 July 1976, despite that catalogue of horrors, Matthew was given his third injection of the vaccine. The consultants to whom I have referred said:

"There is no evidence of a pre-existing neurological or other lesion to account for his condition. We are therefore of the opinion that it is more likely than not that the first injection caused brain damage which was aggravated by the second and third injections. These were given in violation of scheduled contraindications and of doubts expressed by Matthew's parents.

In this respect they were given negligently of the child's best interest especially since at the time of the third injection he was over one year of age and therefore no longer at serious risk of severe disease or complications from whooping cough."

The Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979 was passed in the dying days of the 1974-79 Labour Government. For its first 18 years on the statute book, it was the responsibility, and under the discretion of Conservative Secretaries of State. Cases were heard by a vaccine damage tribunal. On 10 September 1979, the tribunal turned down Matthew's application. Its judgment says:

"From the history it appears far more probable that the influenza illness which coincided with the first immunisation caused this child's condition rather than the immunisation."

In particular, it was noted that

"the second and third immunisations with the same vaccine did not result in any deterioration of the child's condition."

That is a strange point to make. Furthermore, that was the first Mr. and Mrs. Needs had heard of Matthew having had influenza. It looked as though that had been entered on Matthew's medical records by his general practitioner.

Mr. and Mrs. Needs applied for a re-trial based on a mistake as to a material fact, which was that Matthew had suffered influenza at the time of his first vaccination. In October 1979, Dr. Carpenter, who was the consultant psychiatrist at Purdown hospital, said:

"Matthew's clinical picture at present certainly fits that of a brain damaged child and this, coupled with the fact that he appeared to be a perfectly normal developed baby before the alleged immunisation at seven months, must cast grave doubts upon the suggestion that his brain damage or deterioration was due to influenza. Certainly influenza, like many other viruses, probably could cause brain damage whether by direct infection or by an allergical mechanism but I cannot think of a single case off-hand and feel it must be excessively rare. Judged on probability therefore it is surely far more likely that it was the whooping cough vaccine."

In 1980, the vaccine damage tribunal turned Matthew down again, and did not give any reasons. It just said that, on the balance of probabilities, it did not think that his condition was as a result of a vaccination.

A psychological assessment of Matthew in 1981 said:

"It is very difficult to imagine Matthew advancing to any degree, other than a physical increase in stature, regardless what treatment methods are used and to my mind"— the doctor was James B. Norman—

"having seen what milestones he had reached prior to the vaccination, I feel that he is less advanced now than he was prior to the vaccination which to my mind suggests very strongly that the vaccination may well have been the cause of his brain damage."

Since that time, Mr. and Mrs. Needs have been on a legal merry-go-round. They do not have a batch number for the vaccination, because the records have been destroyed. I do not allege any malpractice. Matthew's medical records referred to influenza, but they have now gone, so no one has any evidence that influenza was given as a cause. It is impossible, or at least very difficult, to prove negligence.

The matter has gone backwards and forwards. It has gone to various Secretaries of State. Lord Henley said that the case was out of time. When the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) was the Secretary of State, he turned down an application. In the interval, Mr. and Mrs. Needs have, to my knowledge, spent £5,361 of their own money trying to get justice for Matthew.

Some people have said that there is a question mark over whether vaccine damage exists, despite the 1979 Act. I have a letter from the Minister for Public Health, who referred to the findings of a national childhood encephalopathy study. She said that it "failed to identify a statistically significant link between pertussis vaccine and neurological damage."

She went on:

"However, we do know that pertussis itself can cause brain damage."

In 1976–77, the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration reported on the yellow card system. He noted that doctors were not reporting suspect adverse reactions on the yellow card system as rigorously as they should, and that that was a matter of concern. Although there was no statutory requirement for doctors to do so, it was made clear that it was extremely important. The Department had reminded doctors from time to time of the yellow card system to help identify hazards, but the Commissioner felt that it was generally accepted that there was under-reporting.

The report made specific reference to the whooping cough vaccination. It said:

"The main reaction of triple vaccine apart from other local reactions which have been reported and which give cause for concern are first, convulsions and encephalopathy and secondly the sudden onset of shock or collapse and the shrill cry or screaming attacks which may persist for several hours."

Those are precisely the symptoms that Mrs. Needs described. The report reviewed research from 1961 to 1974, and said that

"the sudden onset of collapse within 4 hours of immunization and the peculiar screaming attacks following the triple vaccination in the young infant may be attributed to the vaccine with greater confidence as they do not appear to have been observed after other prophylactics given at the same age or in children who have been given no vaccine."

When Mr. and Mrs. Needs came to see me in my advice surgery last year, Matthew came with them. He was very frightened at being in a room with people he did not know, and sought refuge by constantly hugging his mother, as would a baby of seven months who was in a room with strangers. For reassurance, he put out his hand to his mother and said, "Round and round the garden." She had to stop and do "Round and round the garden like a teddy bear" on his palm—he was 22. That reassured Matthew and he beamed, but there was not a dry eye left among the rest of us in the room. This was a man of 22 exhibiting the familiar behaviour of a 7-month-old baby.

I pay tribute to Ivor and Enid Needs for the love and care they have given Matthew and his siblings. I cannot imagine how much patience they have required. I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to make it clear to the Secretary of State that the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979 gives him the discretion to make an order to add medical evidence, such as that submitted by many doctors in the case of Matthew Needs, in the absence of proof, such as a batch number or GP's records. If eminent specialists in the field say that the cause of disability is almost certainly vaccination, that should carry equal weight. I do not want to criticise the vaccination programme, but we have a responsibility towards its victims.

I am grateful to the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for East Ham (Mr. Timms), who met me recently to discuss Matthew's case. However, I am not convinced that the Department is taking this matter seriously enough. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to take careful note of what I have said and to recognise that young people such as Matthew, and their parents, deserve justice from the Government.

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): I am grateful for the opportunity to make a short contribution to this important debate. I am sure that there is consensus in the House on this issue. The hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Stewart) set out the case extremely well. I shall concentrate on the public health aspects, which were discussed by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden), and shall touch on the case described by the hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston).

Many of my medical colleagues find it difficult to accept the concept of vaccine damage. There is an association between having an immunisation and neurological diseases occurring, but we know that many neurological diseases in small infants occur at about the time vaccines are given. It is extremely difficult to prove causality as opposed to a link. Many of my colleagues say that, if we allow causality, it may undermine the public's confidence in the vaccination programme. They are profoundly wrong.

Nowadays, for each individual child, it is safer to rely on herd immunity rather than to have a vaccination, but if many individual parents made that decision, herd immunity would disappear almost within weeks. Then we would all, as individuals, be at risk again of a number of diseases that, thankfully, we do not see very often now. Therefore, it is important that individual parents, when they make the responsible choice of having their child vaccinated on behalf of the community, have the assurance that should anything go wrong—whether or not cause and effect can be proved—if there is a link, they will be looked after by the very state and community that benefits from that selfless act.

It all sounds slightly dramatic, but that is a decision that each parent has to make. During some of the irresponsible scares that we have had recently, the focus on vaccine-damaged children not being treated properly by the state has created an on-going festering sore. All of us in the Chamber and everyone who has spoken know parents. The people affected are growing older. Parents are more anxious about those dependent individuals, clearly described by the hon. Member for Bristol, East.

It is in the interest of the Government and public health to make the decisions that parents have to make easier by acknowledging that, if there is any association between a disability and an immunisation procedure, the Government will face up to their responsibilities, without driving those people through the protracted misery of having to go through the courts.

10.32 am

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): This has been an interesting and thoughtful debate. I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Stewart) on his selection. He spoke movingly about the plight of his constituents and about the difficult decisions that have to be made, as did the hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston), whose description of her constituents' problems I found deeply moving. I could see that she, too, was moved by their plight. I hope that the Government will take the opportunity to reconsider the individual case that she mentioned.

The hon. Member for Eccles made a slight side swipe at the previous Government when he said that the late Lord Ennals had suggested that more reform might be forthcoming. The hon. Gentleman quoted from the official record. If he studies that debate carefully, he will find that Patrick Jenkin, now Lord Jenkin, remarked that Lord Ennals had gone out of his way not to say that it was an interim payment. Part of the problem with which we have been bedevilled is that there have been hints and suggestions that something else is about to be done. I hope that the Minister of State will not be guilty of the same fault.

We are struck by the effects of vaccine damage on individuals and by the amount of injury that is suffered. Hon. Members have referred to the fact that a child must be classified as 80 per cent. disabled before qualifying for payments. The effect of that must be devastating not only for the individual but for the family; the hon. Member for Bristol, East gave a clear example.

It is also striking that the percentage of awards against claims has steadily gone down. The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) talked about a handful of awards; I think he mentioned five. It is interesting that there have been five awards against 260 claims in the past three years.

As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) said, we should not forget that the assistance given under the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979 was based on the principle that parents should be actively encouraged to have their children vaccinated on grounds of public health, as well as for the welfare of the individual child.

As hon. Members have pointed out, controversy continues over the measles, mumps and rubella vaccine. I have a letter from the Minister for Public Health in response to a constituent's inquiry about the safety of that medicine. I will not quote the whole letter, nor, for reasons of confidentiality, will I name my constituent. The letter says:

"There has been much adverse reporting in newspapers and on television about MMR vaccine over the preceding months. We very much regret the anxiety this has caused, especially since much of the reporting has been factually wrong."

It talks about the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation and says:

"The Committee's view remains unequivocal that, on the scientific evidence available, there is no link between MMR vaccine and inflammatory bowel disease or autism."

It is against that background that we seek to reassure families that vaccination remains safe.

The hon. Members for Eccles and for Newbury talked about whooping cough. I was born in the early 1950s—1952 to be precise.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North): Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickles: The Whip is right. I look a lot younger, but I thank him for that remark.

At that time, whooping cough was a great killer of children. Great fear stalked the streets. Years later, my mother talked about the constant fear, the effects on children and the effects on families in our locality whose children had died or contracted the disease.

In the early 1950s, the number of whooping cough cases was roughly 157,000 a year, compared with 2,000 today. The number of deaths was 300 a year, compared with one a year 40 years later. The public vaccination programmes remain safe and are a sensible precaution for parents to take for the well-being of their children and their children's playmates. As hon. Members have said, however, when vaccinations go wrong, the consequences can be tragic.

Hon. Members have referred to the problems in the 1970s, when some members of the medical profession expressed doubts about the safety of whooping cough vaccine. The result was the 1979 Act. As several hon. Members have it made clear, that was not intended as compensation, but, to quote the late David Ennals, as an "urgent measure of health". He made several statements on Second Reading that have since been subject to different interpretations; indeed, we have had heard some differing interpretations today.

At the time of the debate, the royal commission on civil liability and compensation for personal injury had made recommendations on a limited compensation scheme, but as that would, in the words of the late Lord Ennals, "inevitably take time", the Government decided to introduce a lump-sum payment. It is important to emphasise that each uprating relates only to new cases.

Many people took that to mean that other measures would be introduced. Clearly, the sums that have been involved—£10,000, £20,000—are nothing like the levels that would be available in court. I have some briefing papers supplied by a lawyer on comparable schemes involving the courts covering 80 per cent. disability. The figures include £520,000 for an 11-week old girl; £708,000 for a five-year-old boy; a case from Leeds involving £105,000; a case involving £346,000; leading up to one involving £1.25 million compensation.

It is fair to say that, despite the legal aid changes, action on such cases has largely been ruled out because it is very difficult to prove causation: from the early 1980s until the recent cases, the Legal Aid Board refused to grant legal aid to pursue them.

It is to the Government's credit that in June they uprated the amount payable in new cases to £40,000—on roughly the same basis as the two previous upratings by the Conservative Government. In the debate, the Minister made some interesting points that suggested that there would be a further review. On the uprating, he said:

"I should also like to draw attention to the other part of the announcement about the vaccine damage payment scheme being considered as part of the welfare review, which includes disability."—[Official Report, First Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation, 23 June 1998; c. 3.]

In a written answer in another place, the Under-Secretary said:

"The Vaccine Damage Payments Scheme is the responsibility of the Department of Social Security. Consideration is still being given to this complex and sensitive issue and an announcement will be made in due course."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 2 November 1998; Vol. 594, c. 28.]

The promised statement on vaccine damage payments came in "A new contract for welfare: support for disabled people", which on page 41 states:

"We have increased by £10,000 to £40,000 the tax-free lump sum payment which is awarded, in addition to the normal range of disability benefits, to children who are severely disabled as a result of recommended childhood vaccines. We are continuing to consult with representative bodies on any future changes to the scheme."

The Minister, for whom I have a great deal of time, would hardly have made those promises unless he was about to deliver on them; he has just nodded to that effect. I am delighted that he has taken the unusual course of making that major announcement during a Wednesday Adjournment debate. To be worthwhile, the review must consider things beyond inflation uprating. At the end of his speech in the uprating debate, the Minister said that the uprating would stand "for some time". Let him say now how often it will be uprated.

Is the review only about the scheme's operation and administration, or are extensions proposed? Are there proposals to introduce a payment on the lines described by hon. Members, to institute a trust for those suffering, to reopen cases previously considered and/or to deal with the problems of adults? Will the 80 per cent. rule or the six-year rule be affected? Any review must consider those matters. Unless the Minister wants to follow the path of Lord Ennals and imply promises that perhaps cannot be kept, let him give us what the hon. Member for Eccles called his joined-up thinking on the issue.

10.45 am

The Minister of State, Department of Social Security (Mr. John Denham): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Stewart) on securing this debate and on raising an issue of concern to the House. It is a complex and emotive subject, and my hon. Friend spoke clearly and with great sensitivity.

I know that the matter is of considerable interest and that an all-party group on vaccine damage has recently been formed. I acknowledge the work of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Mr. Cranston)—now the Solicitor-General—who has been active on the issue since he entered the House. Although he is now a Minister, and so unable to speak in the debate, he found time to join me on the Front Bench this morning.

There were many good contributions. I hope that I will address most of the points raised; hon. Members will forgive me if I do not ascribe them to each Member who spoke. The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) made several important points. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) has been active in the campaign for a long time. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) spoke movingly about a constituency case that she is pursuing with one of my colleagues. The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Dr. Brand) spoke about the importance of the immunisation programme, as did several other hon. Members. The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) posed several questions.

Before I go into how the scheme operates, may I say that I recognise the difficulties that many children, and their families, must tackle daily? Like other hon. Members who have spoken, I have constituents who must deal with all the pressure on them and their families that comes from being the parent of a severely disabled child. I, too, recognise that where it is believed that a disability arises from vaccine damage, whether or not it can always be established as fact, that belief can add greatly to the sense of distress, anger and even guilt that parents may feel. In common with parents of other disabled children, many such parents grow increasingly concerned about how their children will be provided for when they become adults: they begin to wonder what will happen when they can no longer offer care in the way that they have for so long.

The national immunisation programme is, as was acknowledged throughout the debate, an important programme and the responsibility of the Department of Health. The diseases covered by it are diphtheria, tetanus, pertussis, poliomyelitis, measles, rubella, tuberculosis, mumps and haemophilus influenza type B. I should restate, although it was noted by hon. Members on both sides of the House, that the programme was introduced for a good reason.

The diseases covered by the childhood immunisation programme can lead to serious illness and be life threatening. How well vaccines work is shown by the incidence of diseases before and after the introduction of immunisation. Between 1951 and 1955, there were more than 620,000 cases of whooping cough, to which the hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar alluded, in England and Wales, resulting in more than 1,000 deaths. Between 1991 and 1995, when vaccine coverage reached 94 per cent., there were only five deaths, and the incidence of the disease fell to much lower levels, with only 1,873 cases in 1995.

The success of mumps, measles and rubella, or MMR, vaccine has resulted in notifications of measles reaching their lowest ever levels. Measles vaccine was introduced in 1968, and by the late 1980s, notifications had fallen from a maximum of 800,000 per annum to a maximum of 100,000 per annum. MMR was introduced in 1988, and cases fell to between 10,000 and 20,000 per annum between 1990 and 1994. Slightly more than 4,000 cases were notified in 1997, and the true figure is thought to be much lower, because many reported cases were misdiagnoses. No child in England and Wales has died from acute measles-related illness since 1992. All those figures establish that the immunisation programme provides benefits not only to society as a whole but to the individual and his or her family.

After the separation of the Health and Social Security Departments in 1988, the administration of the payments scheme under the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979 was placed in the custody of the Department of Social Security . A payment under the scheme is not in any way a bar to any subsequent legal proceedings. It does not prejudice the rights of a disabled person and his or her family to seek compensation. Indeed, cases have been taken to court, although it is true that, to date, there has been no successful case on the issue. However, as hon. Members are aware and have mentioned in this debate, some parents have obtained legal aid to pursue their claims against manufacturers of the MMR vaccine.

Hon. Members have asked about legal aid. My understanding is that, notwithstanding the Government's proposals, the current MMR legal aid cases that have been mentioned will be protected while they continue to satisfy the eligibility criteria. The Government have made it clear that we wish personal injury cases to be funded by conditional fee agreements. I acknowledge the issues in the vaccine damage cases that have been raised in the debate, and I shall of course draw those concerns to the attention of the Lord Chancellor.

Since our return to office, many hon. Members have pressed us about the scheme. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles will recall, on 5 November, the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, my hon. Friend the Member for East Ham (Mr. Timms) met representatives of the all-party group on vaccine damage for a very useful discussion. We are aware of concerns on time limits, the disablement threshold, the adequacy of the £10,000 payments under the 1979 Act and other matters. We are aware also that medical opinion on vaccine damage has changed in the past decade or so.

It is important to stress that no prior assumption is made about the possibility of vaccine damage in any individual case. Each claim is dealt with on its merits. However, it is important to state the current understanding of the prevalence of vaccine damage.

Reports in the mid-1970s linking pertussis vaccine and encephalitis resulting in brain damage were based on anecdotal evidence concerning a small number of affected children. Since then, several large studies, such as the national childhood encephalopathy study, have shown no scientific evidence of a causal link between vaccination and brain damage. As such a causal link remains a theoretical possibility, each claim for a vaccine damage payment is carefully considered, taking into account the facts and evidence in the individual case.

The suggestion of a link between MMR and inflammatory bowel disease—particularly Crohn's disease—and autism, has been carefully studied by several independent expert groups. None of the groups has found any evidence to support such a link. Indeed, it is often forgotten in the coverage given to the issue that the original paper by researchers at the Royal Free hospital, published earlier this year in The Lancet, clearly stated:

"We did not prove an association between MMR vaccine and the syndrome described".

The World Health Organisation has also written to stress the safety of the MMR vaccine and to support the United Kingdom's immunisation programme.

The United States Institute of Medicine pointed out that the background rate of encephalopathy—which is a general term used by doctors to describe a disturbance in brain function—in children under two is about five to 10 cases per 100,000 population.

Whatever the prevalence of vaccine damage, at the very least, parents of vaccine-damaged children face the same challenges as parents of other severely disabled children. The vaccine damage payment is not, of course, the only response that the Government make to meet the needs of those and other disabled people.

As a Government, we have a broader challenge: to ensure adequate support to all disabled people. Hon. Members will be aware of the significant improvements in provision for the severely disabled, of extra support for the most severely disabled three and four-year-olds and those disabled before the age of 20, and of our recent proposal in the House of a disability income guarantee, on which we are consulting organisations of and for disabled people.

The vaccine damage payment scheme provides substantial preference for children who are severely disabled as a result of vaccination over children who have been equally severely disabled from some other source. The payment does not preclude payment of other disability benefits and non-means tested benefits such as disability living allowance and severe disablement allowance. If it is held in a trust fund, the vaccine damage payment will be ignored for the purposes of income support, income-based job seeker's allowance, family credit, disability working allowance, council tax benefit and housing benefit.

Recipients, like other severely disabled people, may also be able to get help from the independent living fund and local authority social services. Perhaps the most significant recent development was the announcement, on Monday, by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health on important action to modernise social services. Specifically, the "quality protects" programme will target an extra £375 million to transform all of children's social services.

There has been a sustained campaign to improve the vaccine damage payment system. Today's debate, secured by my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles, is part of that campaign, as have been the early-day motions and the meetings with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security. I am pleased that, in July 1998, the Government were able to increase the payment from £30,000 to £40,000.

Some specific points were raised in the debate, such as that on the 80 per cent. disability criterion. I think that Parliament's view in passing the 1979 Act was that the scheme should be straightforward and aimed at those who are severely disabled. The Act defines severe disablement as disablement to 80 per cent. or more, as assessed for the purposes of determining the rate of disablement pension under the industrial injuries scheme.

In making the assessment, regard is paid to the scale provided in social security regulations. Blindness and deafness, for example, are each described as 100 per cent. disablement, although they clearly do not represent the greatest possible extent of disablement. Therefore, 80 per cent. is regarded as the lower end of the defined severe disablement spectrum.

Occasionally, people have asked about the possibility of a sliding scale of disability. I think that extension of a scheme providing significant preference for one group of people with disabilities over another would run counter to the objective of building a coherent benefits system for all disabled people, regardless of the cause of disability. A scale of disability payments would also run counter to the scheme's principle of providing a straightforward single payment for those who are clearly severely disabled because of vaccination.

Questions were asked in the debate also about time limits. Time limits in the scheme are quite generous. There is a limit of six years after vaccination or the second birthday, whichever is later, for new claims. There is no limit on the time in which a claimant may request a review by an independent tribunal of a medical disallowance of that initial claim. The claimant may request an indefinite adjournment during a tribunal hearing.

Marginal changes in the time limit would not assist in the overwhelming majority of cases. The substantial length of the process would make obtaining medical and other relevant evidence after long periods increasingly difficult, and make the scheme unsatisfactory or even unworkable. However—with the wide range of views about the incidence of vaccine damage, the adequacy of the payment scheme, the position of early recipients and the extent to which those who suffered vaccine damage should receive preferential treatment because they were responding to a publicly promoted health programme—we announced, on 19 May, that the scheme would be considered as part of the welfare review.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security has said that he hopes to conclude our review early in the new year. I am sure that the House will accept that finding the right answer is more important than hitting any specific date. The campaign has made a presentation on disability benefits—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. We must move to the next debate.

11 am

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): Having begun life as watering holes for the wealthy, many of our seaside towns first developed with the coming of the railways. Their greatest expansion came when workers won rights to annual holidays. Seaside resorts were the perfect destinations for a week of rest and relaxation. They have depended on tourism ever since.

Over the past 30 years, the type and number of holidays taken has changed. In the mid-1960s, the majority of people took one holiday a year in the summer months, when factories and other large employers closed for a week or two. Most people had a week's holiday at the seaside, because foreign holidays were beyond their purse. Many holidaymakers would travel by train, although increasing numbers arrived by car, often exhausted after a long journey on congested roads. The activities available to holidaymakers were more limited than they are today. Sitting on the beach, walking along the prom and taking in a show were the normal holiday activities.

The number of days of paid leave has steadily increased and the disposable income of many families has risen. A massive overseas package tour holiday industry has put foreign holidays within the reach of most of the population. Fortunately, many people take more than one holiday a year. Their main holiday may be abroad, but second and third holidays are usually taken in Britain. The number of second holidays taken as short breaks has grown by 50 per cent. in the past five years.

With the development of the motorway network, the car is often the easiest way to travel to a destination in Britain. People can now travel further for day breaks or short stay breaks. They can also return home more quickly, which has reduced the number of overnight stays, particularly when the weather turns nasty.

The seaside towns of Britain can be found all around the coast. Despite being miles apart, in most cases, they share similar characteristics and face similar problems. They fall into three broad groups: heritage coast areas, traditional seaside towns and smaller seaside towns. Heritage coast areas are highly valued for their amenities and have developed seasonal leisure industries and various alternative life style enterprises, together with holiday homes. Traditional seaside towns dominate their area and date from the 19th century or earlier. They are characterised by a large elderly population and higher than average deprivation. Smaller seaside towns are similar to traditional seaside towns, but the main resorts are less dominant in the area and there is a larger rural hinterland.

There are many measures of deprivation, including unemployment, children in poverty, housing, amenities, overcrowding, educational participation and attainment, benefit dependency and crime rate. The traditional seaside towns have some of the worst figures in the country, but the smaller seaside towns have some of the lowest levels of deprivation.

The difficulty in trying to assess the problems of seaside towns is that the areas are often characterised by a mix of deprived and affluent areas. The districts of Brighton, Bournemouth, Great Yarmouth, Hove, Thanet and Torbay are all among the 20 per cent. most unequal in England. In such cases, it is clear that pockets of deprivation are being concealed by their proximity to areas of affluence. My constituency contains five of the 12 local authority wards in the south-west that have been classified as deprived. I shall concentrate on the large, traditional seaside towns, such as my constituency, because they are the areas with the problems that the Government have overlooked.

The typical seaside town is a high retirement area, with the majority of its inhabitants being economically inactive. There will be above average levels of unemployment and below average levels of income. Poor housing and crumbling assets typify most, but not all, seaside towns. However, all have to cope with the consequences of global warming and are on the front line in the battle to prevent coastal erosion.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): Many of the seaside resorts with cliffs and beaches suffer from coastal erosion, but the Government give nothing through the standard spending assessment to cover that. My constituency has 12 miles of sand and sandhills, most of which is a site of special scientific interest. The lack of Government funding to help cope with that is another nail in the coffin of seaside resorts.

Mr. Sanders: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The standard spending assessment does not take into account the year-on-year work of local authorities in protecting their coastline. Only when there is a major natural disaster does the Bellwin scheme come into effect. All local authorities in seaside areas have to dig ever deeper into their budget to cope with such problems. The Government do not give the necessary support for that.

Seaside towns are end-of-the-line towns—places that people go to for what they offer rather than to get somewhere else. The exceptions are some, but not all, ferry ports and some south coast towns on major east-west road routes. However, even those towns share the characteristics of the others and suffer from the same problems, although less severely.

Seaside towns could be described as 180 degree local economies, whereas inland communities are 360 degree local economies. They have hinterland on only one side, while the sea faces them on the other. Those with the most severe economic difficulties are, inevitably, a long way from the main centres of economic activity and are geographically on the periphery.

Many seaside towns are a mixture of urban and rural, deprived and affluent, residents and visitors. Their main industry is tourism, which is one of the fastest-growing economic activities in the world—but not, sadly, in our coastal tourist resorts.

Some 38 per cent. of British residents opting to take their main holiday in Britain choose a traditional seaside destination. The market is worth an impressive £4.2 billion. In 1996, more than 110 million day visits were made to the UK coast. The number of visitors has declined, but figures for their expenditure show a real-terms rise over the past 10 years.

However, that is only part of the story. The figures do not separate tourism spending in seaside resorts from the growing number of inland attractions and markets across England. They do not recognise the fact that local tourist spending does not stay in the local economy because of the growth of nationally owned entertainment centres, pubs, hotels, retailers and superstores, where once locally owned businesses rang up the tills.

Meanwhile, overseas tourism has grown and grown. Although there is little that we can do about the British weather, we should look again at the other problems that go against the seaside holiday as opposed to a foreign holiday. Many of our larger resorts are doing that—bringing in investment to new or renewed attractions, investing in improved bathing water standards, raising standards of service and accommodation, finding and winning niche markets. Most of all, they are diversifying their local economies—or perhaps I should say that they are trying to diversify them.

Diversification has become crucial. Little more than one third of holiday expenditure by the British stays in Britain. Since 1980, the figure has fallen by 50 per cent. At least one foreign holiday a year is the norm. Official figures show that, of 46 million people from Britain travelling abroad in 1997, 29.1 million said that their reason for travel was for a holiday. Most people live closer to their regional airport than to a seaside coastal resort.

The market that remains brings problems, particularly in the 1990s, when tourism is seasonal and changing. The seasonal nature of tourism affects many of the employment problems in seaside towns. Casual labour and part-time jobs are available during the short, and shortening, summer season. During the rest of the year, unemployment is widespread. Those seaside towns that have managed to get into the world of business travel have enjoyed one of the biggest growth areas in the British tourism market. However, even those towns holding conferences, exhibitions and trade fairs have bridged only a small gap between the summer and winter months and remain over-reliant on tourism.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): On the extensive market in business tourism, is my hon. Friend aware of the considerable discrepancy in Government grant aid to Wales, Scotland and England? Government grant aid per head of population is 25p for England—the figure shows no sign of increasing—whereas it is £4.81 for Scotland and £6.36 for Wales. That discrepancy, which is likely to increase after devolution, will make it extremely difficult for seaside resorts such as Newquay in my constituency to market new facilities.

Mr. Sanders: My hon. Friend's figures speak for themselves. The West Country tourist board is today holding a reception in the House to re-emphasise the fact that there is a disparity between England and the other parts of the United Kingdom in the amount of money that can be spent on promoting tourism.

Tourist accommodation has also changed. The market has moved from guest houses and small hotels, which used to be locally owned—and so were re-investors in the local economy—to caravans, camping and holiday homes; the bulk of visitors' spending money now ends up in the tills of superstores, whose profits do not necessarily find their way back to the local economy.

The traditional bucket-and-spade seaside holiday is not in decline, but people can now travel by air to resorts in Europe, in Florida and further afield, which, given our climate, has led to a decline in the number of people who holiday in our coastal resorts. Although the number of visitors continues to be impressive, their lengths of stay and real spend—the amount of money that stays in the local economy—is in decline, which has been as devastating to the economies of seaside towns as the closures of large factories or plants are to inland local economies. The difference is that, for seaside towns, the decline has been occurring over 25 years rather than in one hard blow. The implications are the same; the difference is that there is no specific Government help or support.

Most of the larger seaside towns have to deal with a market that is in decline. There is an over-capacity in tourist accommodation, but owners of hotels and guest houses cannot obtain planning permission to change the use of their properties. To satisfy their lenders, they are forced into a tariff war with their competitors, charging rates that minimise profit margins. Some turn to longer-term occupants on housing benefit, which changes the nature not only of their business but increasingly of the streets in which they are based.

The number of housing benefit claimants increased nationally by 27 per cent. between 1988 and 1995, yet that figure is dwarfed by the increase of between 80 and 100 per cent. in seaside towns such as Torbay, Blackpool and Scarborough—I notice that the hon. Members for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) and for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Quinn) are in the Chamber. That increase is the result of an inadequate housing system and a decline in the number of bed-and-breakfast customers.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there is a wholly new dimension to that problem in my constituency, particularly in Teignmouth? People are applying for change of planning use on their properties so that they can attract the refugees from Europe. Are not the implications for the social and financial structures of the area so great that the problem cannot be left in a vacuum? The Government must make a public policy decision to determine how to cope with those pressures in constituencies such as mine and his.

Mr. Sanders: I agree. The problem confronts a number of constituencies such as Thanet and others on the south coast, although it is beginning to affect the south-west.

Housing can be a huge problem in seaside towns. My local newspaper recently published a report headed "Low pay, high home prices", which described the "terraced cottages with damp streaming down the walls, the impossible-to-heat bedsit under the eaves of draughty Victorian villas, the three-bed semis with rotten window frames hanging by a thread".

A survey into the state of Torbay's housing stock found that almost 3,600 dwellings were unfit for human habitation and 8,300 households were in need of essential repairs. Too many grotty bedsits and flats are hiding behind the affluent image of the Victorian seaside hotels and villas. Exactly the same picture can be found in Brighton, Margate, Hastings and any number of similar resorts. That is a consequence of changes in the tourism market and the Government's failure to recognise our special problems.

The housing that has been built is out of the reach of the two thirds of would-be movers who earn less than £12,500 a year, which is not enough to get a first-time buyer's mortgage on a terraced house in my constituency. We must consider giving local authorities more powers to require developers to build properties that match local needs. Money for the most deprived areas of seaside towns could be raised through charging second home owners the full council tax.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): The hon. Gentleman has referred twice to Thanet and once to Margate, which I represent. He will understand that those towns have a particular problem with asylum seekers, which my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) mentioned, and with dole-on-sea claimants. One of the reasons for the problem is that, as the hon. Gentleman said, not enough money has been spent on refurbishing property. Does he agree that there is a case for a strong policy to enable small guest house owners and hoteliers properly to refurbish their properties and to turn them back either into single homes or into flats? That would mean that they did not have to let them to economic migrants but could let them as good, affordable housing.

Mr. Sanders: I agree. Part of the problem lies in the fact that VAT is levied on renovations but not on new build. Planning law needs major reform; local authorities must have greater powers in determining what can occur. As the hon. Gentleman may know, grants for renovation are available in Scotland and Wales but not in England.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes): I share Torbay with the hon. Gentleman and represent half of it—

Mr. Sanders: Twenty-five per cent.

Mr. Steen: The best 25 per cent., if I may say so. The hon. Gentleman has mentioned second homes, but less than 3 per cent. of homes in the area are second or holiday homes. Is not the problem the 90,000 new houses that will be built in Devon, which the Liberal Democrat county council and the Liberal Democrat unitary authority are supporting? That development will bring 30,000 further households into Devon, but the hon. Gentleman has not mentioned it.

Mr. Sanders: I am not sure that that has anything to do with the problems of seaside resorts. The figure approved by Devon county council is substantially less than the figure that is being imposed by the Secretary of State, so the hon. Gentleman's complaint should be addressed to central Government, not to the local authorities. Perhaps he will join the Liberal Democrat campaign for numbers to be locally derived rather than imposed from the centre, as happened under the previous Government, too.

Unemployment in seaside resorts remains higher than the national average. The United Kingdom average was 4.7 per cent. in October, yet the rate is well above that in many seaside towns—8.7 per cent. in Grimsby and Brighton, Pavilion, 7.9 per cent. in Great Yarmouth, 7.2 per cent. in St. Ives, 5.7 per cent. in Cleethorpes, Scarborough and Whitby and 6.6 per cent. in my constituency of Torbay. Those figures are only slightly lower than those for the inner cities; in some cases, they are higher.

Seaside resorts have a large elderly population, which is in many ways an asset—elderly people contribute to voluntary organisations, clubs and societies that would collapse without them. However, the numbers have effects for which local authorities, businesses and health and social services cannot compensate. A large proportion of the elderly population are on fixed incomes—which, in real terms, are declining incomes—so the amount of money circulating in the local economy is suppressed. The extra pressures on local health and social services are not fully compensated for in Government grants and the jobs associated with caring for the elderly are poorly paid. As the number of retired people is expected to increase over the next decade, the Government need to deal with those issues.

Fundamentally, the seaside towns' problem has been that although they have had to promote tourist attractions in the most positive manner to win their annual influx of visitors, it has been a veneer. In economic terms, the truth is that all large seaside towns hide severe problems behind a facade of palm trees, flower beds and smiling, happy holidaymakers. The Government must realise that resorts have specific problems that must be addressed.

In the past, Governments in Europe have recognised declining and restructuring traditional industries, and have funded inner cities and rural areas to assist their economic regeneration. However, new tourism markets have developed which, in most cases, have won some of the business that traditionally came to resorts. We have had a double whammy. Our economies have been in decline because of overseas competition while Europe and the UK Government have funded other areas and made them into our competitors.

My local authority is organising a conference next week, backed by the British Resorts Association, titled "Resorts—Sunset or Sunrise?" It will be tourism-related, but local authority representatives from across the country will be discussing the common problems faced by resorts, what they can do collectively to improve matters and what the Government and Europe could do to assist. This is a timely conference because, in a recently published UK nomenclature of units of territorial statistics—NUTS III—gross domestic product rankings list, with which the Minister will be familiar, four of the worst 11 districts were traditional large seaside resorts. I have no doubt that the conference will call for our special problems to be recognised by the Government, and for tangible support to help the economic regeneration of coastal resorts.

We do like to be beside the seaside, we do like to be beside the sea. Our resorts are still wonderful places to visit and holiday in. In fact, they have more to offer the visitor today than ever before. However, for people who live in resorts all year round, there is a sense that economic prosperity has passed them by, that other areas with similar problems receive assistance and that we must be thankful that we live on the coast—as if that were compensation for the poorer and declining quality of life faced by my constituents, and those of many other hon. Members. It should not be this way, and I urge the Government to give us the recognition and the support that we deserve.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South): I congratulate the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders), not only on securing the debate—which is, as he said, timely—but on the incisive and comprehensive way in which he presented an analysis of the problems of seaside towns.

The crucial point on which to start is that such problems are, to a large extent, problems in common. Since becoming a Member of Parliament, I have met local government representatives from other seaside towns—as well as from my own—and I have found that many of the problems, such as those caused by high mobility and a transient population, are shared. In future, local authorities in seaside and coastal areas may find it more fruitful to network with authorities that are geographically more disparate than their closer counterparts inland but which have broadly similar problems.

We are discussing a long-standing problem. I have referred on another occasion to Dean Acheson's comment about Britain having lost an empire but not yet found a role. That comment dates from the era of Suez, when many of the problems of seaside towns that the hon. Member for Torbay articulated began. We are not looking at a problem that suddenly appeared, but one which is rather like the veneers on the seaside fronts which have cracked and peeled after years of exposure to adverse elements.

The problems include towns with an aging infrastructure. At the turn of the 20th century, Blackpool invested ambitiously in large building projects. Now, we are paying the price of maintaining them. Other areas with regency or 19th century frontages have similar problems. We have a problem also with the imbalance of accommodation, and the enormous demands in recent years on small guest house and bed-and-breakfast owners to install en-suite and other facilities—mostly without Government support.

We have heard about changing holiday patterns. It is worth saying that seaside and coastal economies are complex, and that many of the employers and activities along the coast which supported and endorsed seaside economies, such as fishing, have also had their problems. They have added to the difficulties faced by seaside towns. As the hon. Member for Torbay and others have said, that has resulted in problems such as the maintenance of holiday accommodation and the growth of unlicensed houses in multiple occupation. In turn, that poses a threat to the attractiveness of the resorts and to the ability of hoteliers to maintain their properties.

The impact on public health has not been appreciated fully. In a town such as Blackpool—this can be replicated in many other places—the combination of an elderly population with young, transient, larger-than-average people coming to look for part-time work, often with young children, adds to the pressures and strains on local health authorities. Another problem may be particular to Blackpool—due to the large number of visitors we get—but may be shared by other resorts. It is, simply, the number of holidaymakers who have accidents—mostly minor, but some major—and who then become a strain on the local hospital and health services. No account is taken of that when budgets are allocated.

I have referred to the need to recognise the problems created by high mobility and a transient population in seaside towns. Those should be reflected more positively when standard spending assessments are considered—particularly the pressures placed on social services and education. One must consider how we define such problems, and the hon. Member for Torbay put his finger on it when he said that those of many seaside towns are a complex mixture. The way in which current statistics are compiled is not always helpful to seaside towns when pressing their case.

One specific example is the impact of the travel-to-work area. My constituency has a number of people employed by British Aerospace at Warton. That expands my local travel-to-work area to take in parts of Lancashire and parts of the Fylde area which have low unemployment. As a consequence, the statistics for the Blackpool travel-to-work area are not indicative of the levels of deprivation and the problems in the town centre. I hope that the Office for National Statistics will take that into account in future.

During the off-season, the central wards of Blackpool can have male unemployment levels of between 12 per cent. and 15 per cent. Female unemployment is lower, but the figures are much less reliable because many women who take on part-time work during the season do not register when the season ends. Many people who live in seaside towns, are particularly badly off in terms of car ownership, and therefore depend on public transport. Blackpool, for example, has the lowest level of car ownership in the north-west.

I am describing a combination of problems of decay and neglect, but there is one common theme; to use the cliché of the moment, we require joined-up thinking from the Government. The problems of seaside towns must not be seen as merely problems for the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, but as problems that must be addressed by all Departments. That is one of the reasons why I was particularly pleased to get the social exclusion unit from No. 10 to visit Blackpool recently to look at a range of problems.

No matter how much money, effort and enthusiasm are put into the promotion of tourism in our seaside towns, it will be as nothing unless we get the basic infrastructure into a shape that is satisfactory to residents as well as attractive to visitors.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): As a Blackpool Member, would the hon. Gentleman agree that his plea for the Government to consider fully the town's problems has been more than adequately dealt with by his party, which has kicked Blackpool in the teeth by no longer holding its conference there?

Mr. Marsden: It is a shame that the generally high tone of our debate has now been lowered to a partisan level. We have every confidence that our conference will return to Blackpool in the near future. The reason why we could not go to Blackpool goes to the heart of some of the difficulties that we are talking about: there is a problem with the infrastructure of the Winter Gardens; many seaside towns suffer from decaying infrastructure. It ill behoves the hon. Gentleman to make such partisan points, when his party slashed the English tourist board's budget by about £8 million, introduced crippling interest rates in the early 1990s and produced the recession that put many small hotels and bed-and-breakfast accommodation out of business.

The Government are making progress; they must produce a stable economic framework and infrastructure for seaside towns. Most important, over the past 18 months, they have taken tourism seriously and have recognised that there is a problem. The tourism strategy will be produced towards the end of the year.

There are difficulties with seasonal employment, and the Department for Education and Employment has addressed them, but I believe that seaside towns will benefit economically from many of the Government's measures, and especially the new deal, which the British hospitality industry estimated could create between 7,000 and 10,000 jobs in the leisure and tourism market. If that can be achieved, along with the increase in quality that I believe the national minimum wage will help to ensure, we will begin to make some progress.

Much remains to be done. Hon. Members will be well aware that coastal pollution must be tackled. The problem is complex, involving not only the discharge of untreated sewage. Consumers must not be hit by water companies with the full increased costs that will be incurred. We must also improve public transport links to seaside towns—as the hon. Member for Torbay said, we are out on the periphery—and it is important to revitalise the hotel and business stock.

The hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) referred to some of the problems with asylum seekers and refugees, and I hope that the matter will be taken up with the Home Office as part of an overall strategy. It would certainly help if the Government considered sympathetically the possibility of abolishing the single room rent for under-25s, which has a serious effect on small businesses and hotels employing young people during the season on relatively low pay, because when the season ends their income drops considerably and the hoteliers and guest house owners are faced with a terrible choice: to take an enormous drop in income from rent or to put the young people out on the streets.

The Government should consider revising business rates in the light of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions consultation paper. Many small businesses in seaside towns feel that they suffer disproportionately under the present regime, and a system whereby a tranche of turnover was exempted, or with a low band, would undoubtedly be beneficial.

The new opportunities fund offers possibilities. If it can help to renew green-field areas, perhaps it can do the same for sandy ones. One of the problems with seaside towns is that they have a great mass of infrastructure which is essentially aesthetic, designed to attract visitors. Piers, arcades and other such structures do not get the funding that they deserve.

It is good that from 1999 the European Union structural funding will take on board the possibility of helping seaside towns. We in Blackpool have been fortunate enough to benefit from single regeneration budget funding, and I recently opened a high-quality foyer house in multiple occupation in the centre of the town. That is precisely the sort of project for which SRB funding should be used but, as the secretary of the British Resorts Association said in his excellent paper on coastal resort regeneration,

"Regrettably, access to SRB funding is severely limited. Few resorts currently qualify for assistance and where they do, tourism related issues often fail to be recognised as meeting the socio-economic criteria necessary to access funding."

Mr. Alan Campbell (Tynemouth): Is my hon. Friend aware that, according to House of Commons Library figures, less than 5 per cent. of the money allocated by the previous Government in SRB rounds 1 to 3 went into coastal towns, and less than 3 per cent. in round 4? Does he agree that that says a great deal about the previous Government's lack of support for coastal towns, and that it would be helpful if the Government were to consider including coastal towns specifically in future SRB guidelines?

Mr. Marsden: I thank my hon. Friend for bringing that information into the public arena. It is extremely important for those criteria to be taken on board in SRB bids. The new regional development agencies could take on board not only the particular problems of seaside towns but the contributions that they make to rejuvenating wider areas and acting as a magnet for employment. For example, Blackpool undoubtedly acts as a catchment area, bringing people in from the wider area of Fylde; Brighton and Hove perform the same function for east Sussex; and there is a similar effect in north Wales.

The RDAs must take on board the strategic need and consider the whole question of structural funding. I am delighted that the hon. Member for Torbay gave a plug for the conference that will address some of the issues next week.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): Clearly, some of the hypothecated funding can be useful, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that seaside towns such as Worthing and many others depend mainly on the funding available to their local authorities and county councils? Is he as apprehensive as I am that the rate support grant to be announced later today will draw money away from seaside towns and put it into inner cities? Will not that be more damaging than the possibilities offered by the single regeneration budget?

Mr. Marsden: I do not have a crystal ball, so I cannot say what the announcement on the standard spending assessments will contain. Whatever the outcome, it is important that we all recognise that many of the problems that seaside towns face, the hon. Gentleman's constituency among them, are replicated in inner cities.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): The hon. Gentleman should examine the record. He suggests help for the south-west in places such as Weymouth and Portland, but he should ask the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson) about that. The hon. Gentleman was the only Labour Member in the south-west when the previous Government gave help to those areas, and he was embarrassed when the Labour party voted against it.

Mr. Marsden: I can only speak for myself, but I would never be embarrassed by any help given to Blackpool, provided it came from a legitimate quarter. It is clear from the debate that seaside towns face complex problems, and we need a holistic response. The Government have made a useful start, and I praise the work of Ministers in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, especially the new Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting, who has taken an energetic approach to the issue. I urge the Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning and his colleagues to carry through that joined-up thinking into the various initiatives that we need to consider. Most seaside towns made their mark at the end of the 19th century by a combination of enlightened municipal government working with dynamic local entrepreneurs. That buzz and excitement can be recaptured, but that requires the support, backing and understanding of central Government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. Before I call the next hon. Member, I remind the House that this is a relatively short debate and a number of hon. Members wish to catch my eye. Unless contributions are brief, several hon. Members will be disappointed.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): I congratulate the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) on raising an important issue and doing so in a non-political way. I had hoped that that was how we would approach the matter, but we heard a silly comment from the hon. Gentleman who is wearing a red tie and sitting beside the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden)—[Interruption.] I am told that I mean the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Campbell), but I have never seen him before. He said that, under the Conservatives, the amount of money given to seaside towns was low, but that was because of the rules on travel-to-work areas, not the nasty Conservative Government.

My constituency of Southend-on-Sea is a lovely place to live. The Government put the borough forward for assisted area status, which was unfortunately turned down by Commissioner van Miert, who cut 10 per cent. off the Government's applications, because our unemployment rate was based on travel-to-work areas. The Government then advanced parts of Southend for what are called objective 2 grants, but that application was turned down by Commissioner Millan on the basis that Southend was not an industrial town. If the hon. Member for Tynemouth considered the issues instead of trying to make silly critical points, we might be better able to help the seaside towns.

We must consider carefully five points that are common to seaside towns. The first is that of jobs. In Southend, where I have lived with my family for 18 years, we have high unemployment. In one ward, Milton, in the centre of town, the unemployment rate is 25 per cent., compared with the national average of 4.7 per cent. In my constituency as a whole, unemployment for men is more than 10 per cent. Other seaside towns also have high levels of unemployment, whether under Conservative, Labour or Liberal Democrat Governments. However, the crucial point is that almost all seaside towns are part of larger inland areas in which unemployment levels are much lower. The seaside towns are denied benefits and grants because they are in travel-to-work areas and thus eliminated from consideration. I hope that this Government, and future Governments, will consider the possibility of making grants available to areas smaller than travel-to-work areas. It is scandalous, and contrary to common sense, that areas with high unemployment cannot be considered for help because of the rule on travel-to-work areas.

I am sure that most people in Southend-on-Sea, which is represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) and myself—we always agree on everything—would be glad if all subsidies could be stopped tomorrow, but we object when massive amounts of cash go to areas with far lower rates of unemployment and fewer problems. In Southend, we often debate the Hertfordshire problem, and the boss of the local further education institution has terrible rows with me on that issue. He says that we must live in the real world and employ consultants to try to get money from every source possible. He points out that Hertfordshire people are very clever and get massive grants for deprivation and unemployment although there is hardly any in the area. He says that we should learn from that and start making our case properly. However, my point is that—if we are to have grants, subsidies and such things—we should reorganise the system so that seaside towns with areas of high unemployment can be considered.

The second common point is social problems. The Minister of State will be aware that Southend-on-Sea has a happy council. The Labour party and the Liberal Democrats have a majority of one over the Conservative party, so the situation is tight. A few weeks ago, the majority parties had to close three of our old folks' homes—not because they wanted to or because they are nasty socialists or nasty liberals but because we do not have enough cash to keep them going. In the local hospital, the use of many beds is blocked, because the council cannot afford to provide accommodation in retirement homes. Seaside towns face a concentration of social problems that are not taken into account in the financing of local government. As the Minister of State will be aware, other areas dump their social problems in seaside towns such as Southend, because we have a lot of bed-and-breakfast accommodation and houses in multiple occupation. That means that we have more than our share of social problems. Our local director of social services has told me that we are still short of £2.5 million for our budget this year. That is not because the council is stupid or corrupt, but because we have a larger concentration of social problems. I hope that the Minister will bear that point in mind.

The third problem is transport. Because seaside towns tend to be at the end of the line, they also tend to be left out of road programmes. If the Minister of State visited Southend, he would see that we have horrendous traffic congestion. One large area at one end of the town, Shoeburyness, has many employment problems. Two major sites are being made available by the Ministry of Defence for development, but it is difficult to arouse interest in the properties because it is very difficult to get out of Southend from Shoeburyness. In the rush hour, it takes 40 minutes to do so and at other times it takes 25 minutes. I hope that the Government will realise that a bypass, for example, would make a dramatic difference to towns at the end of the line, such as Southend. Governments of all parties tend to concentrate on the centre of England, and of Scotland, and they do not bear it in mind that seaside towns have particular problems.

Fourthly, I want to refer to regional government. Southend has had the pleasure of escaping from Essex county council because we felt that Chelmsford was too far away. Although Chelmsford has a superb Member of Parliament, we felt that the council did not take our interests fully into account. We were happy to establish an independent republic of Southend-on-Sea, although, sadly, it is not outside the Common Market.

Having escaped, however, we resent the fact that, without people noticing it—which is the saddest fact of all—a new regional government system is being established. Our regional centre will be based in Cambridge, with a massive, costly structure. I constantly receive lots of paper—invitations to dinners, lunches, meetings, conferences—listing lots of things that regional government will be interested in doing. I believe, however, that regional government is being imposed simply because the European Union wants it throughout its whole area. That is sad and costly nonsense. I hope that the Government will carefully consider what good regional government can possibly do, not only for seaside towns but for other areas.

Finally—I have taken just over six minutes, Mr. Deputy Speaker—the Government are having a wee think about the lottery. We are distressed about the lottery. Southend has the longest pier in the world, of which we are very proud. It has a superb train, and it is very exciting to look at it. Yet the ridiculous lottery keeps giving lots of money to clapped-out piers on the basis that they are of historical interest. I am sure that there are some exceptions to that, but Southend objects strongly that although our pier is a sound, going concern, nothing seems to be done for it.

Southend is a great place to live, and if the Minister doubts that, he can read the figures published by the Department for Education and Employment yesterday, which show that our education results were 2.5 per cent. above the English average, despite our serious unemployment and deprivation. We are proud of that, and of many things in Southend. If the Government must keep establishing new organisations and giving out subsidies, they should let us have our share, although we should be happier if there were no such subsidies at all. [Hon. Members: "Oh."] I can assure Labour Members that that would be good for us.

Southend has achieved a great deal of which the town is proud. I hope that the Government will bear in mind that it, like other seaside towns, has high unemployment, a concentration of social problems and serious transport problems that are not being taken fully into account. I hope that the Government will approach those problems not by blaming the previous Government, or by saying how wonderful they are themselves, but by taking serious, urgent and sensible action, as proposed by the hon. Member for Torbay in his excellent speech.

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes): I shall start with an advert for Cleethorpes. Everyone else has been advertising their resorts, so I should advertise mine. Cleethorpes is a wonderful place with many amenities. We have a great theme park and one of the largest caravan parks in Europe. The Greenwich meridian runs through the town, although we are not putting up any dome. There is a pier, a steam light railway, a prom, amusements, a wonderful discovery centre, sands, waters that have been given a clean bill of health, and Grimsby Town football club. We also have the best fish and chips in Britain. [Hon. Members: "No, no."] They are absolutely the best.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting visited the town over the summer to see our facilities, and to learn of the problems facing Cleethorpes. She met owners of guest houses and people who provide the amusements in order to find out what the Government can do to assist them. I can echo what other hon. Members have said by saying that as people come to Cleethorpes—mainly from South Yorkshire—they often do not see what lies behind the fun, the amusements and the prom. There are severe pockets of deprivation in the area.

Cleethorpes is part of the same urban area as Grimsby, which has one of the highest structural unemployment levels in the United Kingdom. In the North East Lincolnshire council area, deprivation is severe, and is worse than in some of the former mining communities of south Yorkshire, which provide most of our visitors. However, the size of the area, and the fact that there are affluent areas on the fringes of Cleethorpes, mean that the deprivation is largely masked. It is concentrated in only a few wards, but, as other hon. Members have said, that hidden deprivation must be addressed.

We must reconsider both standard spending assessments and all the employment problems that impact on seaside resorts. Cleethorpes is part of the same urban area as Grimsby, and the decline in the fishing industry there has had a severe impact on the area. However, the problems are more complex than that. North of Grimsby, and within the constituency of Cleethorpes, though not the town, there is a booming industrial area on the banks of the Humber where there are chemical firms, power stations and oil refineries. That, too, has an impact on our travel-to-work area, and on our unemployment statistics, so that our severe problems are not recognised.

I recently came across another quirk in my area's funding. As far as the Home Office is concerned, Cleethorpes is not a resort. There is a pier, there is water and there is sand, but we are not a resort, and we cannot, therefore, have funding to cope with the big influx of visitors who come weekend in and weekend out, and throughout the summer. That must be reconsidered. I have been given no adequate explanation of why Cleethorpes is not regarded as a seaside resort, although it is, by some quirk, considered to be on the Humber, and to be an estuary resort because there is a bit of fresh water coming into it. That is a pretty tenuous explanation. We still host the same number of visitors, and that problem ought to be addressed.

Most of the resorts that have been mentioned so far are much bigger than Cleethorpes, and they have the benefits of larger hotels and conference facilities. Cleethorpes has none of that. We cannot rely on conference trade to boost the town, and we have had to be somewhat more imaginative in promoting the resort. Things are not all that bad because we are using money from the Government, from Europe, from the council and from business. We have turned round the decline previously experienced in Cleethorpes. For about five years, there has been a lot of investment in the town.

I pay tribute to North East Lincolnshire council for its innovative work with industry on the Humber bank to create and to fund new attractions, such as the discovery centre, which has an observatory overlooking the Humber from where one can study wintering birds on the estuary. That new attraction has taken off, echoing developments in the Victorian era when councils and entrepreneurs joined forces, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) said earlier.

I would like to see much more, however. Lottery funding has been mentioned, and, although Cleethorpes and Grimsby—with four recent winners—seem able to be home to people who win the lottery, the picture the other way round is different. Can we get any money out of the lottery for the town? No, we cannot. We have put in bids to regenerate the marketplace in Cleethorpes, but they have been slapped down time and again. We do not have regency terraces, and the resort is both small and more working class than others, but the marketplace still has architectural merit. We seem to be overlooked repeatedly. Awards to our part of Lincolnshire are among the lowest in the country. I shall be approaching the Minister to find out whether a lottery development worker could come to the area to see our problems, instead of simply refusing our bids out of hand.

I should like to see a change in the way in which we promote our resorts. When I go abroad I can purchase an integrated ticket which provides me with accommodation and travel, and sometimes includes entry to museums or vouchers for meals. It is very difficult for somebody coming to Britain from abroad to purchase such a ticket. That is a disincentive to people from this country as well as to overseas visitors. As I have said, Cleethorpes attracts many people from south Yorkshire so we should be trying to promote Lincolnshire resorts in the cities of that county in an integrated way.

The ferry from the Netherlands docks in Hull, just on the other side of the river from Cleethorpes, but it is rare for any people from the Netherlands to come into the resort. When I visited Thorpe park recently, which is one of the attractions in Cleethorpes, it boasted that this year it has had its first Dutch visitor. As I have said, hundreds of people from the Netherlands come off those ferries daily, but they simply bypass our seaside resorts.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): As time is short, I shall restrict myself to one substantive point. I commend the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) for choosing the subject and for the way in which he introduced it. I also commend him for his professionalism in avoiding the intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen). It was an excellent speech.

Throughout the debate we have heard a great deal about the changing holiday patterns at seaside resorts and the fact that, behind the facade, there can be areas of real commercial and private deprivation. As a result, in Teignbridge, to my certain knowledge, there has been at least one application in recent days—I suspect that there will be others shortly—from those who have owned hotels, care homes or the like and who are now seeking planning permission to make them centres for refugees from Kosovo. Anybody who sees what is happening on the television or reads about it in the newspapers cannot help but feel great sympathy for refugees from any country. However, I am here to speak on behalf of the people of Teignmouth, not the people of Kosovo.

The people of Teignmouth are gravely worried that a substantial change in the social patterns of the town are taking place in a way that has not been planned and which, to be fair, was not intended by anyone. I can understand why somebody might see a perfectly legitimate commercial advantage and seek to exploit it, but when refugees are brought in like that, we do not know about their status. We do not know whether they are economic refugees or genuine refugees. Whatever they are, there will be a substantial demand on local resources. It will make a difference to education, social services and housing. That is a whole new subject area that must be considered by the Government.

The problem is that, as in so many things, the Government ape our rhetoric on immigration but, in reality, the Labour party does not find it easy to bear down on immigration. Therefore, it does not find it easy to face up to some of the social consequences. Because of that, I have already written to the Deputy Prime Minister. I did not criticise the Government for not having anticipated the problem as that would be unfair and unhelpful. However, it is fair to say—I said it to the Deputy Prime Minister and I say it to the Minister today—that, even though it is not the Government's fault that this situation has arisen, it is up to them to find a solution. Even if the Minister cannot respond to me today, I hope that, if he will not adopt my words, he will at least acknowledge that there is a problem and accept that it requires some substantive thought from the Government.

I shall end on that point, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I said that I would restrict myself in accordance with your strictures. Also, even though you are not the same Deputy Speaker who said that short speeches would be appreciated, I hope that you will feel able to note what I have said and to note in your book that, when I am called, I really do comply with the request for short speeches. I hope that that will be borne in mind for the future.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): I made an earlier intervention about beaches and I want to follow that up by relating what happened when I visited Sellafield. I am talking on behalf of resorts in the north-west, stretching from Cumbria to Wilfra power station on the isle of Anglesey. A few years ago I visited Sellafield unannounced and, while standing on top of the old Magnox reactor, I asked how much radioactive material was pumped into the Irish sea. A member of the management told me that it was a very small amount compared with about 40 years ago. That radioactive material is still in the Irish sea. All the beaches along the coast from Cumbria down to Wales are washed by the Irish sea.

Our council in Sefton, which covers Southport, asked the Government at that time for some money to monitor the beaches to find out whether there was any radioactivity. The answer from the Government was no. However, councils should monitor their beaches throughout the year. Some councils did that and I believe that our council managed to do it with about £8,000. That figure has now been slashed under the standard spending assessment. Perhaps today we will hear more about the SSA and be able to get that money back.

I hope that the Government will consider the fact that, in the north-west, and probably on the Welsh beaches, there is a problem from 40 or 50 years ago that needs to be dealt with. Some councils are aware of it and many have information on it. It is very serious. Since that earlier visit to Sellafield I have been back on other occasions and, although I have asked similar questions, I have not received the same answers.

I want just one more plug. My town of Southport has diversified. We have many conferences and a great shopping area. In Lord street there are many individual shops. The shopping areas that have grown up around Southport are beginning to pull away some of the strands from the private shopping area. I ask the Government, as did the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden), to look at the business rates, especially those in seaside resorts and in areas with individual shops.

12.8 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): I congratulate the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) on initiating the debate. As the Liberal Democrats support the Labour Government, I hope that they will listen to his words.

I was a little apprehensive about speaking in the debate because I do not want Southend to become known as an economic blackspot. Many Londoners regard Southend as the finest seaside resort in the country. I have only represented part of the town since 1 May 1997. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) has represented the other half for a great length of time. Coming to the town new, I was somewhat surprised at the seriousness of some of the social problems. That is why the local authority, which is a combination of Labour and Liberal Democrats, has produced a nine-point plan, all of which I support. We feel that we should make Southend's voice heard.

If tourism is seen to be a serious matter, it is disappointing that, during the first 18 months of the new Government, there has been no debate on it. It is appalling that the Labour party is no longer holding its conference in Blackpool. If Blackpool is good enough for the Conservative party, it is surprising that it is not posh enough for the Labour party. That is very damaging for seaside resorts.

As I have said, we feel that Southend's voice should be heard. We want the social problems to be addressed. As my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East has said, we have much higher unemployment than other parts of the country. We feel that the town should be supported as a family destination. It is very close to London and we are blessed with beautiful coastal views, which have inspired so many artists in our town.

We need more support to deal with the skills shortage in Southend. We want to promote the town as a sub-regional shopping centre, and we ask for the Government's support in that. We want to promote inward investment and the development of sites that my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East mentioned earlier. We want to improve transport links for the borough. There is not enough imaginative use of the River Thames.

We want to promote partnership working and attract national and European funds. Earlier this year I met the commissioner who has responsibility for those matters. Whatever questions I asked, I was told to work with the Government in promoting grant aid to the country, but as my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East has said, for many reasons we do not qualify.

Southend is a wonderful seaside resort. I am delighted to say that Southend parks department is now in the international finals of a gardening competition, and I hope that the UK, represented by Southend, will win. On Friday in my constituency, thousands of people attended the switching on of the lights in Leigh-on-Sea, and that is a very attractive part of the town. I do not want to disagree with the hon. Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac), but Southend and Leigh-on-Sea have the finest fish and chips in the world. We undoubtedly have the finest ice cream in the world. That comes from a company that is run by a Rossi.

Southend-on-Sea has a great deal going for it, but in the past 18 months the Government have not taken seriously enough the many social problems articulated by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East. I do not want to be churlish, but I hope that when the Minister replies, he will consider favourably the calls from my hon. Friend and myself to support Southend.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) on initiating the debate and giving us the opportunity to discuss the important issue of serious, significant problems for the seaside holiday sector of the tourist industry.

We have heard speeches by hon. Members on both sides of the House who all have the distinction of representing seaside holiday towns. I suspect that only the Minister and I do not share the honour of having a seaside town in our constituencies, although I am told that maps and reports reveal that if global warming continues at its current rate, it is only a matter of time before we have Chelmsford sur la mer, rather than in the middle of Essex.

It is fortunate that my county has, as demonstrated by the speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) and for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), a number of popular holiday resorts, including not only Southend and Westcliff but Frinton and Clacton. I see that the hon. Member for Harwich (Mr. Henderson) is in his place.

There are problems in such towns throughout the country. It is interesting to place in context the events of the past quarter of a century which have accentuated the problems that are now so acute in many of those towns, as highlighted in hon. Members' speeches.

There has been a significant increase in the business of package holidays abroad. Packaging the cost of flights and accommodation abroad allows many more people to leave this country for warmer climes to go on holiday. I suspect that one of the major incentives that caused those numbers to rise to today's levels was the abolition of exchange controls in 1979. That not only meant that more people could afford to go away because the increase in volume brought down prices through economies of scale, but enabled people more easily to spend more money abroad.

As the hon. Member for Torbay said in his opening remarks, just under four out of 10 holidays in this country are taken at seaside holiday resorts, although that is worth a significant £4.2 billion. The figures also reveal that 18.5 million holiday trips are taken to the seaside in England in a year, generating the not inconsiderable sum of £3.2 billion. However, seaside towns and the domestic tourist business are becoming more and more dependent on the home market. Less than 5 per cent. of people who come to the UK for a holiday go to a seaside town. Those towns are sustained and supported by a narrow base of visitors compared with the potential maximum.

The rosy, picture postcard idea of holiday resorts is in many cases, sadly, no longer the reality. Hon. Members have spoken of many problems, including those of housing stock and infrastructure vis-a-vis transport. Those towns are unable to compete, through no one's fault, because the UK's climate is not always conducive to people spending their holidays and their money here. If one wants two weeks of almost guaranteed sunshine and warmth, one does not choose Britain every year. If this summer was anything to go by, I am fearful of what will happen next year because many people do not want to sit on a windy promenade in drizzle or pouring rain when they could be using their bucket and spade on the Costa del Sol or in other parts of the world.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Would it not be a good idea for the Prime Minister to spend a week of his holiday in a British resort? Perhaps he could draw by lot if he does not want to come to Worthing. For him to take his holidays in other countries is a slap in the face to our seaside towns.

Mr. Burns: My hon. Friend makes an extremely cool intervention. I hope that the Prime Minister pays attention to that point. Although my hon. Friend has plugged his own constituency, Conservative Members believe that the Prime Minister is free to choose to spend his time with his family in one of the many holiday resorts in this country.

The issue of asylum seekers was raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) and for North Thanet (Mr. Gale). Asylum seekers and social security claimants are increasingly moving to seaside holiday towns, using their accommodation and causing ensuing problems. As my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge said in his excellent speech, nobody blames the Government for that, but it is important that the Government treat it as an urgent matter and come up with constructive ways to alleviate the problems experienced by my hon. Friends' constituents.

I want to raise two economic matters that adversely affect many seaside towns and which were not mentioned by Labour Members. The first is the impact of the high pound on the tourist industry in this country, including holiday seaside towns. People who might otherwise choose to spend their holidays in this country are discouraged by the disproportionate cost compared with earlier times when exchange rates were not so high. The second point is the minimum wage, which will adversely affect many hoteliers and businesses.

Mr. Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burns: No, because I want to leave the Minister enough time to reply.

The minimum wage will adversely affect the tourism industry in particular. I wonder whether the Government fully appreciate what the impact will be, not only on the industry, but on employment levels.

Mr. Quinn: And disposable incomes.

Mr. Burns: The hon. Gentleman mentions disposable incomes. When the minimum wage is introduced and we witness its impact on the tourism industry in the form of job losses, it will not be warmly welcomed. The hon. Gentleman's remarks may not be as popular then as they are now.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East mentioned the problem of higher unemployment rates, especially in the winter months—because, of course, the tourism industry is largely seasonal—for people living in those towns, and the strains and problems that it imposes on communities.

I could say much more, but I should allow the Minister to answer—as I hope he will—the points that all hon. Members have made in this important debate.

The Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning (Mr. Richard Caborn): It has been an interesting debate, to say the least. I remind the slightly more right-wing Conservative Members who represent Southend that, before the past 18 months, their party was in government for 18 years. In the debate, they probably asked for more handouts for Southend than were asked for by all my hon. Friends put together—and the Conservatives are the ones who do not want subsidies. When the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) reads Hansard tomorrow and reflects on his speech, he will see that he has gone against everything that he has preached in the House for the past 20-odd years.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders) on securing the debate. I know that the issue of economic problems facing seaside holiday towns is close to his heart. I was extremely grateful to have the opportunity on 8 October 1998 to visit his constituency, where I saw at first hand the problems confronting Torbay, and discussed with a wide range of stakeholders in the area possible pathways out of those problems. The hon. Gentleman might have mentioned the fact that I visited Torbay that day, as I believe that I did so at certain people's invitation.

I know from my visit that Torbay council is very concerned about European structural funds, and has a keen interest in assisted area status. When I visited Torbay, I heard the unfortunate announcement of the partial closure of Nortel's plant, which, obviously, will have a considerable impact on unemployment in the area. We should remember that changes in the structures surrounding seaside resorts may have devastating consequences.

The speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) showed that the Government are trying to deal not only with the symptoms, but with the deep-rooted causes of problems. We believe that it is important that town centres are vibrant and active. That is why, in our planning regime, on PPG6, we have taken a tough line on the application of the previous Government's planning guidance. We want to ensure that town centres return to life, and we believe that retailing is one of the driving forces of that process.

I assure the House that, on PPG6, I shall take a very tough line on applications outside towns and cities. That imperative was brought clearly to my mind in relation to Torquay, and Torbay generally. Unless that issue is addressed correctly, it will be difficult to achieve the other structural changes that the hon. Member for Torbay mentioned.

We want competition in town centres, and we shall take into consideration some of the arguments that have been made about rating regimes and grant regimes, to ensure that we achieve what we call the "urban renaissance". That applies as much to seaside resorts and town centres where tourism is important as it does to other town centres.

We have embarked on root-and-branch reform of the land use planning and transport planning of this country. On 14 January 1998, I issued a document on the modernisation of planning. We are systematically considering every part of the land use planning structure in England. Part of that document, on which we have widely consulted, is on regional planning guidance. It is important that we achieve the overview that is necessary to link spatial, land use and transport planning, and we are doing so by strengthening regional planning guidance. It will not be a top-down process; it will be very much bottom-up.

At this moment, in the south-west, those issues are being discussed with local authorities; they will then be discussed by the south-west regional planning conference. A strategy will be developed, which, I hope, will be submitted to public examination later in the year—probably, in the autumn. That will give the opportunity for people to factor in their concerns on transport, spatial or land use planning issues. I hope that the results will be positive.

Questions have been asked on household growth. To hear them, one would suppose that the Government were bringing about increases in population or making social changes; they are not. As has been said many times from this Dispatch Box, solutions must be found to the problem of household growth. We want to plan and manage, not "predict and provide". The regional planning conferences will address those major issues when they hold public hearings in their regions.

In September, I launched the bidding guidance for round 5 of the single regeneration budget. We believe that to be an important instrument for tackling social exclusion and promoting equality. I changed the guidance and, I hope, steered it towards need and away from the fairly crude competition that had prevailed. I also instituted a division in the SRB. Eighty per cent. of it will go to the major deprived areas—about 65 local authority areas, identified using the four deprivation measures of the 1998 index of local deprivation.

In September, we also said that we would tackle pockets of deprivation in other areas, especially in coastal towns. Twenty per cent. of the SRB—a spend of about £3.8 billion over the next three years—has been made available for that purpose. Local SRB partnerships were invited to submit by last Friday initial bids for funding—known as expressions of interest—to Government offices for the regions. I am pleased to say that 44 of those bids include proposals for regeneration of seaside towns. I understand that one of those bids is for regeneration in Torbay—an area that the Government office for the south west highlighted in the SRB round 5 regional framework.

Mr. Nicholls: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Caborn: I shall not give way; I have only two minutes to go.

Mr. Nicholls: On asylum seekers.

Mr. Caborn: I believe that the question on asylum seekers was answered by my right hon. Friend the Home

[Mr. Caborn]

Secretary when he made a statement to the House, either last week or earlier this week. Unfortunately, I was not in the House at the time. If hon. Members want to take that matter up, it would be far better for them to take it up with the Home Office.

Round 5 of the SRB has been restructured, and we want to ensure that it is targeted on the areas that have been highlighted in the debate.

Scathing remarks were made about the regional structure that the present Administration will introduce. I remind the House that we are introducing the regional development agencies because not one region in England outside London is performing, in wealth creation terms—in gross domestic product per capita terms—to the level of the average of the European regions. If wealth is not created, it cannot be recycled—in a seaside town or elsewhere.

Business-led boards of 12 people will consider structural weaknesses, in terms of wealth creation, in our English regions, including seaside towns. The boards will consider the underlying problems of the United Kingdom, and England in particular. That regional structure will at least fill the policy vacuum, ensuring that we can create wealth much more effectively than hitherto. That is the legacy of the past 18 years. We have tried to rectify it in 18 months.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order.

Aid (Burundi)

12.30 pm

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): I am delighted to be joined in the debate by my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King). Together with the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell), who cannot be present today, and the estimable Victoria Scott of the United Nations Children's Fund, we visited Burundi in July and early August this year.

The children of Burundi need help. Anyone who can read and reflect would know that. Burundi is the most densely populated country in the poorest continent on earth. The country is riven with civil war: 200,000 people have been killed since 1993, and there are 294,000 refugees living in neighbouring countries and 500,000 in displaced persons camps within the country. On top of all that, sanctions have been in force since 1996, making the price of food and the transport of medicines more expensive and threatening the cold chain for vital medicines and health supplies.

In that country, 40 per cent. of children under three suffer chronic malnutrition, and 20 per cent. of children die before the age of five. There are 400,000 children in acute distress, many of them homeless, without access to basic health services or education, and there are 20,000 unaccompanied children.

We know that the children of Burundi need help because we saw that with our own eyes earlier this year. "Unaccompanied" is such an inadequate description of the raped and robbed, malnourished, shoeless, scarred, traumatised children whom we met. We met some of the 20,000 children who will sleep out on the streets of the capital, Bujumbura, tonight.

I have children of my own and have worked with children in this country for decades. I have never seen anyone so avid for learning as some of the girls crowded into a tiny classroom at the street children project which finally, after a very long week, made me weep.

In the midst of abject poverty, malnutrition and the horrendous circumstances of those uprooted from their homes and land—we heard of teachers who had been killed for being teachers, and of schools and hospitals targeted for destruction—we met extraordinary courage and resilience. We were greeted everywhere with drums, singing and dancing, and we occasionally joined in.

In Cibitoke, along a road where aid workers had been murdered only a week before, and where a group of women from Great Britain and Ireland steadfastly got on with the job of feeding starving children, I met a young man who introduced himself to me as Jean Jacques Rousseau.

Burundi is a beautiful country, and I believe that there is hope for it. That hope is reflected in the spirit of the people, who before the crisis in 1990 had vaccinated 96 per cent. of the populace; in recent increases in primary school enrolment; in the numbers of people who have returned to the country to get on with their lives; in the work of UNICEF, which was our host, and of the aid agencies which, even since our visit, have improved tracing systems and developed a new shelter in Bujumbura for the homeless children whom we met; and in the work of so many Burundian people, who want to make progress with peace and reconciliation.

I know that there is hope, too, in the enormous good will and commitment of people in Britain. That hope is well expressed in the £39 million made available from this country to Burundi since 1994, but Burundi needs more. The children of Burundi need peace to emerge from the Arusha talks. They need the sanctions to be lifted, and the artificial distinctions between humanitarian and development aid to be erased. They need more help. The word "need" is cast around recklessly in this place, but not in this debate. The children of Burundi need more help, and they might feel more comfortable if it came with no strings attached, from a country that was not part of their colonial history.

Next year Burundi and the United Kingdom, separately, are due to report to the United Nations on their implementation of the United Nations convention on children's rights. Two days ago our extremely wealthy country did something magnificent for our most dispossessed and vulnerable children, with the creation of regional children's rights commissioners for children living away from their homes in this country. It would be a great and fine thing to do even more for Jean Jacques Rousseau and all his mates in Burundi.

Ms Oona King (Bethnal Green and Bow): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) for applying for the debate, which is desperately needed. I also thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Herculean efforts that have been made to raise awareness of the issues facing children not just in Burundi, but in the entire great lakes region. Burundi's past and future are inextricably linked to the continuing crisis in that region.

Children in Burundi are at the sharp end of the conflict. Forty per cent. of children under three suffer from malnutrition. There is a crisis of huge proportions, which my hon. Friend and I witnessed when we visited the country as guests of the United Nations Children's Fund.

I shall give one example of what I saw there, to illustrate how women and children in Burundi are being affected by the crisis. We visited a prison, where I spoke to some women prisoners. One of them was a young woman called Elaine. She was 28 years old and had two children—a three-year-old daughter and a seven-year-old son. When her area was attacked following rebel activity, Elaine was eight months pregnant. She fled with her husband to an internally displaced persons camp. There she was arrested for taking part in the activities of a religious order—perhaps a sect or even a cult. After I had been in Burundi a while and seen the deprivation there, I thought that even I might end up in a religious sect or cult, if there were no other way out of the prevailing misery.

Elaine was subsequently put in gaol, because the Government in Burundi were not happy that the religious sect would not take orders from them about where it should be resettled. When I spoke to Elaine, I asked her which was worse—the IDP camp or prison. She looked at me and said, "They are both the same; it makes no difference." She was correct. For someone in her situation, it makes no difference. There is no future for her or her child unless we work at an international level to put pressure on the regional Governments so that sanctions are lifted, some measure of peace can be brought to the region and people can be resettled in homes of their own, rather than having to drag their children from pillar to post, or from an IDP camp to gaol. Only the younger child was put in gaol. When Elaine's husband visited her with the elder child, now aged seven, she asked whether he could stay with her in gaol, because she felt that he would have a greater chance there of securing one meal a day.

What I discovered after a week in Burundi was that imprisonment has many forms. Gaol is just one of them. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has set herself perhaps the most difficult task faced by any politician in government: to eradicate poverty. Targets are set, but only when we visit countries such as Burundi do such targets spring to life and really mean something. People can find ladders to take them out of poverty, if they are given the opportunities that they are currently denied.

I was struck by another stark truth. We tend to imagine that we are embarked on an onward march in historical terms. Only recently—between 1990 and 1997—poverty in Burundi's rural areas has increased from 35 per cent. to 58 per cent., and in urban areas it has increased from 32 per cent. to 66 per cent. That is not progress.

How can we make progress? It will require political will. I understand that the Department is considered to be at the forefront of the battle to generate the political will that has been sadly lacking in the international community thus far. The lack of political will was most strongly demonstrated during the genocide in Rwanda: no one was willing to lift a finger to stop it. We saw the effects in Burundi, for the whole region is interrelated. Many of the people who were displaced from their homes in Rwanda following the genocide were people whom we met in Burundi—and vice versa: I found the same when I visited Rwanda.

We need a regional solution to the crisis. The Department must be able to use the political will that it is already generating. During the recent visit of the Select Committee on International Development to the United Nations headquarters in New York, many people told us that the fact that someone of ministerial rank was pushing the necessary policies—not just in Britain, but throughout the world—had, for the first time, made a real difference. We need more of that. I think that we have cross-party support in the House, but we need to secure the same support in the country. People must understand that poverty is a real prospect for children in Burundi. During our visit, we saw children who were not allowed into feeding centres because they did not weigh less than 70 per cent. of what was required in terms of their body:height ratio. Children had to be on the verge of death to get what they needed.

That brings me to the difficult issue of humanitarian aid versus development aid. We should consider what it means for children, and how we can promote sustainable development. When we examine the regional problems caused by sanctions, it is instructive to note what they mean on the ground.

We visited a feeding centre where vaccinations were given. Burundi used to have one of the best vaccination rates for children in Africa; now, although the vaccinations themselves can continue, because of the sanctions it is not possible to have refrigerators in which to keep the vaccines. We need to consider the practical ramifications of sanctions, and the way in which they are damaging children in Burundi. Many young adults who were children when the crisis began have fought in the continuing conflict. They desperately need this country, and other countries with power, to take account of children's problems.

I thank the Department for giving a lead and galvanising the international community. The good will that Britain has built up is, as I have said, desperately needed. I thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for all her efforts, but more practical efforts are needed to help those like Elaine and her two children, who currently remain in Bujumbura gaol with not a hope in hell of escaping poverty—even if they escape the gaol itself.

The Secretary of State for International Development (Clare Short): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Dawson) for raising this important issue, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow (Ms King) for what she said.

It is appropriate that we should discuss such an issue within a few days of our commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the universal declaration of human rights. We should pause to think about how far we must go before we have honoured the commitment that we made when we signed that universal declaration—to secure, through our efforts, all human rights for all. That includes rights to education and a decent livelihood. In fact, we have a long way to go. I hope that the next 50 years will see a real commitment to the delivery of all human rights for all, and that we will do rather better than we have in the past.

It is clear from what both my hon. Friends said that they were deeply moved by the plight of the children whom they met when they visited Burundi. My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre was particularly moved by his meeting with Jean Jacques Rousseau. My hon. Friends graphically described the suffering and bravery of the children; it is terrible that so many lives are being destroyed and traumatised by the conflict. But—as my hon. Friends know, and as the House knows—many more children are in the same position. The delegation could have visited 50 countries that were either engaged in or emerging from armed conflicts, and seen children suffering in the same way.

The sad truth is that an important change has taken place in the world which has not been fully appreciated by those who discuss defence matters. In the post-cold war world—apart from the tragedy of the Balkans—war is overwhelmingly a feature of the poorest countries, and is breaking out within countries rather than between them. The bulk of the victims are women and children, and massive refugee movements are resulting. There are more refugees in the world than ever before. The vulnerable people whom my hon. Friends met in Burundi—particularly women and children—are, in the post-cold war world, the principal victims of war.

The figures are terrible. It is estimated that 2 million children have been killed in armed conflicts since 1987, and that three times that number have been seriously injured or permanently disabled. As many as 200,000 children currently serve as child soldiers in wars around the world. More than half the world's 50 million refugees and internally displaced people are children. Millions of children have lost their parents, their education and their childhood to war; millions have been psychologically damaged and socially scarred.

We believe—and international conventions entrench the principle—that children should have no role in warfare, and should not be its victims. These basic norms must be accepted by all countries, and we must all do better to secure the commitments to which we are signed up in theory in the international system, but are not so good at delivering.

To that end, in June—during our presidency of the European Union—we hosted a symposium on children affected by armed conflict, to generate high-level support for the rights, protection and welfare of such children and to identify concrete steps that Governments could take to help Mr. Olara Otunnu, the United Nations Secretary-General's special representative for children in armed conflict, to translate Graca Machel's report for the UN on this issue into an agenda for action so that we get better at protecting children from the effects of warfare and restore to them the normal life of children.

My Department has been working on that since the symposium, and UNICEF—the United Nations Children's Fund, which hosted the visit of my hon. Friends to Burundi—obviously has a key role to play. Both my hon. Friends saw its work during their visit. We have helped to fund work there and elsewhere in the great lakes region, but we also want to support the organisation strategically, to strengthen its capacity at central, regional and field level to speak out on behalf of children in conflict and to implement better-targeted programmes for protecting children and mitigating their involvement in conflict.

These issues have been at the heart of discussions that my officials have had recently with UNICEF about how we can work together to strengthen that work in the organisation worldwide. I met Carol Bellamy last week in London, and she said how much she values that work.

As my hon. Friends have said, the plight of Burundi's children is particularly shocking. UNICEF estimates that about 400,000 live in acute distress; they are often homeless and without access to basic health services or education. More than 20,000 children have no one to care for them, and, in respect of Africa's traditions of the extended family, that is a signal of how many people have lost their lives.

The situation of children in Burundi is deeply influenced by the on-going civil war. Above all, Burundi's children need peace. Without peace and greater security, they will not be able to rebuild their lives, go to school and have something of a normal childhood. That is essential, if they are not to live out their lives raising another generation that is bound up in the ethnic hatred, genocide and warfare that have scarred that region of the world since independence, if it can be called that.

We hope that some progress is in sight, and we have been working for that. As my hon. Friends know, former President Nyerere of Tanzania and the regional leaders have been working hard to promote political dialogue in Burundi. The Arusha peace talks, which are scheduled to end in mid-1999, are committed to addressing peace, democracy and governance issues.

Conflict prevention and resolution was a theme of the EU Development Council, which I attended on Monday. On Sunday evening, Mwalimu Nyerere joined the EU Development Ministers for dinner. He told us that work is continuing in preparation for Arusha IV, which will take place in January. More so than in the past, he is positive about progress at Arusha. We talked about economic sanctions—one of the issues that both my hon. Friends raised—which, as they know, the regional leaders imposed on Burundi in July 1996. As they also know, we are trying, across the world, to strengthen regional capacity to bring peace, because it is obviously impossible for any set of countries to do that worldwide.

There is no doubt that the sanctions have produced genuine hardship for the poor, including children. Despite efforts to exempt humanitarian aid items, Burundi's health and education systems have been badly disrupted. Mwalimu Nyerere firmly believes that sanctions have encouraged President Buyoya to approach the Arusha talks seriously and he told us—this is the good news—that he is ready to recommend to regional leaders the suspension of sanctions.

At last, we can look forward to the suspension of sanctions. They might be restored if things deteriorate, but if things improve, they will be gone. That is the proposal.

Mr. Dawson: Is there any time scale for the proposal to suspend sanctions?

Clare Short: As I understand it, the Arusha talks are due to begin in January and will be completed by the end of the year. I understand from former President Nyerere that he is willing to make such a recommendation, I think in the early part of the talks. The time scale will be fairly brief, provided that all goes well and the Government of Burundi come to Arusha, which we have every reason to expect. At last and thank heavens, we are looking at imminent progress.

Movement on sanctions will enable Burundi to begin to discuss the resumption of development support from the international community. There has been lots of support, and we played a part, but the tragedy is that, although emergency humanitarian assistance is absolutely essential in war, it simply props people up as the war goes on, their livelihoods are destroyed and their families killed. Whenever we can, we want to get to development assistance and beyond emergency humanitarian assistance.

At a meeting in Ottawa in August hosted by the Canadians, donors discussed the possibility of implementing an expanded programme of humanitarian assistance for Burundi, but that would limit assistance—this is all part of the regional leadership's efforts to achieve peace through the talks—to support for non-governmental organisations and UN agencies. We believe that that is a welcome step forward, but it is a second-best option. The Government of Burundi need support to help them to develop economic and social frameworks which can start a process of equitable economic and social development.

To prepare for that, we have encouraged the World bank to help to draw up a transitional strategy, and we are keen to get behind that. Since 1993, Britain has provided more than £38 million of humanitarian assistance in Burundi, but we are keen to move to the next stage—reconstruction, peace and getting the country moving. Historically, we are not a big donor or contributor to Burundi, and it is impossible for us as one country to work effectively everywhere. We are trying to get an international system that can work effectively everywhere.

We are willing to play our part in the reconstruction effort, but we will put particular emphasis on working with the multilateral agencies—the World bank and the EU—and the UN agencies to get a reconstruction programme that is as effective as possible so that those children, and Jean Jacques Rousseau, can look forward to a return to childhood and an education, and to growing up and having their own children without ethnic hatred and war savaging their futures.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Bow said, the situation in the great lakes is particularly tragic. We in Europe, scarred as we were at the end of the second world war by the experience of genocide, have seen it replayed in the great lakes and, to the shame of the world, failed to intervene to prevent another genocide. We have special historical responsibilities to try to secure an improvement of life for the children and people of the great lakes. We are doing all that we can to try to make sure that things improve, and the report from former President Nyerere in Brussels on Sunday night suggested that, at last, we can look forward to considerable progress.

Audiology Services

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park): Many people in the House may know that I am totally deaf in one ear. I make no secret of that; I have always found it quite useful to be able to turn a deaf ear to three teenage children and their music at 2 o'clock in the morning; to aircraft noise, which plagues my constituency; and—dare I say it?—to the House of Commons, on occasion.

I also share a few of the problems faced by people who are deaf in both ears, and they are getting worse. Three out of 10 people aged over 55 have this problem. Ten years ago, the Medical Research Council institute of hearing research revealed that there are 8.7 million deaf and hard of hearing people in the United Kingdom. Given our aging population, that figure is probably much higher now. The MRC reckoned that 5 million of those deaf people would benefit from a hearing aid, yet two thirds of them have never tried one.

Every Member of Parliament represents an average of 4,500 constituents who are missing out because they cannot hear very well. They are missing out on enjoying and making the most of life. Hearing problems can affect work, family and social life. They reduce confidence and create stress. People may struggle on with their lives, but they become increasingly isolated.

In a recent report, the Royal National Institute for Deaf People gave several examples, one of whom was a 58-year-old man, Maurice Strong, who lives in my borough. Before he had a hearing aid, he went out of his way to avoid conversations, but now he will talk to any one. He highlighted how hearing loss affected his marriage. When chatting with his wife, he found it increasingly hard to hear what she was saying. We all have that problem. He said:

"I was forever getting the wrong end of the stick which she thought was deliberate."

Sometimes it may be, but in his case it was not.

"I'd accuse her of mumbling and we'd end up arguing."

That would ruin their weekend. He also faced stress in the workplace. As a security operator, he was worried that he would not hear sounds. He said:

"I got so tired trying to compensate for my hearing problems. I'd come home in the evening, have my dinner and just fall asleep."

That is also a common problem, whether people are deaf or not, but the deaf suffer more stress during the day than the rest of us.

There is no need for these problems to occur. The RNID is having a publicity campaign to highlight the seriousness of deafness. For a start, we must take hearing tests as seriously as eye tests. A MORI poll carried out for the RNID revealed that only 22 per cent. of people over 55 have had a hearing test in the past 10 years, whereas 87 per cent. have had their eyes tested. That is in spite of the fact that almost half the over-55s have a hearing loss. Like sight defects, hearing problems often herald a more serious disease.

People do not get their hearing tested as a matter of course as they get older, as they do their eyes. We must overcome that fundamental problem. Wearing a hearing aid should be as acceptable as wearing glasses. Perhaps we should also stop making fun of people who are deaf. It is easy to do that: it is the Cinderella of afflictions. People with many other afflictions receive sympathy, but the deaf are laughed at, so we must try to change public attitudes.

If change is to occur, it must start with what is said—or often not said—in general practitioner surgeries. A significant number of people who consult their GP about a hearing problem are not referred for a hearing assessment. When I was a GP, I may not have heard what my patients said, and should perhaps have been referred at the same time. If people are not referred for a hearing assessment, they do not get a hearing aid. GPs play a crucial role in finding the one in five adult patients who are hard of hearing.

In the past year, the RNID has taken steps actively to support and inform GPs in carrying out this task. In June, it mailed 39,000 GPs in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland to give them warning of the possible increase in the number of patients requesting a hearing test. GPs were sent leaflets explaining the campaign to get them to ask all patients over 60 whether they are experiencing problems with their hearing. The aim is to persuade GPs to introduce the topic, and to refer patients for hearing assessments sooner rather than later. That is plain common sense, because the sooner people get a hearing aid, the more likely they are to get the best out of it.

GPs were also given a guide—a scratch pad—so that they would know what questions to ask if they were unclear. So far, more than 2,000 GPs have requested further information. That shows the widespread support for the campaign among GPs, and the lack of advice and information that they have so far been given by the national health service.

There is a limit to what the RNID can do. Indeed, the charity has already achieved more than the Department of Health. The Department must ensure that changes occur in audiological services. At present, the quality of service in an area is too dependent on the resources and priority that a local NHS trust gives to audiology. Waiting times, staffing levels, the range of aids available and the standard and quality of follow-up and rehabilitation are too variable and inconsistent. As in other areas of the NHS, it is diagnosis and treatment by postcode.

The time a patient has to wait for a hearing test varies. In some places there are hardly any waiting lists, whereas in others people may wait months. In London, people wait 15 weeks on average for a hearing test at the Central Middlesex hospital, but only 14 days at the Edgware and Hillingdon hospitals and the West Middlesex university hospital. Across the United Kingdom, the minimum wait for a hearing test is three days, and the maximum wait is a staggering 78 weeks.

It must be stressed that obtaining a hearing test is only the first hurdle that people must overcome. People are frequently embarrassed about their hearing loss, and more often than not they deny that there is a problem. The last thing they need is a lengthy wait to obtain a hearing test. There are too many psychological barriers to obtaining a test, without the NHS creating even more.

We construct barriers—in some cases, at every stage of the process of obtaining a hearing aid. Even after the long wait, many patients face a further long wait to obtain the appliance. In some places, the waiting time for a hearing aid is only a month or so; in others, the wait may be almost a year. In London, waiting times vary from a same-day service at the Royal London hospital—why it can achieve that and no other hospital can, I do not know—to a 364-day wait in other hospitals. A further difficulty may face patients. Following a hearing test, they may be offered only one hearing aid when they need two. Hearing aids are rationed.

The level of undetected hearing loss is immense, and in many areas there are serious problems with NHS audiology services. In considering those two basic facts, surely we cannot escape the conclusion that some initiative is required from the Government. I would welcome an announcement from the Minister that the NHS will rise to the challenge of working hard to reduce the number of people who are not benefiting from hearing aids. That figure is 3 million, and nothing helps concentrate the mind more than the setting of a target. I agree with the RNID that we should aim to reduce the figure to 2 million in the next five years. That is a modest target. What is the Minister's view? Will he consider a target being set by his Department?

It is reasonable that, once people have been referred by their GP, they should not have to wait more than a month for a hearing test or more than two months for their NHS hearing aid. A further target which should be considered by the NHS is the provision of a greater range of hearing aids. Digital technology is developing rapidly, but digital aids are rarely available on the NHS. In other areas of medicine and surgery, modern technology has almost taken over from the surgeons and physicians. How long will it be before national health service patients benefit from the new technology of digital hearing aids?

I look to the Minister to recognise publicly the serious problem that is faced by people who are deaf. It is no exaggeration to say that deafness can wreck marriages, stall careers and make people socially isolated. It needs to be remembered that, although the problems that are caused by unrecognised deafness can be immense, the average cost of fitting the present NHS hearing aid is only £90. Few NHS treatments come as cheap as that.

I understand that there are ever-increasing demands on the NHS—indeed, that is why my party consistently asks for a debate on national priorities in the NHS—but quality rather than the length of someone's life is the most important factor; quality of life is what we should look at. Increasing deafness destroys quality of life. I beg the Minister to improve our services for those.

1.11 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Hutton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) on securing time for this important debate and on her constructive and thoughtful comments. She is right to point out that hearing impairment is the second most common disability, next to mobility problems, in the United Kingdom, and that it is estimated that there are 8.7 million deaf or hard-of-hearing people in the UK. That means one person in seven has a hearing impairment. As she was right to stress, hearing impairment is not a feature just of old age. In the UK, 1,000 children are newly diagnosed annually as having a permanent hearing impairment.

Audiology services are, in some ways, a unique part of the NHS—they span all ages from children to older people; they support patients through diagnostic tests, rehabilitative care, and treatment through equipment, rather than medication; and staff often maintain links with patients throughout their lives. Audiology services provide a continuing health care service.

Like all services, audiology services should not stand still. Having recently started some work on hearing aid services, we are aware that some aspects of audiology services are not managed as well as they should be. To explore that, we established a working group to take a closer look at hearing aid services. The group's initial findings show that we need to take a broader look at audiology services, particularly their role in the community and the part that they play in a modernised NHS.

Our commitment to the new NHS includes fair access to consistently high-quality, prompt and accessible services throughout the country. That applies to audiology services in exactly the same way it does to other NHS services, but it is important that the NHS does not do that in isolation from other services. Partnership is the key to developments where services, such as those for hearing-impaired people, are provided by health departments, social services and, for children, education departments.

As the hon. Member for Richmond Park will be aware, the Government are committed to developing a new agenda, encouraging closer co-operation between social services and the NHS. It is one way in which we will be able to develop a much more effective service for patients and service users.

On social care provision, in September 1997, the social services inspectorate published a report entitled "A Service On The Edge". I do not know whether the hon. Lady has read the report, but its findings were not encouraging. The needs of deaf and hard-of-hearing people were often not properly assessed, consultation with users was spasmodic, and senior managers and councillors sometimes gave insufficient emphasis to that aspect of services. In some areas, the links between audiology units in hospitals and social services were not well developed.

Although that picture was depressing, the Department of Health was also made aware that there were examples of good practice in some parts of the country. As a follow-up to the inspector's report, the Department has decided to produce material to help social services departments and others to improve their services to that user group.

It is vital that NHS audiology services do not work in isolation from other parts of the community. To underline our commitment to partnerships between health and social services, in September we issued a joint publication, entitled "National Priorities Guidance", to both health and social services authorities. Links between audiology departments and social services departments, such as "one-stop shops", and making patients aware of the benefits of environmental aids such as loop systems can help to make such partnerships work to the benefit of patients.

In the NHS, patients are likely to encounter staff in audiology services who have a broad range of audiological skills. There are audiological physicians who diagnose, investigate and treat patients; audiological scientists who investigate and diagnose hearing impairment; hearing therapists who assess and provide rehabilitative needs; and audiology technicians who assess, fit and advise on hearing aids. A wide variety of expertise contributes to a quality service.

[Mr. John Hutton]

I know, too, that the audiology professions are working together to look at different ways in which to develop common career pathways. That is important because it will help to enhance opportunities for education and development for audiologists, and career development for those wanting to pursue a career in audiology.

The hon. Lady referred to the RNID's awareness campaign. She may also be aware that, in June, the Secretary of State for Health helped to launch the RNID's campaign to encourage people to seek the advice of their GP as soon as they become aware of problems with their hearing.

To help with that campaign, the RNID, as the hon. Lady said, wrote to nearly 40,000 GPs about hearing loss, and it followed that up in the autumn with a campaign to persuade people who were experiencing hearing loss to speak to their GP. I was pleased that the campaign was supported in some parts of the country by local audiology services.

I have already mentioned one way in which audiology services differ from others in the NHS—patients' needs are met through fitting a hearing aid, rather than medication. Nor do people need hearing aids for a short period. More often than not, once a hearing aid has been fitted, people will need it for the rest of their lives.

NHS Supplies provides 550,000-plus hearing aids per annum for use in the NHS, at a cost of approximately £16 million. There are more than 20 products within that range; they cover a wide range of hearing impairment, from mild to profound loss. They cater for the paediatric market, too.

The hon. Lady referred to the advances of technology. She is right to say that, recently, there have been great strides in developing hearing aids in both the NHS and the independent sector. In particular, digital hearing aids are available from the commercial sector. There are requests—she made the request again today—for those to be available from the NHS, too.

As with other forms of digital technology, we need to evaluate those new technological advances, in terms of both cost and clinical effectiveness, for the many people who need hearing aids from the NHS. At present, those aids are very expensive.

Evaluation and examination of the specifications of the aids, and determination of the practical problems as well as trials are required to find out what software and hardware developments are still required for those new aids to hold any advantage over existing advanced programmable analogue aids for a large number of users. Obviously, certain individuals have found them useful, but we are talking about widespread benefit and a wide range of impairments.

The NHS does not just supply hearing aids; it also offers support to deaf and hard-of-hearing people by providing rehabilitation services—an important part of the overall treatment—hearing therapy to support them in using their hearing aids and treatment for any associated problems.

Through advances in hearing aid technology, the NHS has helped to initiate a much broader approach to hearing solutions. For some time, NHS hearing aids have had an adaptation that enables deaf people to use loop systems. Other developments are in train that will help to enhance services for children, adults of working age and older people. The results of those initiatives will help to pave the way for modern audiology services.

Children's services provide an important component of audiology services because children grow and their needs may change quickly—they will often return to have their hearing reassessed and hearing aids modified. Also, temporary hearing loss due to glue ear is the most prevalent audiological condition in children, requiring treatment that can be in the form of myringotomy, with or without grommets, and hearing aids. The Medical Research Council is conducting a trial of alternative regimes in glue ear treatment, which is expected to finish towards the end of 2000.

For many years, children have routinely been screened for hearing problems by health visitors, at around seven to eight months, using a distraction test, as the hon. Lady knows. In 1997, a review commissioned by the health technology assessment programme of the role of neonatal hearing screening suggested that the national screening committee should consider whether there should be a national screening programme for congenital hearing impairment. The review suggested considering a system of universal neonatal screening, followed at seven months by targeted screening using an infant distraction test. Through its sub-committee on child health screening, the committee is considering those suggestions for implementation across the NHS.

Any proposed changes to screening arrangements must be considered carefully to find whether they are feasible, and clinically and cost effective. The impact of any changes on children with hearing impairment, and on associated professional groups such as health visitors, also needs to be carefully assessed. We do not expect the committee to make rushed decisions on those important issues.

The health technology assessment reinforced the point, with which we whole-heartedly agree, that treatment should be initiated early and provided within a seamless service from health and education services. Links between health and education are crucial. We have consistently emphasised the importance of partnership working across services. For children, it is important that speech and language therapy, as well as audiological care, are provided, and that we do not overlook the important links with their education and longer-term needs.

On services for adults, we have recently funded another health technology assessment review covering the acceptability, benefit and costs of early screening for hearing disability. The Medical Research Council institute of hearing research will examine the role of early screening for people aged between 55 and 74 to find a cost-effective screening method for the ability to benefit from early hearing aid fitting. Many adults' hearing starts to deteriorate as they get older, and the project aims to consider the benefits of earlier interventions for people with hearing problems.

Hearing loss for older people is often regarded as a normal part of aging, so older people may not be getting the services that they need. Such loss is often accompanied by sight problems. Promoting independence is one of our key priorities in the "National Priorities Guidance". This priority stresses that the partnership of timely health and social services in the community can make a crucial difference to the ability of older people to maintain or achieve independence and a healthy life style. In addition, we announced last month that the next national service framework would be on services for older people. We are still considering the arrangements for taking forward work on that framework, but I would be surprised if it did not include hearing impairment for older people.

Although hearing loss is common in older people, it should not prevent them from seeking advice from their general practitioners. In 1994, my Department issued guidance, again based on research evidence, to the effect that there were clear benefits when GPs refer patients directly to audiology services, rather than first to an ear, nose and throat consultant.

More generally on disability, the Government set up the disability rights task force in December 1997 to consider how best to secure comprehensive, enforceable civil rights for disabled people within the context of our wider society, and to make recommendations on the role and functions of a disability rights commission. We announced in the Queen's Speech that we will legislate to create such a commission.

There is another important role for audiology departments in helping to raise awareness of hearing impairment. Earlier this year, the Government announced the timetable for implementing the provisions of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. From October 1999, service providers will have to take reasonable steps to change practices, policies or procedures that make it impossible or unreasonably difficult for disabled people to use a service. They will need to provide auxiliary aids or services that would enable disabled people to use a service and overcome physical barriers by providing a service by a reasonable alternative method. From 2004, service providers will have to take reasonable steps to remove, alter or provide reasonable means of avoiding physical features that make it impossible or unreasonably difficult for disabled people to use a service.

We wrote to the NHS earlier this year about section 21 of the Disability Discrimination Act and announced that we would develop an action programme to support its implementation across the NHS. Without prejudging the results of the work, it is becoming apparent that one of the key responses for service providers must be to raise staff awareness of disability. However, the NHS will have some important resources to help it tackle that challenging agenda. By that I mean the expertise that staff in NHS trusts have developed over many years. Staff in audiology departments are a perfect example of my point—throughout the day, they are already helping people who are deaf or hard of hearing, and they can help to raise awareness of hearing impairment among other staff in their hospitals and in the wider health community.

As part of the need to raise awareness of hearing impairment issues, the NHS executive recently commissioned a video from a group of deaf film makers to highlight problems encountered by deaf people using hospital and GP services. The video will draw on the personal experiences of a number of deaf people, and will include their reactions to people speaking about them or shouting at them, and the difficulties that some health service practitioners have in understanding them. We expect that it will be used as a training aid for NHS staff who may encounter patients who are deaf or hard of hearing, or colleagues who may be doubly disabled in their day-to-day work.

The NHS executive has also been developing a good practice guide entitled "Doubly Disabled: equality for disabled people in the new NHS". It is aimed primarily at NHS managers and will consider disability in the NHS and the steps that managers might take to provide a more equitable service for disabled people. Voluntary organisations have contributed to the guide, which has already been shared with a wide range of people from all walks of life.

I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving us an opportunity to discuss these important issues. I assure her that we are absolutely committed to ensuring that people who need audiology services from the NHS get a first-class service. Nothing else will do.

Territorial Army (Chorley)

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): I would sooner not have had to have this debate, but unfortunately the strategic defence review meant that a debate on the Territorial Army centre at Chorley was necessary.

The centre was established in 1895 and is occupied by the headquarters of 101 Battalion, the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers. More important, if anything is more important, there are also the cadets, about whom I feel strongly. Both have a strong case to remain. On 17 November, my right hon. Friend George Robertson announced that the battalion headquarters would move to north Wales. Study of the map showed that it would move to Queensferry.

I was disappointed because that decision was unnecessary, unjustified and certainly not thought out. Two reviews in the past few months had said that Chorley TA centre should remain. It was in the right position and was the ideal location for 101 Battalion REME's HQ. What has changed? I can think of nothing. The M6 is still in the same place and the HQ is in the good repair that it always has been. All the people are still there. Suddenly, at the last minute, things changed.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): I can help the hon. Gentleman, who almost certainly is not aware of the evidence taken by the Defence Committee this morning from Colonel Mike Taylor, chairman of the north-west Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association. He told us that he and his colleagues did not understand the decision on Chorley, except as a deliberate political move to shift a perfectly fine TA centre from Chorley across a boundary into Wales for the sake of the footprint.

Mr. Hoyle: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that welcome information, of which I was unaware. It certainly concurs with my thinking on the matter and answers some of my questions. I am sure that the Minister will want to deal with that information in his reply. I could not work out the reasons for the decision; the evidence given today has revealed that it was reached for political ones. I am very worried about that, and hope that a correct decision will be made.

Everyone in Chorley was shocked by the decision to transfer the TA centre, which supports our community at sporting, charitable and ceremonial events. Those at the centre have always been there, on hand as a part of Chorley—that role represents an important aspect of the centre, and it is why I have asked for the debate.

The centre is such a key player in the local community that it gives every young person the opportunity to participate in disciplines and events out of school and to plan for the future. The cadet centre attracts young people and provides them with a golden opportunity. If we take away that opportunity, there may not be another one. I hope that the Minister will deal with our concerns. Regardless of how we study the Ministry's plan, it will result in the closure of the centre. Not only will the battalion headquarters go, but a fundamental part of society in Chorley—the cadet force—will go.

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble): Is my hon. Friend aware that I held a public consultation on the defence review in my constituency, at the Royal British Legion Lostock hall, which was attended by many TA and cadet group representatives? A common theme was the concern that, after any changes in the TA configuration, the position of cadet forces should be maintained. There was, and is, very real concern in Lancashire that changes to the TA could cause serious damage to the area's cadet forces. I seek reassurance from my hon. Friend the Minister—as does, I am sure, my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle)—that cadet forces, and certainly those in Chorley, will be maintained.

Mr. Hoyle: I know that my hon. Friend had a most successful meeting which was attended by many people. Although people were happy to attend a meeting to have a public discussion, they discovered that Chorley's cadet force, which they thought was safe, and its headquarters, which they believed would not be moved, would unfortunately not be the subject of good news from George Robertson—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but that was the second occasion on which he referred to the right hon. Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Robertson) by his surname. He should refer to him by his constituency.

Mr. Hoyle: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Our concern is so great that 50 hon. Members from the north-west have sent a letter to the Minister—which he should have received, as it was put on the Letter Board last night—to support the retention of Chorley's centre. We have the backing of parish councils. Last night, Chorley borough council discussed the issue and Lancashire county council, which is concerned about the issue, will also debate it soon. There is a wave of support across the north-west for maintaining the TA centre. We should not lose what we have or play around with it simply to appease north Wales. I am worried about that danger.

It is difficult to justify the Ministry's decision. I have tried to imagine every possible reason for it but have been unable to find one. The decision was not taken for financial or logistical reasons. It does not add up, so what is the reason for it?

The new south Lancashire catchment area, which covers three constituencies, is home to much engineering and 300,000 people. We will not, however, have one TA centre or cadet centre. That news is unacceptable and is not good. The north-west is an important area and the region's population is bigger than that of north Wales, which already has five TA centres. Why on earth are we making the change? It does not make sense.

When I was mayor, I went along to the 101 Battalion REME headquarters, with which I have always had good links, where I was told that the TA has always had problems in recruiting officers for its establishments in north Wales. Now, we are told that the battalion headquarters will be moved to north Wales—but from where will the people come to man it? What will be the cost? It does not add up.

The Chorley centre has eight full-time civil servants. They will not be transferred to Queensferry because it is simply not possible to do so—they will go on to the unemployment register. Eight people's jobs will be thrown away at a whim, but it will cost us—not only in redundancy money but in recruitment in north Wales. The decision does not add up.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Although I do not want to comment specifically on Chorley, there is a wider point to consider—whether the defence review took into consideration an area's recruitment potential. Such considerations certainly seem to have been ignored in my constituency, which is the best recruiting area in Gloucestershire. Would my hon. Friend care to comment on that?

Mr. Hoyle: I do not think that the matter has been considered. I can honestly say that the decision on Chorley was taken so late that nothing could have been properly considered. I am not as familiar with the situation in Stroud, but I presume that the same questions may be asked about the decisions that affect it. I hope that the Minister will also consider the circumstances there. Why change a fine recruitment area, staffed by local people, unless there are genuine reasons for doing so?

The decision on Chorley's centre was not taken because we do not need that centre—it would be different if that were the reason for that decision. Someone has, however, decided to move it to north Wales. Let us not lose sight of that fact. The civil servants at our centre are not the same as the people who go out on the TA weekends, or the Regulars who might expect to be moved. They are people with real jobs and livelihoods who will suddenly lose them.

What will happen when the centre is moved to Queensferry? Last weekend, I decided to take a little trip to north Wales, and just happened to go past the TA centre. Has someone examined and measured the facilities at Chorley and at Queensferry to see what will fit? Nothing will fit at Queensferry as well as it has done at Chorley. North Wales will also be home to two other units and an Army cadet force detachment, all of which will have to be based in one building which was built to house one infantry company. It does not seem possible to make that work.

Unless the building in north Wales is the Tardis—it did not seem to be when I saw it—or we spend money to extend it, where will the headquarters go once we discover that the building is too small to house it? It could go back to Chorley. That would make sense, although it would have been more sensible for it simply to remain there. We could consider Wrexham, but the argument for moving to Queensferry has therefore been weakened.

I should think that by now we have enough evidence to say that the move should not be made, and that the decision should be reviewed by Land Command, which made it. I have been assured that the decision was made by Land Command and not by the Minister, and that it was not reached in the final throes of the review. I am worried, however, that that was when the decision was made; that the centre will not fit in north Wales and that it will cost a great deal to relocate it again.

We must consider also other factors. The Chorley centre houses the computer bank, wiring and transport facilities, all of which will have to be moved. Why are we making the move? There will be no gain in it; it will only cost more money. I thought that the idea of the strategic defence review was to make savings and increase efficiency. We cannot become more efficient in north Wales.

The problem with the 101 Battalion REME is that it covers the area between Coventry and Scotland. We should realise that there is no better place for its centre than in the centre of the country. The midpoint between Coventry and Scotland is Chorley, just up the M6.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): The hon. Gentleman is making a compelling case. However, the facts that he describes have been a feature of the cuts and reorganisation in the TA. Last night, the Defence Committee visited 10 Para, which is now to be combined with 4 Para. That will create a unit which will stretch from Scotland to London. How can it possibly be managed as a single unit?

Mr. Hoyle: I do not know whether it is manageable, but if that is the stretch of the Paras, surely they should consider Chorley. We have a spare barracks and headquarters for them. I can think of no more compelling case that I have heard today. It would make sense to look for a central location that was good for logistics. In all fairness to north Wales, that is not the case in Queensferry.

The barracks at Chorley has been well maintained. It is a good facility that we should not lose. It was a gift from the people of Chorley by public subscription. What right have the Government to sell it? People are careful about what they buy. It is a listed building, so it does not lend itself to many other uses anyway. The land is also tied up with Chorley borough council. There is a lease on it, which muddies the waters even further.

The facility has been valued at just over £200,000. We have to find accommodation for a cadet force, because the Minister has said that they will not travel more than five miles from where they are. That means that we have to buy a brown-field site and put a building on it. After moving everything in and ensuring that it is up and running, the cost will be near to £100,000. If the existing building is sold, we shall not get much more than £200,000. It would make more sense to leave the cadet force in the TA centre, but the centre is too big, so we need something else there as well.

What is the cost of moving the 101 Battalion REME to Queensferry? Nobody has given me the figures. What will the redundancy costs be? It all stacks up to suggest that the move is not sensible. There is not a single genuine reason for it.

I have studied the map. If the battalion ends up in north Wales, and given that it will not fit at Queensferry, the only place that it can go is Wrexham. That is a bit further away and off the main routes. That would be a mistake. I do not know how my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) would feel about that. He hopes that Wrexham might end up with a Welsh battalion or one coming back from Germany full time. If Wrexham is used—that is the only logical conclusion that I can come up with—101 Battalion REME will be thrown out again and will be looking for a new home. That is not acceptable.

Why are we moving the battalion? The issues have not been thought through. There is a danger that it is nothing more than a political decision. I do not want to think that politics have overtaken common sense on this. I like to think that Land Command had to come up with a quick fix without thinking it through, costing it or realising what it was doing. I hope that we have enough evidence for the issue to be send back to Land Command for a rethink.

[Mr. Hoyle]

If we have to appease north Wales, there are alternatives. It could be represented by moving a battalion headquarters from south Wales, where there are four or five. Would it not make more sense to transfer a battalion whose history is already in Wales? Some regiments in south Wales have 50 per cent. of their sub-units in the midlands—two thirds in one case. The 157 Transport Regiment has one detachment at Stoke-on-Trent, which is closer to Queensferry than to Cardiff, where the headquarters is currently located. I am sure that that would make more sense to the people of Wales. Common sense is what we are here for.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will not just give the usual sympathy. We have had a good, open discussion. I hope that the issue will be taken on board and given more serious consideration than has been the case so far. The decision was made at the last minute. The two earlier reviews conducted three months ago pointed to Chorley. Chorley is in the right place. Everything cannot be changed in the last throes of the review. All the reasons why Chorley was right did not disappear overnight. There have to be other reasons behind the decision.

I sympathise with Wales. I do not want to say "Wales should not have this and should not have the other." However, what we do should make sense. Overall, Parliament supported the strategic defence review. The armed forces backed it because a lot of it made sense, although there were parts with which some of us disagreed. The decline came when the strategic defence review reached the Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association. That is when everybody became emotional. My hon. Friend the Minister has said that we must take a realistic view, based on common sense. I accept that what is left must have a use.

If the Chorley centre was to close because there was no need for it, because it was outdated or because it was not relevant, I would not be standing here today. However, that is not the issue. The battalion headquarters is to be moved from Chorley to north Wales purely for appeasement. That is not how we should do business. That is not the way forward.

I hope that the Minister will take on board what I have said and look at the genuine problems that have been created. He should think about those who will lose their jobs. It is not long since we suffered under a defence review by losing jobs at Royal Ordnance. There was a genuine reason for that, but in this case there is no need for redundancies. The jobs can remain at Chorley. It would even save money. I ask the Minister to send the issue back to Land Command to be reconsidered. The cadet force must remain in the Chorley centre. I hope that the 101 Battalion REME will also remain in its rightful home at Chorley, which is in the centre of its operating area, not out on a limb. It should not have to report to south Wales from north Wales. It should continue to report from Chorley to Preston. I implore my hon. Friend to take on board what I have said.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) on securing this debate on the future location of the headquarters of 101 Battalion of the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers. We have had interventions from my hon. Friends the Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow) and from the hon. Members for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) and for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier). My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley clearly feels strongly on the issue, as his remarks today and after the statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 17 November show.

I fully understand my hon. Friend's concern that his constituency has lost the opportunity that the presence of the headquarters of 101 Battalion REME affords to those who want to volunteer their services to the Territorial Army. However, the issue must be viewed against the wider background of the restructuring of the Territorial Army and the Government's aims in their review.

It may be helpful if I briefly remind hon. Members of the background to the review and the extensive consultation exercise that was conducted before my right hon. Friend announced the results on 17 November.

Mr. Brazier: If that was the case, why, as late as 26 September, did almost all the senior serving officers in the Territorial Army meet and pass a message up the chain of command that they felt that they still had not been consulted?

Mr. Spellar: The hon. Gentleman does himself and the Territorial Army no good by fighting old battles. He no longer represents the view of the Territorial Army. Since the announcement of 17 November, I have had several discussions with those involved: some are pleased and some are disappointed. The outcome has been described as better than they had feared and worse than they had hoped for. There is a feeling that the TA must get on and implement the decisions that have been made and look to the future to create a more operationally valid and useable force. The hon. Gentleman is fighting an old battle in which he is not carrying the majority of the TA or its senior members.

Mr. Brazier rose—

Mr. Spellar: I am mindful of the fact that I do not have much time to cover all the issues and that it is unusual to accept interventions during a half-hour Adjournment debate, so I want to press on.

It has been our intention to give effect not only to a reduction in the TA but to a substantial restructuring to reflect the changes that have taken place in the international environment. We have achieved that on the basis of a thorough analysis of the operational requirement for each arm and service as part of a modern, deployable Army, taking into account the scale of a likely deployment and the readiness of forces that would be required for it.

Those calculations led us to believe in the summer that a TA of about 40,000 was required. The House will know that, in our subsequent work and consultation, we refined that figure to 41,200. As part of that work, we defined the organisation of the arms and services that can best deliver the results that we want and need.

In the case of the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers, the decision was to retain four of the five battalions. Those judgments have been essentially military. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley knows, the bulk of the work to devise the new structure within the parameters set out in the strategic defence review has been undertaken by the Commander-in-Chief Land Command and his planning staff.

The method that they have chosen to adopt for the review—it has the whole-hearted approval of Ministers—has been to consult widely on an initial set of proposals which was issued for that purpose in July, shortly after the announcement of the outcome of the strategic defence review. The purpose of the consultation was to bring together the professional judgment of three sets of people with differing responsibilities for the Territorial Army.

The first set was the directors of arms and services. All arms and services have such directors, and the fact that they have serving members of the TA on their staff has enabled them to give advice on the best organisation and structure for the reformed TA in their particular arm.

The second set of people who were consulted were the divisional and brigade commanders who command both the Territorials and Regulars in their respective areas. In the case of 101 Battalion REME, divisional command is provided by headquarters, 5th Division, in Shrewsbury. Two brigade headquarters are involved: 160 Brigade based in Brecon in Wales and 42 Brigade in Preston. I re-emphasise the fact that both headquarters have TA staff and so can make both chain-of-command and local decisions about the arrangements that will best suit the Army's purposes.

The third set of people whom the Commander-in-Chief Land Command consulted was the Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association, whose role in these matters is, I think, well understood by hon. Members.

I outline the consultative arrangements in some detail to illustrate the fact that, even within the military staffing process, the consultation exercise has sought to bring together a number of different aspects: the interests of the individual arm or service; the interests of the chain of command, which brings together a range of different arms; and important local or regional factors. We have put even greater stress on regional factors than would have been expected to emerge from the military staffing process to emphasise the fact that the TA has a wider role as part of the Army's public face in the community.

I was slightly surprised by the intervention of the hon. Member for Reigate, who dismissed the argument in favour of maintaining a footprint. We emphasised many times—indeed, it was said by hon. Members from both sides of the House and from all parts of the country—that it was important to maintain the footprint. I find it strange that that should now be used as a criticism of the process. The footprint was not only an inherent part of the process but widely demanded.

Mr. Blunt: My point—it was made to the Defence Committee this morning and I was passing on the information to the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle)—was that the headquarters was being moved 25 miles for the sole purpose of crossing a border. I am not sure that that has an enormous amount to do with a national footprint.

Mr. Spellar: I noted down at the time that the hon. Gentleman used the term footprint; he said that the move was being made to maintain a footprint and that the decision was political. I believe that it is important to maintain the footprint. If that has been deemed to be one of the considerations, we will acknowledge it.

It was no surprise that my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley observed that he had believed that his constituency was not among those affected in the initial proposals. We stressed to the large numbers of those who made representations about the effects of TA restructuring in their areas that the consultation was genuine; its purpose was to ensure that a proper balance could be reflected in the proposals that were finally put to Ministers.

Of course I am personally sorry that my hon. Friend and his constituency should have had, as he sees it, the rough end of the deal, but I hope that he will accept that the objectives of the exercise have required us to have regard not only to the particular circumstances of the headquarters but to the region as a whole.

Lancashire has not done badly in the restructuring exercise. It currently contains six Territorial Army centres; there are centres in Blackpool, Lancaster, Preston and Chorley, with two centres in Blackburn. After the reform, there will be five TA centres in Lancashire. The TA centre in my hon. Friend's constituency will be the only one to close.

The remaining centres will be base to the best part of three infantry companies and an infantry battalion headquarters, a signal squadron, three Army medical service squadrons and the Lancaster University officer training corps. That is not much less than there is now—Lancashire has lost an infantry company, an engineer troop, and the 22-man headquarters of 101 Battalion REME. The county remains well represented by the TA. Moreover, it could be argued that the review has been kinder to Lancashire than to some other counties.

The intention is that the headquarters of 101 Battalion REME will move to Queensferry in north Wales. As we expect the company of infantry that is currently based in the TA centre in Queensferry to be reduced to a detachment, it makes sense to use the available space to accommodate other units. In addition to the infantry detachment, there will be a surgical squadron and 101 Battalion REME headquarters. There is ample space for those units.

The changes will give north Wales a share in the expansion of the TA element of the Army medical service from which Lancashire has benefited. They will place the REME battalion headquarters closer to the REME unit at Prestatyn, which is some 15 miles away on the A548.

Mr. Hoyle: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Spellar: Yes, but I remind my hon. Friend of the time.

Mr. Hoyle: Chorley is right next door to Clifton, where most of the Army presence is; if the REME battalion moves, it will be even further away.

Mr. Spellar: The battalion will move closer to one centre and further from another—that is always the difficulty in making those judgments. I am describing the process by which we tried to ensure a balance across the country. Furthermore, there is no question that we will not be able to recruit the 22 individual volunteers that we need for the headquarters.

[Mr. Spellar]

North Wales has not done badly in the review, but it has not done as well as Lancashire. Like Lancashire, north Wales contains six TA centres, but two of them are to close. Like Lancashire, north Wales contains four infantry companies; after the reforms, there will be the best part of three. Wales currently has only one battalion headquarters whereas Lancashire has three. If the REME battalion headquarters was not moving, Wales would have none after the changes.

The judgment has been that it makes sense to move the headquarters of 101 Battalion REME to Wales. That makes operational sense because of the presence of the REME unit in Prestatyn. It makes practical sense because of the need to make best use of the facilities in Queensferry after the reduction of the infantry presence there. It makes regional sense because it accords with our attempts to ensure reasonable equity in the distribution of the future TA.

There will be opportunities for those in Chorley to continue to serve in the TA if they want, although I accept that, for some, it will not be as convenient as it is now. The centre at Kimberley barracks, Preston, however, is not more than seven or eight miles from Chorley and there are other centres in Lancashire and Greater Manchester. Arrangements will be made where possible to enable those who want to transfer to do so.

I understand the position of my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley. It is hard that Chorley should be almost alone in being able to supply what was needed to ensure fair play regionally. The decision involved a matter of judgment; we had to take into account the wider interests of the TA in the region as a whole—

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Decommissioning

1. Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): If she will make a statement on the decommissioning of weapons from terrorist organisations. [61198]

2. Mr. Peter Luff (Mid–Worcestershire): What progress has been made on the decommissioning of illegally held arms; and if she will make a statement. [61199]

3. Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): What progress has been made on the decommissioning of illegally held arms and explosives. [61200]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Marjorie Mowlam): The independent International Commission on Decommissioning has been holding discussions about the means of decommissioning with representatives from a number of parties associated with paramilitary organisations.

Although actual decommissioning has yet to start, the Government are determined to see the Good Friday agreement implemented in full. It is time for all paramilitary groups to play their part in the implementation of the agreement and start decommissioning now.

Mr. Woodward: Although nobody in the House would in any way wish to undermine the achievements of the peace process—and I am sure that everybody in the House would continue to support fully the Secretary of State in the work that she is doing—we must bear it in mind that a great deal of understanding is required by those who have seen more than 200 paramilitary prisoners released since 11 September without a single weapon having been decommissioned. The understanding that is required by the families of the victims of the most brutal killings by some of those who have now been released is perhaps being tested to breaking point. Does the Secretary of State believe that the process of releasing paramilitary prisoners should continue while not a single weapon is collected? When does she believe the first of those weapons should be handed in?

Marjorie Mowlam: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern at the pain felt by victims' families. I have talked to many of those families in the past weeks and months, and I understand that completely. However, even though their pain is difficult, many say that if it means that other families do not have to go through what they have gone through, the Good Friday agreement is worth having and worth trying to implement. It is difficult and it takes a great deal of understanding, but the people voted for the agreement. We are implementing it—that is our role. The agreement must be implemented in all its dimensions, and that is what we are working to achieve.

Mr. Luff: I certainly wish to associate myself with the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Woodward) about the Secretary of State's achievements. However, does she understand that there is a real risk of her losing the support of mainstream English opinion for the peace process unless decommissioning begins almost immediately? Had she come with me to my constituency at the weekend, she would have heard many people express to me their anger and puzzlement at the fact that terrorists can walk free from prison while the organisations that support them are not giving up a single ounce of Semtex or a single bullet. Does she understand the urgency of the feeling that decommissioning should begin immediately?

Marjorie Mowlam: The agreement was put in place for all the people of Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland, the Republic and elsewhere. It was put in place not by us, but by the party leaders. We will do all that we can following the votes of the people to make sure that the agreement is implemented. Of course understanding is needed, but moving from violence to peace is not easy. We are implementing the Good Friday agreement. Some dimensions are moving more quickly than others, but we must implement the agreement for it to work. The best way to get decommissioning and to find peace is to implement the agreement—as we are trying to do.

Mr. Hammond: In a letter to the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), the Prime Minister made a commitment which my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition quoted on 22 April. My right hon. Friend quoted that letter as follows:

"no Member of the new Assembly will be appointed a Minister until any paramilitary associates that he may have had have engaged in substantial decommissioning."—[Official Report, 22 April 1998; Vol. 310, c. 811.]

Will the Secretary of State reaffirm that pledge in precisely those terms today?

Marjorie Mowlam: Those are roughly the words that the Prime Minister used on 10 April. We will make the decision when we have people in the Executive. We are a long way off that yet.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): Is there not a road to decommissioning? At least 14 bodies of the disappeared have not been returned; masses of mutilations still take place; and a host of people are in exile. I understand that 458 terrorist incidents this year have been attributed to paramilitary groups involved in the Assembly. If those groups could deliver progress on the bodies and on the mutilations, would not that open the road to full decommissioning?

Marjorie Mowlam: I thank my hon. Friend and agree whole-heartedly.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): When the odd job lot opposite were in power, many prisoners were released early. How many weapons were decommissioned then? Everyone knew that decommissioning would be the most difficult element in the agreement and, as my right hon. Friend says, we have to consider it as a whole.

Marjorie Mowlam: My hon. Friend will be well aware that the Good Friday agreement contains clear commitments on the decommissioning of all paramilitary weapons within two years. We want the process to start straight away. I agree that the previous Government did not achieve a single piece of decommissioning but released 240 prisoners as a result of the Northern Ireland (Remission of Sentences) Act 1995.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Bracknell): That was to bring Northern Ireland into line with the rest of the country.

Marjorie Mowlam: I do not want to dwell on the past, because we are building for the future, but— [Interruption.] I do not want to get into a slanging match about the past. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I do not welcome comments from a sedentary position, and certainly not on such an important issue.

Marjorie Mowlam: It is sometimes a little difficult when hon. Members say that they support me in my position, but do not support the detail that comes out of my mouth. I wish that they would decide which way their support stands.

Ms Margaret Moran (Luton, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the preconditions that Conservative Members want to write into the agreement do not exist in it at the moment, and that it is incumbent on all of us who have the welfare of Northern Ireland at heart to ensure that our constituents understand the real terms of the agreement and not those that others would seek to insert? Is it not wrong to attempt to rewrite an agreement to which all parties signed up?

Marjorie Mowlam: I thank my hon. Friend. Let me make our position absolutely clear: decommissioning is an integral part of the agreement; it is not a precondition but an obligation. I would like it to happen as soon as possible, but I agree completely that it would be wrong to rewrite the agreement, as those who want movement on the accelerated release of prisoners, and not the other dimensions, are trying to do.

Mr. Jeffrey Donaldson (Lagan Valley): The Secretary of State will be aware of the obligations placed on her by the House under section 3(9)(d) of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 to review the conduct of terrorist organisations whose prisoners are being released. At the moment, many of those organisations continue to engage in violence and regularly breach their ceasefires; some of them have not even set up a liaison with the International Commission on Decommissioning. Does the Secretary of State believe that all the organisations benefiting from prisoner releases are committed to exclusively peaceful means, when violence continues daily?

Marjorie Mowlam: I take constant cognisance of the piece of the Act to which the hon. Gentleman refers—section 3—and, as I have said in the House before, I review on a continuous basis the question whether the groups that are part of the accelerated scheme for releases are maintaining an unequivocal ceasefire. I have to say that they are, on the firm evidence with which I am provided. I make the commitment again to the House that if that changes, I will of course make a judgment and act, but up to now that firm evidence is not there.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Should we not put it on record that no Member of Parliament does not want to see decommissioning happen as quickly as possible, and that that is not the monopoly of some Conservative Members? Is it not a fact that what has happened since the Good Friday agreement has been what was agreed at the time, and that no action has been taken by the British Government that was not in the agreement, which was endorsed by a huge majority in this House? Some people did not want the agreement and are doing their best to destabilise it.

Marjorie Mowlam: No Government want to see decommissioning of all paramilitary weapons more than this Government. We have worked hard to do everything that we can to get paramilitary weapons decommissioned. It is an essential part of the agreement. Progress with the Good Friday agreement is crucial to making progress on all the dimensions necessary. It is about confidence, and the bipartisanship in the House has been crucial in helping that confidence along. I hope that that is reinforced today.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): The Secretary of State will no doubt agree that decommissioning must extend to the weapons used in the mutilation incidents that take place. Does she agree that the official statistics hide higher levels of intimidation occurring at the moment in Northern Ireland? What words of encouragement can she give to those involved in the organisations Families Against Intimidation and Terror and Families Acting for Innocent Relatives, who courageously work hard to reduce the levels of violence with which many people in Northern Ireland sadly still have to live?

Marjorie Mowlam: I share the hon. Gentleman's hatred of those events and I use this opportunity to call again on the individuals who commit those barbaric acts to stop. Groups and individuals who campaign on the matter should rightly be commended. They work very hard to bring it into the public domain, sometimes at great personal risk to themselves. I say to the hon. Gentleman and others that I cannot act on the basis of speculation and allegations: I have to act on firm evidence. A number of allegations have appeared in the press recently, including one a couple of days ago that claimed that ex-prisoners were involved. I saw the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary yesterday and asked whether any firm evidence existed on which I should act. I was reassured that it did not. If there is firm evidence, I will act, as the agreement requires me to do.

Mr. Phil Hope (Corby): I congratulate my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister on their personal commitment and the work that they are doing to ensure that all the provisions of the Good Friday agreement are implemented. Like every other right hon. and hon. Member, I condemn gangsterism on the streets of Belfast, or anywhere else in the United Kingdom. What effect does my right hon. Friend think the apparent breakdown in the bipartisan approach is having on the confidence that people in Northern Ireland have in the Good Friday agreement, because it is that confidence that will secure longer lasting peace in the future?

Marjorie Mowlam: I thank my hon. Friend. I hope that the breakdown is apparent and not real, and I look for reassurance from my opposite number, the right hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. MacKay). The bipartisan approach has been a plus. I have been assured that the support we gave the previous Government was a help and I hope that the understanding continues. It helps confidence in Northern Ireland and worldwide, which feeds back into Northern Ireland.

Progress is being made on many other dimensions, despite many of the questions that pick on the negative parts. It is slow, but we have only been at it for six months. The momentum is still there on the Human Rights Commission, the Equality Commission, the Assembly and the cross-border bodies. My deputy, my hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy), sends his apologies to the House, because he is at present in talks with parties on aspects of the agreement. That momentum must not be forgotten.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Bracknell): In attempting to support a bipartisan approach to Northern Ireland, may I strongly endorse what the Secretary of State said at the Dispatch Box at her last Question Time, which was that decommissioning and the early release of terrorist prisoners must go in parallel as part of the agreement that we both support? Does she agree that any reasonable person would say that the early release of many more than 200 terrorist prisoners, without a single ounce of Semtex or one gun having been handed in by the paramilitaries, does not in any shape or form match up to the agreement or the promises that have been made?

Marjorie Mowlam: If the right hon. Gentleman is attempting to support us, he ought to read the agreement, which is clear on the point that he has just made. Yes, there must be parallel movement, and on all dimensions. That is how the difficult issue of decommissioning will be addressed. If the agreement is implemented, decommissioning will happen as part of the process. If, as I said earlier, I receive evidence that one or more groups are not maintaining a completely unequivocal ceasefire, I shall use my powers, under the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998, to prevent further releases.

The right hon. Gentleman asked why I am allowing releases to go ahead without decommissioning. If he reads the agreement, he will find that it states that if there is a breakdown of the ceasefire, and if I have evidence to that effect, I may—as I have said to the House on numerous occasions—act accordingly. There is no such evidence. If the right hon. Gentleman is asking me to do something else, that is not implementing the agreement.

Mr. MacKay: May I tell the Secretary of State that the text that I have taken is that given by the Prime Minister, both at the Dispatch Box in reply to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition during several exchanges in May, and in his clear pledges to the people of Northern Ireland during the referendum campaign. The Secretary of State and I know that those pledges have not been kept. We are told that the Prime Minister will join the Taoiseach, Mr. Ahern, in Belfast later today. Can the right hon. Lady assure us that he will say to all the paramilitaries, "I am drawing a line in the sand. Not a single extra terrorist prisoner will be released until there is substantial and verifiable decommissioning. I am thus keeping my promise to the people of Northern Ireland."?

Marjorie Mowlam: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has kept his pledges. If the right hon. Gentleman reads the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 and the Northern Ireland Act 1998, he will find that his points are in them.

Security Situation

4. Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): If she will make a statement on the current security situation. [61201]

8. Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): If she will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland. [61205]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Adam Ingram): The security situation at present remains relatively calm and the main ceasefires continue to hold. Unfortunately, there are still groups that have refused to call ceasefires and which continue to use violence, or the threat of violence, to promote their own narrow agendas. The security forces remain alert to counter that threat.

Mr. Paterson: The Belfast human rights group, Families Against Intimidation and Terror, reports that there were 400 violent terrorist incidents in the first 10 months of 1998. That has accelerated, with 157 in November, and 37 families have had to be rehoused. In contradiction of the Secretary of State, Mr. Vincent McKenna, the development officer of FAIT, says that 12 released prisoners have been directly implicated in incidents. Given the deteriorating situation, does it not defy common sense to continue to release violent men?

Mr. Ingram: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has extensively answered most of those points. Let me deal with the allegations made by FAIT, an organisation with which I have had contact, and whose previous office bearers and their work I respect. To anyone who has information and evidence, I can say only this: do not make allegations in the press; give the evidence to the police. A judicial process is required to take people to justice, not the Government.

Mr. Grieve: Again, on the question of security, I am sure that the Minister is aware that there has been a growing number of incidents involving attacks on RUC patrols, particularly in South Armagh. Is he also aware that there is a widespread view in Northern Ireland that those attacks have been carefully orchestrated by Sinn Fein and the IRA and have been designed specifically to influence the way in which the Patten commission considers the reform of the RUC in the future? How does he view the progress of the ceasefire and the security situation in the light of those attacks?

Mr. Ingram: I know that the hon. Gentleman is a respected barrister, but I make the same points as

I made to his hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson). If he has any evidence for those allegations, he should pass it on to the police and the RUC so that they can investigate it. Clearly, as I said earlier, there are still incidents of unrest throughout Northern Ireland. The RUC has to address that, and all members of society in Northern Ireland—it is to be hoped with the support of Opposition Members—must work together to implement the Good Friday agreement.

Mr. Robert McCartney (North Down): Does the Minister agree that people are being shot and mutilated daily in Northern Ireland and that that is taking place in areas under the complete control of paramilitary organisations represented in the Assembly? Does the Minister agree that those widespread and, in many instances, murderous offences are being committed in areas where the police acknowledge that either the Provisional IRA or the Ulster Volunteer Force have complete control?

Mr. Ingram: I must say again that the hon. and learned Gentleman is making allegations. He is a respected lawyer in Northern Ireland and he should not respond to allegations. He should seek evidence and pass it to the RUC. The RUC is assiduous in trying to track down every wrongdoing, but it needs evidence. It needs people to come forward. It needs those who have been victimised, harassed or intimidated to stand up and say what has happened to them and it needs witnesses to back them up. Anybody who has been involved will then be taken through the judicial process.

Mr. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): Does my hon. Friend agree that we should commend the efforts of former prisoner organisations which are trying to work with the probation service, the police and other authorities in Northern Ireland to create proper community alternatives in areas where there are high levels of crime and problems for communities? Should we not commend those efforts and make it clear that, across the House, we condemn the activities of drug barons and gangsters who are using the political situation for their own ends?

Mr. Ingram: I thank my hon. Friend for those comments, with which I agree whole-heartedly. I met a group yesterday called Proj-ex 2000, which is involved in the reintegration of released prisoners. It made the point that many ex-prisoners return to a normal life. They want to reintegrate into society and it behoves all of us to find the means and provide the resources for them to achieve that. There are many people working to heal Northern Ireland society and we have to work alongside them to remove for good the men of violence.

Decommissioning

5. Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): What discussions she has held with leaders of political parties represented in the Northern Ireland Assembly about a linkage between decommissioning of terrorist weapons and eligibility for participation in the Northern Ireland Executive. [61202]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Marjorie Mowlam): Such proposals have been made by more than one of the parties. There is no direct linkage in the agreement, and the Government cannot rewrite it. We are there to help implement it.

Mr. Wilkinson: Does the right hon. Lady not recognise that the maintenance of an armoury of weapons at a party's disposal constitutes an implicit threat to the population and a potential source of blackmail to the political and democratic process? In that context, may I remind the right hon. Lady of the personal pledge delivered by the Prime Minister to the University of Ulster, Coleraine, on 20 May? He said:

"Those who use or threaten violence shall be excluded from the Government of Northern Ireland."

Does that pledge still hold?

Marjorie Mowlam: The maintenance of an armoury, whether by republicans or loyalists, is clearly counterproductive.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): What are you going to do about it?

Marjorie Mowlam: I shall try to implement the Good Friday agreement because that is the best way to achieve decommissioning. If the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) has an alternative, I look forward to hearing it. On his second point, which questioned the Prime Minister's pledge on 20 May, I say to him, as I said in earlier answers, that the pledge has been honoured. It is in the Northern Ireland Act 1998 and the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 and we are following it to the word.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): I am surprised that the House is so tolerant of the equivocation and evasion that we have heard from the Government today. I wonder why, when the House has found its conscience about General Pinochet and the abuse of human rights, the Secretary of State will not give a clear definition of how people with paramilitary links such as McGuinness, Adams and other members of Sinn Fein can get into government. Will she reassure the House that she is not contemplating contravening the Stormont agreement by saying that we must implement every element of it before there is any decommissioning? That would not be acceptable.

Marjorie Mowlam: As the hon. Gentleman knows, it is not for me to make that final decision. I have said that we are trying to implement all the parts together. No one part must be a precondition for another. The issue is one of confidence, and there must be confidence building on both sides. Implementing the agreement is the best way to achieve that.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire): Does not the Secretary of State agree that the Government have made it abundantly clear through the words of the Prime Minister that Sinn Fein members will not "qualify to take seats in the government of Northern Ireland" unless and until they

"have given up violence for good"?—[Official Report, 6 May 1998; Vol. 311, c. 711.]

The right hon. Gentleman included progress on decommissioning in that. Is that a matter of principle for the Government, or are they prepared to compromise outside the spirit of the Belfast agreement to cobble together a deal?

Marjorie Mowlam: The hon. Gentleman did not read out the whole quotation, which referred specifically to the Executive and progress on decommissioning. I am not saying, as was suggested earlier, that decommissioning should wait until last. We want it to happen as soon as possible and it is an essential part of the agreement. It is not a precondition but an obligation. In answer to earlier questions, I made it clear that the only way to achieve decommissioning is to implement the agreement. All parts must be implemented and we all have to work very hard to achieve that.

Tourism

6. Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): If she will make a statement on the latest trends in tourism in Northern Ireland. [61203]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Adam Ingram): In 1997, 1.45 million visitors came to Northern Ireland—a 1 per cent. decline on 1996—and contributed £208 million to the local economy. Estimates for the first half of 1998 suggest a marginal growth of 1 per cent. over the same period last year. Tourism performance measures for 1998 will be available early in 1999.

Mr. Bruce: Will the Minister tell us what is being done in Northern Ireland to develop contacts with the Republic of Ireland to improve tourism, work on matters other than security and, hopefully, build up trust between the two communities?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman refers to one of the important areas in which there is good cross-border co-operation. That is being examined by an implementation body of the new Assembly Members and the Republic of Ireland. Tourism has great potential for the local economy and many jobs will flow from it.

Mr. Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby): Will my hon. Friend please tell the House what work has been done to market in north America the great tourism potential of Northern Ireland and the rest of the island of Ireland? Has not the confidence that tourists have gained from knowledge of the bipartisan approach that we have previously witnessed in the House encouraged them to return to the island of Ireland, bringing prosperity to parts of the Northern Ireland economy?

Mr. Ingram: The Northern Ireland tourist board has put in considerable effort. Against a very difficult backcloth, it has energetically tried to bring more tourists to Northern Ireland. Those who visit Northern Ireland return again and again, and I believe that we may all promote Northern Ireland as a great place to visit. It will be even better when the Good Friday agreement is implemented in full.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1.[61228] Mr. William Cash (Stone): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 2 December.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further such meetings today.

Mr. Cash: Does the Prime Minister recall the words of Sir Winston Churchill in 1932—

"Tell the truth to the British people"?

Will he guarantee to the House and to the British people that he can and will veto tax harmonisation in Europe, veto the breaking of the unanimity rule and veto the call for a European constitution? The British people have been consistently misled over Europe by successive Governments, but the time has now come for the British people to be told the truth. Will he give the British people a White Paper, setting out the true constitutional position of this country in relation to the European Union?

The Prime Minister: As always, I thank the hon. Gentleman for the help that he gave us in the last general election campaign. He must be very pleased that his views on Europe are now the views of the Conservative Front-Bench team. As for the particular issue that he raises, no, I cannot promise him a White Paper, but I do promise him that we shall continue to represent the interests of this country properly and faithfully, and will resist any proposals that undermine the essential interests of this country. That is what we have done, and that is what we shall continue to do.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): Would my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the announcement of agreement at Rover Group? In particular, is he aware that the agreement that has been reached includes flexibility for employees but a reduction in working hours? Does that not show that, contrary to what Conservative Members seem to think, improvements in working conditions and a reduction in hours can be the friend of productivity, not its enemy?

The Prime Minister: I very much welcome the announcement that has been made by Rover Group. The building of the new Mini at Longbridge is a great victory for the imagination that has been shown by both management and unions at that plant. If the deal goes through and the extra investment goes in, that is the best guarantee of a healthy future for that plant, and the Government will certainly do all that we can to assist them.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): Can the Prime Minister confirm that he is happy to see nearly 100 hereditary peers continue to sit in the House of Lords after his forthcoming Bill on the Lords has been enacted?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted to hear the right hon. Gentleman's question. It is an indication that he is now prepared to agree to what would remove hereditary peers altogether, in the two stages, from the House of Lords. If he is now prepared to agree that, we are certainly prepared to agree it; and we shall then have the chance of getting a fully reformed second Chamber without any hereditary peers at all.

Mr. Hague: Will the Prime Minister confirm, because his party may not be aware of what he is talking about on this subject, that for some weeks the Lord Chancellor has been approaching the Conservative party with a proposal to keep a proportion of the hereditary peers, explicitly sitting as hereditary peers, not as life peers, in exchange for my party's acquiescence in the rest of his ill-thought-out change? Although we welcome the huge climbdown on his part, we are not prepared to acquiesce in that change, because we are not prepared to join forces with him on major constitutional change that is based on no comprehensive plan or principle.

The Prime Minister: That is extremely interesting. Yes, we are certainly prepared to agree to a proposal that would allow us to remove the hereditary peers altogether, in two stages. We are perfectly prepared to agree that in the first stage one in 10 hereditaries stays, and in the second stage they go altogether. It is also entirely true that we were prepared to discuss that with the right hon. Gentleman's party. I thought that we had the agreement of the leader of his party in the House of Lords. Indeed, I believe that we have that agreement. [Interruption.] Will the right hon. Gentleman enlighten us whether we have his agreement?

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister has just had the answer to that. He told the House—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House will come to order, so that we can hear what hon. Members are saying.

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister said in the Queen's Speech debate last week:

> "We believe . . . that it is important to deliver on the pledge that we made to end the right of hereditary peers to sit and vote in the House of Lords.—[Official Report, 24 November 1998; Vol. 321, c. 33.]

He said that their existence was a "democratic monstrosity". [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] His party still agrees with that. Now he is proposing to keep hereditary peers in a stage 1 reform—[Interruption.] It is no good Labour Members shaking their heads. What they do not know is that the Prime Minister proposes to keep hereditary peers in a stage 1 reform of the House of Lords. Where does that leave his principles?

The Prime Minister: I take it from that that the right hon. Gentleman opposes the deal that has been agreed by the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Lords. As a result, we will indeed remove hereditary peers. We will do it by consensus, stage 1 and then stage 2, so that we can ensure that there is room in the legislative programme for other measures as well.

We are agreed on our side. I believe that the party of the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) will agree also. His party in the House of Lords has now agreed. It is clear from this exchange that the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) no longer speaks for the Conservative party in the House of Lords.

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister need be in no doubt who speaks for the Conservative party. Clearly, he is in no doubt that he speaks for the Liberal party and takes its acquiescence for granted. While we believe that his agreement to retain hereditary peers after stage 1 is a huge climbdown on the part of the Government, let me make it clear to him that we believe it is wrong to embark on fundamental change to the Parliament of this country without any idea where that will lead.

We have said before and we say now: no stage 1 reform without stage 2. Do not the Prime Minister's total lack of principle and his horse-trading confirm that it is common sense to put that reform on hold and await the report of the royal commission?

The Prime Minister: No. What is common sense is to get the thing done with as little fuss and as easily as possible, which we can now do. It is fascinating that the right hon. Gentleman is disowning the agreement that has been entered into by the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Lords. He may want to be in that position, but I doubt very much whether his party wants to be in that position. When he is provided with the means of getting reform through and agreed, he is more interested in playing games about the House of Lords than getting it done. Does he disown the deal made by the leader in the House of Lords, or does he agree with it? We should be told.

Mr. Hague: No deal has been made with the Conservative party. The deal to keep hereditary peers that the Prime Minister has tried to negotiate with the Conservative party does not address the fundamental point that the Government should not embark on major constitutional change without knowing where it leads. His proposal does not even satisfy the one principle in which he said that he was always in favour: the removal of hereditary peers.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have approached reform of the House of Lords on the basis of a clear principle. Our position was "No reform without knowing where it is going"; until today, theirs was the removal of hereditary peers. Does that not demonstrate that the Prime Minister never had any principle on the matter at all?

The Prime Minister: In fact, it proves that, even when hereditary Conservative peers are prepared to agree to change, the right hon. Gentleman is not. That is the absurd position to which he has reduced himself. If anything demonstrates the way in which the right hon. Gentleman gets every major strategic judgment wrong, it is this.

We have the opportunity to reform the House of Lords properly, and to establish a programme that will remove hereditary peers, but will allow us to do that on the broadest possible basis of agreement. It is clear that nowadays, even when we speak to the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Lords, we cannot be sure that the leader of the Conservative party in this House is of the same mind.

Mr. Hague: What we know is that the Prime Minister intends to turn the House of Lords into a house of cronies, and that he is now prepared to engage in any horsetrading that is necessary to achieve that end. It is beyond his comprehension that any politician can stand on a principle, and stand firm in his beliefs. I stand on the principle—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I have heard enough noise this afternoon.

Mr. Hague rose—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. If this continues, I shall send some Members out of the Chamber.

Mr. Hague: I stand on the principle that it is not advisable for anyone to blunder in regard to the constitution until they know where they are going. After today, it will be clear that the Prime Minister stands on no principle whatever.

The Prime Minister: I cannot prevent the right hon. Gentleman from engaging on a kamikaze mission. I can only tell him that even his cronies in the House of Lords agree with me that we should try to get this reform through. If we can manage to get it through with the minimum difficulty, it will be in the interests of the country that demands such action.

Mr. John Cummings (Easington): May I ask an equally important question? Does my right hon. Friend, and good neighbour, share my welcome for the coalfield task force report which was launched yesterday in Peterlee—a town in my constituency—by the Deputy Prime Minister? Does he agree that the report's recommendations signal the need for the overdue repayment of a long debt owed by the nation to those living in former coalfield communities?

The Prime Minister: I agree. As my hon. Friend will know, many who were present at the launch were from my next-door constituency.

The existence of a proper programme to regenerate the former coalfield communities, and to bring them jobs and hope, shows that this Government—this Labour Government—take their debt to the miners very seriously.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Does the Prime Minister claim that the success of his health policy is demonstrated by the fact that, in the last six months, the number of people waiting for operations has been reduced by 100,000 as a result of a 100,000 increase in the number of people waiting to see a consultant?

The Prime Minister: No, because that is not what has happened. Waiting lists have fallen from their peak by about 120,000 since the Government came to power, as a result of the investment that we have made in the national health service. The reason for the rise in the out-patient list is the massive increase in the number of referrals. It is not the case that fewer people are being treated; in fact, more people are being treated.

Mr. Ashdown: May I direct the Prime Minister's attention a little more closely to a statistical bulletin which shows that the number of GP referrals over the past six months has dropped—not increased—by about 3,000? Is not the truth that the Government have made a political promise that they have funded only partly and that, to deliver it, they are robbing out-patient Peter to pay for in-patient Paul?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that those figures are right, actually. According to the figures that I have, 79,000 more out-patients were seen in the quarter ending September 1998 than in the previous quarter, and the figure is up more than 100,000 over the year since we came to office. We have been committed to reducing waiting lists, and we are reducing them, after years of rising waiting lists under the Conservatives. Those figures also show that we are reducing waiting times as well, because they are just as important. With the extra investment coming into the national health service next year, we will make sure that we not only fulfil our manifesto commitment, but exceed it.

Ms Tess Kingham (Gloucester): At the request of the people of Gloucester, I have been involved in a long campaign to get Channel 5 to drop its plans to make a mini-series about the West murders, which affected my constituency so greatly. It has refused consistently to meet the surviving victims or the victims' families, even when they came to London last week to deliver a petition. Channel 5 allowed a security guard to meet them on the doorstep.

This is not the first time that such a thing has happened. Channel 5 also has plans to make a soap opera about the Zeebrugge disaster, and another film company had plans to make a film about the Moors murders. Where will this stop, and is there any way that the Government can help to protect victims' families and surviving victims, so that they can remember their loved ones in peace rather than through the eyes of some soap opera star?

The Prime Minister: The House will be very sympathetic to the points that my hon. Friend raises, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport will note them as well. Any of the companies making such films should be sensitive and responsive to the needs and desires of the victims, who still live with the scars that those crimes inflicted.

Q2.[61229] Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): Does the Prime Minister not recognise the rich irony of his Chancellor going to Brussels this week to discuss tax havens, when he could have got free, world-beating advice merely by asking the Paymaster General? Does the Prime Minister not appreciate that, inevitably, high taxes lead to high unemployment, as on the continent? That is the universal legacy left behind by every Labour Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: First, we have cut corporation tax from the levels that we inherited from the Conservatives. Secondly, I do not believe that we will be alone in this argument on taxation in Europe at all. If necessary we will be alone, but I do not believe that we will be. What is more, I believe that there is a debate within Europe about the right way forward for Europe.

Some people want higher taxes in Europe; other people believe, as we believe, that the root to jobs and competitiveness is through economic reform, employability and investment in skills and education. We will get engaged in that argument, and I believe that we will win it. We must not revert to the diplomacy of the Tory years that saw this country reduced to the margins of Europe, without any influence at all. We will stay firm, and we will stay engaged. That is the way to protect this country's national interests.

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the British economy is on course to meet Treasury targets and that attempts by Conservative Members to talk us into a recession are not only wide of the mark, but fatally flawed by the extraordinary comments of the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood)? In my local paper last week, he said:

"Why do we need so much expansion instead of being happy with the balance we have? We do not need the economic growth."

The Prime Minister: I am hardly surprised at eccentric remarks falling from the lips of the shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, but my hon. Friend is right to point out that the contrast is the Government providing fiscal and monetary stability through Bank of England independence and the new golden rules; the extra investment—£40 billion in health, education and other public services; and the working families tax credit and the new deal, to help low-income families and the unemployed. All are good measures for the British economy; all are opposed by today's Conservative party.

Q3.[61230] Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): Does the Prime Minister remember all the promises that he made before the last election? Let me remind him of just one, which was made explicitly on his behalf, formally and in writing, by the Minister for Trade and Competitiveness in Europe, who said that "the next Labour Government will introduce legislation to make age discrimination illegal."

Does the Prime Minister stand by that commitment?

The Prime Minister: Yes, we stand by it. Indeed, after years of inertia from the Conservative Government, whom the hon. Gentleman supported, this Government have done more on age discrimination in 18 months than his lot did in 18 years.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important for Britain to argue in Europe for strong, independent taxation? It is scandalous that we inherited a system whereby the previous Government signed away our rights to zero rating for VAT on domestic fuel and the rights of British holidaymakers to buy duty-free goods.

The Prime Minister: The problem for the Government in trying to ensure that the provision of duty free goods is not abolished is the agreement made by the Conservative Government. The previous Government agreed all the measures on tax and harmonisation, just as they introduced more qualified majority voting than any Labour Government have ever introduced. Any action that we take will be based on our national interest. Our national interest requires us to be engaged and positive in Europe, and we shall hold to that position.

Q4.[61231] Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): In May, the Chancellor of the Exchequer welcomed the appointment of the Financial Secretary to head the European working group on tax harmonisation as putting the United Kingdom at the heart of the debate. Is it because we are at the heart of the debate that we will be forced to scrap 10 tax incentives for industry in this country?

The Prime Minister: No. What the Chancellor said is absolutely right. The code of conduct on unfair tax competition was first discussed under the previous Government. We have taken that work forward to remove hidden state subsidies that distort the single European market. It is important that we play a full part in that debate. Is the hon. Lady saying on behalf of the Conservative party that we should opt out of that debate altogether? We have had the opt-out politics of the Tory party for far too long. The country will remember the difference between Conservative and Labour over Europe: the Conservative party fought a beef war and got nowhere, whereas the Labour Government got the beef ban lifted entirely in 18 months. That is the way in which to engage with Europe.

Q5.[61232] Mr. Ian Pearson (Dudley, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, although the problems are not over, the agreement between unions and management at Rover on flexible working, on which a ballot is currently being held, is a significant step towards securing, not only the long-term future of Longbridge, but many tens of thousands of jobs across the west midlands? Will he continue to campaign and to apply pressure to ensure that BMW's future investment plans include building the Mini and the new R30 model in Birmingham, and measures to strengthen the competitiveness and productivity of our automotive components base?

The Prime Minister: I pay tribute to the work of my hon. Friend in raising the issues of concern to his constituents. The only way to secure the future of that plant is by entering into such an agreement, which will raise productivity, improve competitiveness and guarantee that a high-quality product is produced at that plant. The Government shall play any part that they can. The fact that we have managed to get this programme together, agreed between unions and management, and that there is now hope for the future of that plant, is a tribute to that partnership, which offers the right way forward for industrial relations in this country.

Mr. Michael Mates (East Hampshire): Why cannot the Prime Minister bring himself to be as robust and firm with terrorists close to home as he was, rightly, with Saddam Hussein a couple of weeks ago? Is it a matter of pride for him that, even as he was receiving the plaudits of the Irish in Dublin, two grinning murderers were released who had committed possibly the most brutal public crimes of the entire troubles? Is it not time that the Prime Minister said to the IRA and Sinn Fein, "Enough is enough. We are honouring the letter and the spirit of the agreement. No more prisoners out until you do the same."?

The Prime Minister: It is for precisely that reason that it is important that we do honour the agreement. I understand the concerns of people who see those who have committed appalling murders being released on licence—not being given an amnesty, but being released on licence. However, it is important, if we are to ensure that all the elements of the agreement are adhered to, including decommissioning, that we hold to our part of the bargain. We will do that and we have already made it clear that we expect every part of the agreement, including decommissioning, to be adhered to and agreed.

Q6.[61233] Mrs. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton): Does the Prime Minister share the respect that I and, I imagine, many hon. Members have for Shelter, the campaign for the homeless, and will he join me in welcoming the innovative new service that it will launch tomorrow: a free 24-hour advice and assistance line for those facing homelessness, to be called Shelterline? Will he also welcome with me the partnership that has made that possible between the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, British Telecom and a range of individuals and organisations through the public, private and voluntary sectors?

The Prime Minister: I support strongly the launch of Shelterline and welcome it. I also point out, in addition to what my hon. Friend rightly says, that the social exclusion unit and the special unit that will tackle rough sleeping in London will have some £145 million made available to it over the next three years. In addition, of course, it is this Government who are beginning to release some of the money—the £4.45 billion backlog of capital receipts—that will allow us to tackle some of the housing problems in our inner cities and elsewhere.

My judgment is that, if we proceed with the policies that we have set out now, combined with the new deal, both for communities in the inner city and for the young and the long-term unemployed, we will give many of those who are homeless the best chance and start in life that they have had for many years.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Will the Prime Minister reflect on the fact that, last Thursday, he took part in a two-horse race in the north-east of Scotland and managed to come third? On the same day, he addressed a joint session of the Irish Parliament. Will he explain why, in that speech, he was so positive and complimentary about Ireland's success as a small nation in the mainstream of Europe, but, when it comes to Scotland, he is so negative and disparaging about Scotland emulating that example? Could that contrast explain why he received a standing ovation in the Dail, but the bum's rush in the north-east of Scotland?

The Prime Minister: I look forward to the debate that we will have in the Scottish Parliament election campaign next year, and I simply say to the hon. Gentleman that Scotland will have a straightforward choice. It will have a choice between higher taxes, worse economic prospects, business leaving Scotland, the inability to fund the extra investment in schools and hospitals—all the risks under the Scottish National party—and the chance of economic stability and investment in our public services under the Labour party.

What I notice about the hon. Gentleman is that the one issue that he never wants to engage in is the economic cost and risk of the policies that he advocates. My judgment is that, when the people of Scotland see that choice, it will be him that gets the bum's rush.

Q7.[61234] Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South): Will my right hon. Friend welcome the good news for the people of the west midlands and particularly Coventry that Rover has been saved, but, more important, that Peugeot Talbot will now expand, creating hundreds of jobs? Will he condemn the Opposition Members who talk Britain down and continually jeopardise the jobs of millions of people not only in the west midlands, but throughout the country?

The Prime Minister: I should also second the praise that Peugeot's managing director has given to the work force at Peugeot for improving productivity and quality. That is great news for Peugeot. It won the new orders in the face of intense competition from the rest of Europe. It is important and excellent news. It underlines also how important it is that we carry on being a constructive part of the European Union. If we can make sure that we drive up productivity and quality in the British work force and in British industry, the future of our country will be secure indeed.

Local Government Finance

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. John Prescott): With permission, I should like to make a statement about the local authority revenue finance settlement for England for 1999-2000.

The services that local councils provide are vital to economic success and to making Britain a better place to live in. We are working with local councils through our central/local partnership to modernise and support local government.

On this occasion last year, I set out the Government's programme for the renewal of local democracy. It is an ambitious long-term programme, and I have further progress to report. In July, we published our White Paper on modernising local government. Yesterday, we published our Local Government Bill to sweep away the wasteful and unfair system of compulsory competitive tendering and replace it with best value, so that local people can get the quality of service that they expect at a price that they are willing to pay. The Bill abolishes crude and universal capping of council budgets and in its place provides more flexible reserve powers to prevent excessive increases in council tax, as we promised in our manifesto and as I have set out in the House on several occasions. The measures give local authorities greater responsibility for managing their own resources while providing protection for the local community.

Today's announcement on revenue funding should not be seen in isolation. We are tackling problems in a co-ordinated way, with extra resources to help communities tackle deprivation and improve housing and transport. Our spending plans for local government offer the most generous council tax settlement ever. They include: extra spending and extra protection for the taxpayer; a fairer distribution of grant; and three years of funding stability. They are the key elements of our approach to this year's local government settlement.

Total standard spending, as the House is aware, is the total amount of local authority spending to which we are prepared to contribute. Next year, it will be £50.62 billion. That is £2.6 billion more than this year, an increase of 5.4 per cent.

Education and health are our main priorities. Next year, we will invest an extra £1.4 billion in modernising education, an increase of 7.2 per cent. There will be more than £500 million extra for social services, in respect of which the Government's reforms werer set out in Monday's White Paper on social services.

We have announced further increases in the following two years. Over the three-year period, total standard spending assessments will increase by about 7 per cent. more than expected inflation. That new certainty helps councils plan ahead with greater confidence. Better forward planning and greater flexibility mean better standards of service and better value for money.

About half the money to fund total standard spending will continue to be provided by the Government. I propose that the revenue support grant should be £19.9 billion. In addition, some £5.9 billion of specific and special grants will be available to councils. The RSG figure may need to be altered slightly following consultation.

The business rate poundage will be increased by the September retail price index to 48.9p in the pound. We will redistribute £13.6 billion to local authorities next year. I am publishing the basis for that distribution today.

We are asking council taxpayers to contribute a fair share—no more, no less—to the cost of providing local services. We shall increase funding from Government grant and the business rate broadly in line with the overall increase in SSAs. If local authorities increase spending in line with the increase in their own SSA, council taxes will rise on average by 4.5 per cent.

As I told the House last December, this is the last year of crude council tax capping. I am therefore the first Secretary of State since the council tax was introduced seven years ago—after the disaster of the poll tax—not to set capping criteria in advance. However, I should make it clear that we expect local authorities to exercise self-restraint.

We are providing substantial real increases in funding, and local authorities should be concentrating on securing greater efficiency in the delivery of services and financial management, to increase further their spending power. There is no justification for excessive council tax increases. If we are faced with such increases, we shall not hesitate to act, as I have made clear to the House before.

We have to protect the country's interests as a whole. We shall not pick up the cost of excessive council tax increases by higher council tax benefit subsidy payments. We announced our intention to tackle that problem in the July White Paper.

We are setting a guideline figure, which will be a 4.5 per cent. increase in council tax, or a higher increase if needed to allow a council to budget in line with the cash increase in its SSA. A council that keeps within that guideline figure will have its council tax benefit subsidy payments reimbursed at the full rate. However, a council that exceeds the guideline will have to make an extra contribution to the cost of paying for the extra benefit. The council's contribution will increase gradually for each half a percentage point that the council tax increase exceeds the guideline.

I should make it absolutely clear that that provision will not impact on people in receipt of benefit, and that councils with a higher than average proportion of income from council tax benefit will be treated as though they had the average proportion. Poorer areas will therefore be treated no worse than the average.

On standard spending assessments, the national totals are important, but what every council wants to know is how much it will get and to be assured that the distribution is a fair one. Last year, I announced a number of changes to the SSA formula to make it fairer. For example, I brought up to date the formula for elderly residential social services, and ended the fundamentally unfair assumption that visitors and commuters were as deprived as deprived local residents.

This year, with the Local Government Association, we considered many possible changes. I should like to mention three matters on which we are proposing change, and a couple on which we have not reached a satisfactory conclusion.

First, after three years of discussion and research on children's social services, we have found a new formula, which I believe is well founded. It is undoubtedly an improvement on the formula that has been used for the past few years.

Secondly, I have introduced an allowance for sparsity in the part of SSAs that allows for the extra cost of providing social services for the elderly in their own homes. There will, therefore, be more for rural areas in that part of the SSA.

Thirdly, we are taking account of deprivation in the part of the formula that deals with what are called "county services", such as libraries and probation.

Sometimes, the search for an improvement is unsuccessful. This year, we have done a great deal of work, with local authorities, on two other big issues. The first, of course, was on the additional educational needs of some children. The other was on the area cost adjustment, dealing with the fact that pay costs vary significantly from one region to another.

In both cases, there are some valid objections to the current formula, and, in both cases, we have had many alternative reform proposals from which to choose. We had, for example, 21 detailed options on only the area cost adjustment. However, there was no clear frontrunner, either on merits or on its support within local government. It would not have been right to take decisions on the area cost adjustment and additional education needs now, when it is clear that there are unresolved issues raised by local government that need further work during the period of SSA stability. Maximising consensus is important to this Government—as it was not to the previous Administration.

I recognise that councils need time to adjust to the changes in SSAs. I shall pay a grant to limit the impact on council tax for those authorities whose losses due to changes in the SSA formula go beyond a threshold. I shall go further than the traditional damping arrangements. I guarantee that no local authority, north or south, will receive less government grant support next year than it did this year. It follows that there is no case for steep council tax increases.

The Government understand that the uncertainty created by an annual review of the SSA formula is unhelpful to local authorities who are trying to plan ahead. We now have a three-year period of funding stability for local government, during which we shall seek a long-term solution to the continuing difficult issues in the local government finance system.

We need to look at the scope for reform within the existing SSA system. For example, we are looki g for solutions to the area cost adjustment and additional education needs problems. That is not an easy task. We also need to look at the case for more radical reform, to produce a system that is clearer and more robust. We need a system that is more easily understood by the voter and accepted as fair and stable.

Local authorities must use this period of stability in their financing to concentrate on increasing efficiency and improving services, rather than on fighting their corner in the annual battle over their share of grant, but developing best value services for their community.

My Department is today writing with details of the settlement to every local authority in England. That package contains papers setting out how we propose to distribute central government support between authorities, including my proposals on SSAs and phasing in changes. It also includes details of how council tax benefit subsidy will be reduced above the guideline increase in council tax. Copies of that package have been placed in the Vote Office and the Library.

The proposals that I have outlined represent a break from the annual ritual that we have witnessed in the past. They represent the best settlement for seven years, they include changes to distribution to give a fairer and more stable system, they will ensure that no council loses grant and they will protect council tax payers from excessive increases in their bills. It is the best deal for years for local people. I commend it to the House.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (South-West Norfolk): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for making available copies of his statement and the supporting documents. He is always scrupulous about that, and I am grateful to him.

Last year, the right hon. Gentleman's settlement for local government delivered a record 8.6 per cent. increase in council tax across the nation and an extraordinary political switch of £50 million away from London and £100 million away from shire areas towards his friends in the north. So much for his party's pre-election promise that new Labour was not about high taxes on ordinary families and so much for his so-called commitment to a fair distribution of Government grant.

The right hon. Gentleman also promised increased clarity and fairness in local government finance last year. It is strange that he should have chosen to make his statement the day after publishing a Bill—one of the few allowed him by the business managers—that, by abolishing compulsory competitive tendering, will certainly put up council taxes. By introducing a new crude and arbitrary form of capping, the criteria of which will be a secret known only to Ministers, the Bill will render local government less accountable, less transparent and less fair.

This year, the right hon. Gentleman had the chance to put right last year's damage, but he has chosen not to do so. Today's settlement is for no change. Taxes for ordinary families will continue to be put up across the board, the funding fiddle for his political friends will be perpetuated and nothing will be done to provide the increased clarity and simplicity in local government that he promised.

We welcome the extra money that the right hon. Gentleman has provided for education. I have two detailed questions on the distribution of the grant. Will he confirm that the settlement does not include any provision to compensate authorities for the £130 million cost of the Government's pension tax? Does he accept that the increase that he has announced for the fire service is not enough even to meet the costs of this year's 5.6 per cent. pay award to firemen? Will he admit that that will mean cuts in the fire service across the country? What does he suppose will be the likely reaction of the fire service unions?

On methodology, will the right hon. Gentleman explain how much of the £100 million that was taken last year from rural areas will be restored to them through the sparsity allowance that he has announced for domiciliary social services for the elderly? Which sparsity indicators will he use? Does his announcement mean that the county councils network was right all along?

Will the right hon. Gentleman explain how his proposals for capping will contribute to transparency, accountability and fairness in council finances? How will removing capping criteria from the public domain achieve that? What does he think is an acceptable council tax increase, given that last year's increase was nearly 9 per cent? Perhaps he can tell the House what he means by "self-restraint".

Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that his proposals for council tax benefit will have the same effect as capping? Will they not transfer the cost of social security benefits from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the council tax payer? Will he give a figure to show by how much he expects the change will lead to an increase in council tax? The Deputy Prime Minister has today promised jam tomorrow. Ordinary families, as he describes them, know that the bills will arrive next year.

Mr. Prescott: I thank the right hon. Lady for her opening remarks. Her history and her comparisons between this Government and the previous Administration seem to be at variance with the facts. In her area, Norfolk council will receive from the settlement 6.2 per cent., which is 6.2 per cent. more than it received last year, whereas, in the final year of the Tory Administration, it received an increase of 1.2 per cent. King's Lynn and West Norfolk district council will receive 3.6 per cent. more this year. When she was in the Cabinet, it received 1 per cent. less. The record should be made clear.

The Department of Transport, Environment and the Regions has almost 20 per cent. of the Government's legislative burden. We have at least three Bills on local authorities. Given what is going on, we may have more time in the programme for even more legislation. The Department's heavy legislative burden is about modernising local authorities and making the distribution of resources fairer. My statement has shown that the changes in the SSAs, which make some adjustments in the calculations for individual county areas, will create a fairer means of distribution and fairer criteria for the children's services. The changes has been generally welcomed—

Mrs. Shephard: I welcomed it, too.

Mr. Prescott: I am glad that the right hon. Lady welcomes it; that is a step forward. I readily accept, as I am sure she does, that it is extremely difficult to progress further on education and cost adjustments and to find solutions to those problems. We shall continue to work on those problems; the period of stability under the three-year programme will, I believe, help us in that.

The right hon. Lady mentioned resources in rural areas and the sparsity principle. When her local council recently made representations to me, I was not able to say that we had accepted the principle, but I am glad to confirm today that we have. That has made for fairer adjustment in some of the changes that we have made to last year's settlement. That means that rural areas will get more. I do not know the exact amounts, but I will write to the right hon. Lady to give the figures to her. Some of the details of the consultation paper are in the Library, and I am sure that she will try to make some assessment of them.

The fire service settlement takes account of the pressures facing local government services, including pay and prices, as well as the opportunities to make savings. There is plenty of room for improvement in efficiency, which best value will be able to identify. I am sure that Opposition Members will want to reinforce that point.

With regard to pensions and whether the settlement deals with the provision of an estimated £130 million to take into account the Chancellor's changes on pensions, I can tell the right hon. Lady that that figure is included in the settlement.

Mr. Giles Radice (North Durham): I thank my right hon. Friend for his settlement, and for the sympathetic way in which he has listened to my colleagues and me when we have described the problems of the hardest-hit areas. Will he take it from me that the settlement for Durham is fair and takes account of the level of need?

Mr. Prescott: Yes, that is at the heart of what we are doing—although we have not completed our work—and it is what the SSAs are about. In developing new criteria, there will be many changes from one area to another, and there will be many challenges in this House from those who are affected by those changes. The question from the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) about rural areas and urban areas is a classic example of that. There is an overall increase of 5.1 per cent. for the more sparsely populated areas, compared to 4.8 per cent. for England as a whole.

Clearly, we have a lot to do, and we shall take into account—as promised in our manifesto—fairer ways of dealing with the local government settlement. I must give notice that, although I am quite prepared to look at how we might find a proper solution to the criteria problem—indeed, I am doing so—a reform of local government financing is a far better way of dealing with it.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement, and for the opportunity to see it in advance.

Liberal Democrats believe that the current system leaves council tax payers unclear about whom to blame when their council tax bills go up and when their services are cut. Is it not the case that the settlement continues a long tradition of smoke-and-mirror tactics so that local people are, once again, paying more but getting less for it? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is a £1.6 billion gap in his plans—as estimated by the Local Government Association—which councils can bridge only by council tax rises and cuts in services?

Last year's settlement left social services struggling to balance their budgets, with two out of three councils increasing charges and restricting access to care services. Does not this settlement mean that children, the elderly and disabled people will face a real-terms cut in care services? Is it not the case that the number of primary school classes with more than 30 pupils rose as a result of last year's settlement? Will class sizes go up or down as a result of the settlement?

Is not the Secretary of State's plan to claw back council tax benefit nothing more than capping by another name, but a cruder form of capping than the crude and universal form of capping that he says that he wishes to replace? Does he accept also that his decision not to pre-signal his capping plans has left councils in a position where they will have to play Russian roulette with people's services?

In our view, this is a bad settlement. It represents a victory for the control-freak tendency in the Government and another defeat for local democracy.

Mr. Prescott: Liberals always amaze me—that is why I never sit down with them. Never mind the smoke and mirrors—let us see what the hon. Gentleman's authority is getting, and people can then make the judgment. Sutton council is getting a 5.5 per cent. increase this year. That is certainly above the average that we have mentioned. Sutton is to get an extra £4.3 million for education—an increase of 5.9 per cent. Even the most inefficient local authority should be able to provide a better education system on that. It is receiving an extra £2.1 million for social services—a real and substantial increase of almost 8 per cent.

The settlement represents the best deal that Sutton has had for at least seven years. That is a matter of fact. To give me all the rubbish that the hon. Gentleman gave me about the settlement may be all right as Liberal propaganda and rhetoric, but it has little to do with the facts and does not address the real problems involved in providing good services.

The hon. Gentleman was concerned about real-terms costs. He should take into account the change from compulsory competitive tendering to best value. We believe—time will tell—that best value will bring increased efficiencies, and many business men have come to the same conclusion in their negotiations with local authorities. The hon. Gentleman has not taken those benefits into account.

Class sizes are falling, and we shall continue with that policy, giving more resources to education than ever before. What is more, that level of resources has been guaranteed for three years—something that no Government have done before.

I have made the distinction before between crude capping and the sophisticated Prescott version. Hon. Members may object to the term "sophisticated". I am trying to make the point that Governments cannot be indifferent to the level of expenditure by local authorities. We have given a fair and generous settlement—the best that local authorities have had for many years—but, if an authority is prepared to ignore that fact and say that it will spend more, we have a system under which it is allowed to raise the money—as was not the case under crude capping—but it will not receive all the public grant that would otherwise have come from Government.

Authorities can make that choice, but if their spending reaches a level that is totally unacceptable, I have a responsibility to intervene to protect the council tax payer. At that point, I can instigate a form of crude capping, but I do not have to limit it to one year. I can review the expenditure in the year that has gone—which I could not do before—and consider the phasing over the next few years. I can take those factors into account, so it is indeed a more sophisticated approach.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I thank my right hon. Friend for both the command that he shows of an immensely complicated brief and the sensitive way in which he is going about the reform of a major area of our public finances. Is he aware that most local authorities will now be considering in detail how the settlement will affect them individually? If some find that their settlement is way out of line with the generality, will they be able at some stage to come to him, or to my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Housing, to make a plea for transitional arrangements over and above what he has announced this afternoon?

Mr. Prescott: I thank my right hon. Friend for his comments. I do not believe that councils should be encouraged in any way to spend more than we have allowed for in the settlement—we think that the 5.5 per cent. is a very good settlement and that the allocations have been fair—but I am always ready to accept that there are sometimes exceptional circumstances, and we must take those into account in the process. My hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Housing will hold discussions with the local authorities in the consultation process. I recognise that there may be exceptional—and I mean exceptional—circumstances, and I am taking extra powers to be able to deal with them as I have suggested.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): Has the Deputy Prime Minister revisited his decisions of last year about day visitors and tourists in inner London, the consequences of which have already provoked criticisms from the Government office for London?

Mr. Prescott: No, we have not done so at this stage. I am aware of the criticisms that have been made. I would like to reflect on the matter and give the right hon. Gentleman a fuller response in a letter.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): I thank my right hon. Friend for his support for local government. At least we now have Ministers who believe in local government, as the statement shows. The abolition of compulsive competitive tendering is welcome. A great deal of time was spent by local government officers working out the framework for CCT, and in many instances that was a waste of resources. I feel sure that efficiency savings will be made.

Will my right hon. Friend accept that my local authority of Wakefield suffered for many years under the Tories? We were deprived of finance for education, when it cost £1,000 less to teach a child in my constituency than it did to teach a child in some Tory London boroughs. I hope that we will see an adjustment, and the members of the Special Interest Group of Metropolitan Authorities will welcome the statement. We hope that we will have the opportunity in the next three years to build on the relationship that has been developed in the past 18 months between my right hon. Friend and his colleagues to ensure that the progress in local government that he has outlined today is maintained.

Mr. Prescott: I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks. On CCT, the evidence is overwhelming that least cost does not necessarily mean best value or the most efficient way to do things, and that is why we are implementing best value. We have been grateful for the support of many local businesses which have also come to that conclusion. Many difficult problems are associated with the education criteria for SSAs and we should not underestimate that. The problem is often seen as a north-south one, but that is not entirely the case. The difficulties faced in some London areas are very real, but people do not always understand that problems faced in the northern areas are also very real. I readily accept that any formula will affect both north and south, and, if anybody has come to a different conclusion, they are wrong. It is a difficult process, but perhaps the best solution is the one that we are working on with the local government associations for a radical reform of local government financing.

colleagues lambasted the previous Government over the area cost adjustment and what were regarded as the inequalities in the formula? Does he now accept that his failure to address either additional educational needs or the area cost adjustment, which are the two most disfiguring elements of the formula, means that we are stuck with the problem for the next three years, not just the next year? Will he confirm that the additional money for health and education is not hypothecated and, according to the tradition of local government expenditure, it is at the discretion of local authorities how they spend the additional money?

Mr. Prescott: Yes, it is not hypothecated and it is up to the discretion of local authorities. That concern was expressed about the extra education funds announced last year, which were funded by Government and were not an extra burden on the rate support grant. I am glad to say that more than 80 per cent. of local authorities agreed that the money should go to education. Some did not, and I regret that, but most local authorities recognised the priority even though we had no statutory enforcement or hypothecation. That approach was successful.

On area cost adjustments, the right hon. Gentleman's criticisms would have had more conviction if he had attempted to make changes during his period of office in government. He may have been sympathetic to change, but the Government were not. I do not know whether the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk has any further thoughts on the matter, but she nodded her head when the difficulties were mentioned. I do not doubt that the difficulties are real. When people examine the balance between local authorities in the settlement on children's services, they will see changes in the distribution between north and south. Criticisms can be made, but it is not easy to make the distribution and it is not a simple matter of north-south.

As we said in our manifesto, the settlement must be fairer. We have achieved that in one area, but not in the other two. That is not because we have not done anything—my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Housing has had many discussions on the issue and 21 detailed formulas for the area cost adjustment have been put before us. Many hon. Members have expressed their fears about changes to the area cost adjustment, but we will not funk it. We must have a fairer distribution and Ministers can defend their actions only on the basis that they are fair. What we have at the moment is not fair, but I want to achieve a consensus on the changes and that will take a little longer. I have already told the House that it will take at least three years, not one.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his generous settlement. He has recognised the needs of coalfield areas, as he showed in his announcement yesterday in Peterlee. Of the 20 authorities originally capped in 1990 under the current system, 30 per cent. were coalfield authorities. Because of the flawed SSA methodology, those areas have always been behind in revenue support grant settlements. May I urge my right hon. Friend to seek greater fairness in distribution, and ask him to apply a degree of flexibility to council tax benefit rebates?

The position of the coalfield authorities—particularly Barnsley, my own authority—makes it likely that their council tax increases will be above the guideline figure that my right hon. Friend has announced today, and they will be affected by the loss of rebate. Will my right hon. Friend be flexible in considering areas, such as mine, that will be caught out by that?

Mr. Prescott: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks, but the target has been set at 4.5 per cent., and the settlement for his area is 7.2 per cent. As he recognised, that is quite generous, and it will deal with some special problems. In making my announcement about the coalfield settlement at Peterlee yesterday, I tried to establish a new fund to deal with coalfield area problems, and the money announced is extra money, £350 million over and above what we are settling today. The same was the case with the new deal housing programme and with education funding. Local authorities will receive not only the money that I am announcing today; many settlements of huge amounts of resources will be used to meet specific problems. The settlement through the SSA on children has meant that the coalfields have been taken more into account, because that had discriminated against them. My hon. Friend appears to be telling me that his council will be spending more, but I ask him to remind the council that there will still be Prescott's sophisticated capping.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): The right hon. Gentleman has described his settlement as the most generous in history. That certainly is not the case for Essex, which falls £28 million short just of standing still. If the settlement is generous for the rest of the country, that generosity is built on the backs of the elderly who are being taken care of in social services in Essex and of our schoolchildren.

Mr. Prescott: I am having considerable difficulty in taking into account the fact that hon. Members are saying the settlement is not fair or generous. Essex county council will receive a 5.7 per cent. increase this year, and I must make the inevitable comparison with what happened during the final year of the previous Administration in 1995-96 when Essex received only 2.7 per cent. However the assessment is measured—by percentage or in absolute terms—it is a fair one, and we have settled not for one year, but for three. Considerable resources will go to the local authorities.

The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) is an expert in local government, and he spent considerable time in it, but I cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, accept his argument that the authorities are not benefiting. Essex alone will receive £27.6 million for education, an increase of 5.6 per cent., although, as I recall, the council did not spend on education all the money it received for education last time round, but chose instead to spend it on roads. I think that that was the wrong priority, but the authority had the right to do so.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): My right hon. Friend went to Peterlee yesterday to announce the £350 million package for the coalfield areas, and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) has said, that will intertwine with changes to the SSA. I have listened to some of the figures that my right hon. Friend has trotted out today, and have heard that Norfolk will receive 6 per cent., that the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) is getting 5.5 per cent. and that another area represented on the Opposition Benches is also getting 6 per cent. I am beginning to think that Derbyshire might have won the lottery, although probably not.

In order to repair damage to the coalfields, there must be a redistributive element to SSAs, and it must go along with the package that my right hon. Friend announced yesterday in order to ensure—this is the principal thing that he must do—that we do not lose jobs. May I have his assurance that that will be a continuing theme so that we can repair the tremendous damage that the Tories did to the coalfield areas?

Mr. Prescott: I can assure my hon. Friend that many people are employed by local authorities. At a time when the private sector is perhaps thinking of cutting back, thank goodness local authorities still have the resources from the Government to provide local services which, at the same time, provides jobs. That is not an unusual situation between the private and public sectors in the development of a cyclical economy.

My hon. Friend said that some local authorities have received a settlement of 5.5 per cent. I doubt whether he would describe Derbyshire's settlement as a lottery, but it did get 6.1 per cent. It is a good example of the extra resources announced yesterday in our coalfield community policy, which involves an extra £345 million to deal with the damage brought about by the savage attack on those communities by the previous Administration. We are now trying to deal with that by increasing housing and jobs and by improving the environment in those areas, particularly in Derbyshire.

I am aware of the call that Derbyshire's local authority made at the conference yesterday for a connection to the M1 motorway. That is being considered and, as the local authority pointed out, that is important for the development of jobs in Derbyshire. We are happy to do all that we can to help meet the criteria that my hon. Friend has laid out.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley): This year's announcement, together with last year's, hides a large redistribution of funds to crony councils. Some of the councils that are not receiving this shift in funding will have some difficulties. They will be looking at their council tax and at what the Secretary of State calls Prescott's sophisticated capping. Perhaps we could rename that Prescott's subjective capping. What sort of percentage increase would make the Secretary of State think of looking at subjective capping?

Mr. Prescott: It works to a formula. It is not a question of whether or not I like a council. The House would not allow me to exercise such a prejudice. Although that happened under the previous Administration, we would not want to do it because it would not be fair. We must have fair criteria. For every half percentage point over 4.5 per cent., there will be a loss of Government grant for local services, equivalent to about one eighth. One can calculate that, if it went over by 4 per cent., there would be a full penalty and all the grants could be lost. By that stage, I would have intervened because the local authority would have to consult me. I would then exercise a judgment about whether to move to Prescott capping.

There may be a real and justified reason for moving from 4.5 to 5 per cent.—that was mentioned earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). From the figure of 4.5 per cent. up to the total cap, we are prepared to let the local authority spend as it wishes, but we are not prepared to give grant for any expenditure over that amount. I think that that is fair. Local authorities can make their own judgment about what to spend—crude capping prevented that, but this system does not—and that can continue until it reaches a stage that I believe is excessive. That is what I have just announced.

Surrey county council has a 4.6 per cent. increase whereas, under the Conservative Government, it received 1.7 per cent. Obviously, I have a little slip of paper for every hon. Member who stands up pointing out what happened to their local authority under the Conservative Government. It is a fair point to make and most criticism from Opposition Members can be judged on that alone. There is a change when one moves from Government to Opposition and from Opposition to Government and it is far better for us to be on the Government Benches.

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): My right hon. Friend has been clear and determined in his support for coalfield communities and his aspirations to help coalfield local authorities such as Nottinghamshire. Can he confirm that this is a good settlement for coalfield communities but, at the same time, accept a degree of regret that the big issues such as area cost adjustment and additional educational need have not yet been resolved? If my right hon. Friend waits for consensus on this issue among local authorities, he will be waiting for a long time. I hope that he will take a determined approach to resolve these issues.

Mr. Prescott: I accept that it will be difficult to achieve absolute consensus on any of those problems. The example of agreement that I gave to the House was not agreed by everybody. There is a time when one has to make a judgment. However, it is better to have a formula that does not involve open warfare, which, as my hon. Friend knows, is what we have seen in the House and in other places from time to time.

We can make advances, but we have not had sufficient time to do so. Over the next three years we shall make calculations and further extend discussions to find out how we might achieve that.

As I said—I still feel strongly about this—the solution may well be to try to find a better form of local government financing, but that is never an easy proposition, any more than standard spending assessments are easy—as anyone who observed the development of the poll tax will know. We shall continue to try. We have had some success and we shall continue to work on the more difficult problems.

On the settlement for the coalfield communities, Nottinghamshire got a 5.5 per cent. increase, which it will view as an improvement. The coalfield communities settlement will benefit several areas, but it is very specific to those communities. The settlement was regarded as a welcome contribution in Peterlee. The change in the

[Mr. Prescott]

SSA relating to children's services has also benefited the coalfield areas because the old criteria tended to discriminate against them.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): I have a favour to ask of the Deputy Prime Minister—he will gather that I am desperate. Will he receive a delegation from Liberal Democrat-controlled Devon county council between now and February? The council has been lobbying for a meeting and his Department is usually quite generous about that. When he meets council representatives, will the Deputy Prime Minister ask them why the money that they have received from the centre for flood defences—there is a total underspend by the council of £1.3 million—is not being spent?

The Deputy Prime Minister will be aware of the devastation in my constituency in places such as Gittisham, Ottery St. Mary, Cullompton and Whimple. I declare an interest, in that I live there and I too was flooded out. The Deputy Prime Minister would save me having to raise the matter in an Adjournment debate. Devon county council hopes that it can persuade him to increase the money that he intends to give it. He could do my constituents a great favour in return by examining how the council controls the money that it receives and, in particular, how communities are disadvantaged by the way in which the council spends the money that it is allocated for flooding.

Mr. Prescott: The hon. Lady raises an important point, and it is one that we have considered. I do not know how the settlement affects Devon, but money has been put into accounts for several local authorities to deal with flooding. They have been claiming back money on the basis that there are funds in those accounts, but we shall now reimburse only the money that is spent. Several authorities have been burrowing away the money and not using it for flood defences.

Mrs. Browning: Yes, that is what the Liberal Democrat council has been doing.

Mr. Prescott: I take the hon. Lady's point. If that is what the Liberal Democrats have been doing, it is terribly disgusting. We are about to change that system. It is typical of the Liberals to hide the money and then call for more.

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on what will be seen as a fair settlement for Kent of 4.7 per cent. I congratulate him particularly on reserving judgment on removing the area cost adjustment, which he will know is a concern to boroughs such as mine in Dartford which stood to lose many of their services. When he gets round to the detailed and complex discussions on the area cost adjustment, will he take into account the great difficulties faced by borough councils that do not have social services and education in their budgets? Will he also recognise the significant pockets of deprivation that exist even in leafy areas such as Kent?

Mr. Prescott: We want to take those matters into account. I mentioned earlier, in regard to proposals made by county councils about using sparsity as a criteria, that we have taken that into account. Whether we are considering the provision of library services or elderly services, we have made an adjustment and it is reflected in the settlement today.

I can tell my hon. Friend that we have been discussing the area cost adjustment ever since we came to power. We have narrowed down proposals to 21 formulae. I am not yet convinced that we have one that I can bring to the House and say with confidence, "This is right and proper and it is the fairest method," so I have not come here today to make further advances on that. My hon. Friend can rest assured that the services provided by local authorities will be taken into account in assessments.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Last year, Oxfordshire county council managed only by moving a substantial chunk of education spending to prop up personal social services spending, and by substantially hiking the council tax bill. What does the Deputy Prime Minister say to those in Oxfordshire who are worried that, this year, the settlement might result in another substantial hike in the council tax bill, and a substantial reduction in social service provision in the county?

Mr. Prescott: I recall people from Oxfordshire making a very similar case to me. It was a reasonable case. We had some disagreements about it, but I understood their problems, which resulted from the fact that the previous Administration gave them a very restricted contribution.

There is a great difference between the latest settlement and that made in the last year of the previous Administration. Oxfordshire county council gets a 3.8 per cent. increase in this year's settlement; in 1994-95, when the Tories were in government, the council got an increase of 0.5 per cent.—half a percentage point. No wonder Oxfordshire had problems providing services. That was the settlement that we inherited from the previous Administration.

This is our settlement—our judgment about fairness—and 3.8 per cent. compares very favourably with 0.5 per cent. under the hon. Gentleman's Administration. It means that Oxfordshire gets an extra £9.5 million for education. That is an increase of 4.6 per cent.—a substantial increase, which fairly represents the best deal that Oxfordshire has had for years.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): Although there is still a lot of work to be done on area cost adjustment and educational needs, I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the 5.4 per cent. increase overall in the total spending assessment, and on an increase which was said to be 7 per cent. in real terms over three years. I understand that Derbyshire county council will get a 6.1 per cent. increase, and that its police will get a 6.4 per cent. increase. There have been considerable problems in both areas. However, the figures are not great, given those for other district councils.

I understand that education provision is very much to the fore in connection with the county's position, but has the idea of enhancing the population figures been considered? North East Derbyshire district council suffers because it loses a considerable amount of money owing to the fact that people work in Sheffield and Chesterfield. That fact needs to be taken into account by the Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in assessing a fair settlement for the district council.

Mr. Prescott: This is another part of the argument about the criteria for SSAs and the area cost adjustment. Arguments about population will be considered, as will arguments about many other factors. Views differ, and I should like more information and more discussion before I reach a conclusion.

Each settlement takes into account the services that are provided by each authority, and the 6.1 per cent. for Derbyshire county council takes into account police services, which my hon. Friend rightly points out are being given 4.1 per cent. However, he must take into account the fact that the Home Secretary looks to the police for a 2 per cent. improvement in productivity this year. These settlements and accounts are based on efficiencies and productivity.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): On the face of it, the settlement for Gloucestershire county council looks generous, but it is based on smoke and mirrors. The education settlement is 1 per cent. below the national average, although Gloucestershire is already among the lowest-spending councils on education in the country. Our police settlement will involve a £1.5 million cut in the police budget. The council tax payers of Gloucestershire will suffer, because the council tax that they pay will increase by considerably more than the average of 4.5 per cent. If that is the case, will it not simply be a distribution from the shire counties of this country to the northern urban counties, paid for by the council tax payers of the shire counties?

Mr. Prescott: Another claim for smoke and mirrors. At least, before giving his analysis, the hon. Gentleman felt obliged to say that the settlement looked generous. It not only looks generous; it is generous, whatever it is compared with. The 5.7 per cent. increase that Gloucestershire is receiving is far better than the awards in many years under the previous Administration, and far better than was given last year.

I know that the hon. Gentleman is not criticising the education settlement, but I am sure that people in Gloucestershire will welcome the fact that there will be £12.1 million more for education—one of our priorities. The hon. Gentleman appears to be arguing that there will be a shortfall in police funding, but he is not taking into account the agreement between police authorities and the Home Secretary on the efficiency and productivity improvements to be expected this year. That, of course, runs right through the local authority settlements. I am not simply giving money to the local authorities and telling them to get on with it.

Local authority modernisation means giving best value. I expect services to be delivered more efficiently and effectively, with greater productivity; otherwise I am wasting money that I could be providing for other services. That is what best value is about and what I intend to bring about. It is not smoke and mirrors, but a real increase and a benefit to the hon. Gentleman's constituents. It is a pity that he did not finish by saying that, on further reflection, it was a good settlement—but we live in hope.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): This is indeed a good settlement. Will my right hon. Friend say a word or two about the other services block, which is important to small district councils like mine in Pendle? In particular, environmental health officers have new responsibilities for monitoring air quality, policing food establishments and so on. I want to be reassured that the settlement will ensure that the money goes where it is needed in those front-line environmental health departments.

Mr. Prescott: We have made clear what the standard spending assessments are, what the services are and what money will be provided for them. The local authority can make a judgment about how the money is spent and what it considers to be its front-line services. We cannot hypothecate or ring-fence, as we said before about education. We sincerely hope that local authorities will use their good judgment to spend on those services, based on the SSAs. If they have any doubt, they can talk to my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Housing, who will be going through the consultation procedures on the matter. With regard to the extra burdens that will be placed on my hon. Friend's Pendle authority, they will be taken into account, but the judgments will ultimately be made by the local authority.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): Last year, the Deputy Prime Minister referred to Kingston as a "leafy borough" and went on to announce one of the worst settlements for our borough for many years, resulting in cuts across the board. If this is indeed one of the most generous settlements in the past seven years, does he realise that the others have been really mean? Does he realise that there are pockets of genuine need and deprivation in boroughs such as Kingston and other boroughs in London? Will he confirm that as his SSA changes are phased in over the next few years, London boroughs such as Kingston will lose out?

Mr. Prescott: I still think that the settlement is generous. My reference to leafy Kingston recalls the time when I fought my first election as a candidate in Hull, which was Kingston-upon-Hull, against the representative of Kingston-upon-Thames, who later became the Chancellor and then Lord Lamont. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that compared to Hull, Kingston-upon-Thames looks rather leafy.

We want fair criteria for the distribution of resources. The settlement for Kingston is a 4.8 per cent. increase, with £2.5 million for education. That is not chickenfeed, by any measure. The changes in the SSA, some of which we have already introduced, as I told the House, are required for a fairer distribution, whether to meet educational needs or the area cost adjustment. We are working on that, and I have told the House what I intend to do.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): I welcome my right hon. Friend's decision not to change the additional education needs formula for this year. In London, we recognise that there are anomalies in the formula, but we have special problems—for example, in my local authority, Barnet, a substantial number of children have English as a second language. I assure my right hon. Friend that in London we are committed to working towards a consensus to sort out that difficult issue.

Mr. Prescott: My memory did not serve me well when I was trying to think of all the local authorities and extract the information on Barnet.

[Mr. Prescott]

Educational needs, like area cost adjustments, create difficulties in assessing the differences between various parts of the country, which are often identified as London and the rest, or as north and south. We will take into account the need for a fairer settlement. As my hon. Friend knows, the present settlement is 4.2 per cent. and almost £7 million more for education. I believe that he will welcome that. We must await the final results of the work that we are doing on the new assessments for educational needs.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Salary costs in Chippenham, which is in my constituency and which does not benefit from the area cost adjustment, are precisely the same as salary costs in Newbury, just over the border in Berkshire, which does so benefit. Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that, owing to the very nature of the area cost adjustment, he will never achieve consensus? Those close to London will want to keep it, while those away from London will want to do away with it.

Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that a tax is being imposed on areas such as mine? Is not the only clear way to deal with the area cost adjustment to get rid of it once and for all?

Mr. Prescott: That may well be a consideration. I do not necessarily agree with it, but such suggestions have been made by various parties that approach the matter from different angles. They all have solutions that favour them, but do not necessarily favour the other areas affected by the criterion.

Last year, my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) made a similar point about the need to recognise the difference between boundaries, and the effects of what is done. It is a real problem, which I cannot ignore, and we shall take it into account. Once we begin to draw lines in relation to different criteria, there is always an interface; but there is always an interface between the rich and the poor. We must make a judgment.

Wiltshire county council is receiving an extra 6 per cent. this year. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman did not criticise that amount, because I need not go on to say that, in the last year of their Administration, the Tories provided only 3 per cent.

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the poker face that he managed to maintain when he came to Norfolk last week to announce the publication of a White Paper on the issue, and on the pleasant and straightforward way in which he and his colleague heard the many representations from the county.

My right hon. Friend has already given the figures for Norfolk. As the former chairman of the education committee who had to implement the last grant settlement under the last Government, I know how much better the present chairman will feel when he sees those figures tonight.

What my right hon. Friend has said is evidence of new Labour's willingness to look afresh at issues that have plagued Norfolk for 18 years. However, although this may be a good settlement for the three years to come, I join those who agree with my right hon. Friend that we need to consider the establishment of a more comprehensive system, which is seen to be fair. I hope that the three years will be used for that purpose.

Mr. Prescott: I thank my hon. Friend for what he has said—especially his reference to Friday's meeting in Norfolk, which involved Members of Parliament on both sides of the House. It was an excellent meeting, attended by members of local authorities and representatives of the agriculture industry. I announced the Government's intention to publish a rural White Paper to examine the problems. As I have said, I thought that the meeting was excellent, and I believe that everyone left it with the same impression.

My hon. Friend has raised an important point, which was borne in on me again in Norfolk. The county made clear its feeling that it had suffered under the previous Administration, because more money went to the shire districts than to the county. To be fair, I must add that more was still going to the county, but it was distributed differently owing to the different formulae used for the districts and the county. The changes that I have announced will reverse that, to the extent that more will go to the county, because of the definition of the services and the sparsity criteria that we have accepted. In any event, whether the money goes to the county or the districts—I know that different services are involved—there will be more and better resources than ever before, however they are distributed.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I did not see the hon. Gentleman in the Chamber at 3.30 pm. Has he been present throughout the statement and the subsequent exchanges?

Mr. Winterton: I am afraid not. I had another engagement in the building. I was going to apologise, if you called me, Madam Speaker, for being absent for part of the statement.

Madam Speaker: I do not call any Member who has been absent for any part of a statement. I have been making that clear for some time.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): I thank my right hon. Friend and his colleagues for the care with which they have listened to representations over the past few months, and in particular, for their response in regard to additional educational needs and the arguments for retaining ethnicity criteria.

As my right hon. Friend knows, in the borough that I represent 106 languages are spoken, and in our schools English is the second language for 61 per cent. of children. That makes my right hon. Friend's proposals particularly welcome. Will he consider the ethnicity criteria changes in personal social services? I believe that they will have an extremely deleterious effect on my borough of Brent, and a number of others. I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend and his colleagues agreed to meet representatives from my local authority, and others who are affected, to consider the matter further.

Mr. Prescott: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the way in which he raises this matter, because it reminds

hon. Members on both sides of the House that different authorities will be affected if the criteria are changed. There is a legitimate complaint and concern here; however fair we have been in finding that formula, there will be legitimate grievances against the conclusions that we have drawn.

Brent is certainly one of those authorities—the SSA increase is 3 per cent., and my hon. Friend has explained the reasons why. I tried to explain them to a number of northern councillors at a recent meeting. They all think that this is a north-south business, but we have to point out that poverty, whether in leafy Kingston or wherever, is in all our areas. We all have areas of poverty and deprivation, which the House will want to try to help.

My hon. Friend has a very good point, and I am well aware of it. Although there will be better settlements in respect of capital receipts—his area will benefit—that does not mitigate his central point. When we make changes in these criteria, we cannot always assume that there will be proper distribution, in the way that we want. The criteria can work effectively against what we intend. I think that that has happened in Brent, and I should be delighted to meet my hon. Friend to talk about the conclusions of this.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): Last but not least, may I also thank my right hon. Friend for the many millions of pounds extra that he has announced in the settlement for the Bradford district? In particular, will he confirm that one of the most significant aspects of his announcement is the three-year planning period, which will encourage efficiency and modernisation of local services? At last we will be able to get that long-term planning into local government finance.

Mr. Prescott: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. Our judgment was that a three-year expenditure programme would be a lot easier for local authorities, and I think that they generally feel that they can now plan over three years. Although that is a longer period, it gives considerable time to examine area cost adjustments, educational needs and those other matters that we are concerned with on SSAs.

I recall—I chance my arm on this—that the authority that my hon. Friend represents has shown that, under the new criteria, it will get less in some of these areas, under the formulae on children. There has been argument about north versus south, but a southern authority and a northern authority will both be affected by the criteria—which belies the assumption that this is a simple north-south issue.

Millennium Compliance (Quarterly Review)

4.38 pm

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): Since the previous quarterly review, which I announced on 9 September, we have continued to monitor closely the progress that is being made by Departments and agencies in tackling the millennium bug. We have also taken steps to improve the quality of information about those key parts of the wider public sector which, for the first time, we included in the review last time. I have arranged for all completed questionnaires to be placed in the Library of the House and published on the internet.

The Government are leading by example in making public our plans, and our openness on the issue has been much welcomed by business and other organisations that need to prepare for the bug themselves.

It is important to recognise that the millennium bug is not simply an information technology issue, but has to be approached and managed as a business issue—a threat to every organisation's ability to deliver its core services and carry out its core functions. Failures in external suppliers or partners could have an impact on Departments and agencies, and that needs to be recognised and taken into account in planning for 2000.

Over the past quarter, we have been placing increasing emphasis on business continuity, including supply chain issues and contingency planning. To reinforce the importance of the issue, I have asked all Departments to ensure that they have initial business continuity plans, including contingency plans, in place by January 1999.

Slightly more than a year has passed since the Government first published details of Departments' and agencies' plans for tackling the bug, and this is the fourth quarterly review of those plans. It is clear that steady and determined progress is being made by the Government as a whole in tackling the bug, particularly in respect of business-critical systems. The overall cost estimate remains stable at about £400 million.

Three quarters of Departments and agencies have now completed 50 per cent. or more of the necessary correction work on business-critical IT systems. That figure is up from half the Departments and agencies in the last quarter. Two fifths have completed 90 per cent. or more of the work, which doubles the figure for the last quarter. I am pleased in particular by the quality of the programmes and the progress of the Department of Social Security, the Department for Education and Employment, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise. I am encouraged that a number of the smaller agencies are reporting completion of all the necessary correction and testing of their business-critical IT systems.

Despite the generally good progress that is being made across central Government, and the overall quality of Departments' year 2000 programmes, the review has highlighted a few organisations that have individual systems with late completion dates or whose targets have slipped. They are the Medicines Control Agency, the Inland Revenue, the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, and the Departments of Finance and Personnel and Health and Social Services within the Northern Ireland Office. I have written to colleagues to raise these concerns.

[Mrs. Margaret Beckett]

In view of the importance of the armed forces to national security and the wider public interest, their rectification programmes are a particular priority. It is vital that the progress made to date be sustained.

The last review highlighted concern about progress in tackling problems in telecommunications and embedded systems. Considerable progress has been made in those areas over the past quarter, and almost all Departments and agencies have now completed their inventories of these systems. The target completion dates for work on business-critical telecommunications systems are now comparable to those for critical IT systems in most Departments. However, the target completion dates for critical embedded systems are slightly later on average, mainly because of the difficulty in identifying all vulnerable systems, and the reliance of Departments on suppliers to provide solutions. I shall be raising this issue with colleagues.

In most cases, Departments and agencies have also had assessments of their year 2000 programmes carried out by their own internal auditors. Some of the larger Departments—for example, the Department of Social Security and the Ministry of Defence—have also used independent external consultants as a further check.

I am reassured that there is little evidence of a serious, widespread IT skills shortage across central Government. Only nine of the 80 returns reported skills shortages, and those were smaller agencies on the whole. A number of Departments have taken practical steps to retain staff where necessary, in the form of a recruitment and retention allowance.

There has been real progress in tackling supply chain issues. A large majority of Departments have now identified and contacted their key suppliers, and report an improved level of response from their suppliers.

Over the last quarter, we have also been working with organisations within the wider public sector to improve the quality of information in their returns. I am particularly pleased with the returns for the BBC, British Nuclear Fuels, and the police and fire services, which give us a far more accurate picture of preparations in these key areas. The returns for British Nuclear Fuels, the BBC, the Civil Aviation Authority, including National Air Traffic Services, London Transport, the Bank of England, and the Post Office show that all are continuing to make good progress.

The Environment Agency has a key role in flood defence and pollution prevention and control. The agency is particularly dependent on embedded systems, but its current return shows that work on two of its critical systems is not scheduled to be completed until the second half of 1999. This is a cause for concern, and I have written to the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to raise this issue.

Reports by police forces in England and Wales show that, on the whole, progress is satisfactory. However, in a number of cases, completion of work on business-critical systems is not expected before the last quarter of 1999. The Home Office will be working with the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Police Information Technology Organisation to see to what extent these target dates could be brought forward. In addition to the cumulative report that we are publishing today, each force is also publishing today its response to our questionnaire on the United Kingdom police website. Police forces in Scotland are also making satisfactory progress, and all work on business-critical systems should be completed by the end of the third quarter 1999. ACPO Scotland will be publishing the returns from individual forces on its website.

Her Majesty's inspectorate of fire services has set up a task group to lead work in addressing the bug throughout the service and to ensure that brigades take the necessary action. It will urgently address the needs of those brigades that are giving the most cause for concern. Fire brigades in Scotland are well advanced and all compliance work should be completed in good time.

The details of the most recent quarterly monitoring returns from all NHS trusts and health authorities in England are being published on the internet today. The returns show that steady progress continues throughout the NHS as a whole. However, the review also showed that a few trusts and authorities are lagging behind in their preparations for the bug. Again, that causes concern and is being followed up urgently by the NHS Executive regional offices.

The estimated cost of dealing with the year 2000 problem in the NHS now stands at about £320 million, a slight increase on the previous quarter's estimate of £310 million. The NHS in Scotland and Wales is also making satisfactory progress. Quarterly reports of progress throughout the Scottish health service are available on the Scottish Health website.

The results of the latest NHS review are consistent with the Audit Commission's recent analysis of progress throughout the NHS, which was published on 11 November and entitled "Time Marches On." The Audit Commission's report commented that many NHS organisations have made "significant progress" over the past six months, but noted that a small number were lagging behind.

The Audit Commission also reported on the progress of local government throughout England and Wales in "Time Marches On." That is expanded on in analysis that it published today as part of this quarterly report. It shows that, although authorities that were already making steady progress are continuing to catch up on the benchmark, the proportion of authorities that have not completed an inventory of their IT and embedded systems is unchanged from the previous statement.

That is a source of considerable concern. The Local Government Association and Local Government Management Board have increased their efforts to engage local authorities at all levels through regional meetings and guidance. The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions will discuss with them and the Audit Commission how best to target assistance to areas that are the highest priority and where the greatest difficulties are being experienced, particularly as shown in the report on district councils. The appointment of a full-time year 2000 co-ordinator by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities in October is helping to ensure that Scottish local authorities are making consistent progress.

Looking at the overall picture, I believe that good progress continues to be made throughout central government and the wider public sector in tackling the millennium bug. However, I have identified a number of areas where there are key concerns. The Government will pursue progress rigorously in those areas over the coming quarter.

The Government continue to take the millennium bug extremely seriously. Little over a year remains until the century date change and we will maximise our use of the remaining time to ensure that we are in the best possible shape to meet the millennium. We have pursued that objective since we took office; we will continue to do so.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): I thank the right hon. Lady for her statement. In view of the importance of the issue, the Opposition welcome regular quarterly progress reports to the House. It is like old times being able to ask her a few questions about how progress is developing.

Labour politicians think that their job is managing the media, rather than the Government. Nowhere has that been more obvious than in their mismanagement of the millennium bug. [Laughter.] Labour Members should not laugh because this is a serious problem which the Government are not grappling with.

As the executive director of Taskforce 2000 has said:

"The public sector is in trouble. It has been slow to get to grips with this and now is forced to engage in damage limitation."

His report found a lack of money committed to the task, predicted, in his words, death by 1,000 cuts for some public services, and concluded that Departments have left action desperately late, with inadequate testing.

Reading between the lines, I think that today's statement confirms that. The Taskforce 2000 report was endorsed and welcomed by none other than the right hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), who, until recently, was helping the right hon. Lady in government to sort out the problem.

The Government have alternated between panic and complacency. The Prime Minister told us:

"by treating this as an emergency, we can make Britain one of the world's best prepared countries".

Then the public sector under ministerial control went to sleep and fell far behind, as we heard yet again today.

We have been told by the Secretary of State for Scotland in a leaked letter that there could be substantial disruption to public services in a just over a year's time. He warns that the Army should be on standby to sort out the mess. Then the Leader of the House pops up to tell us that the problem has been overstated; chaos has been postponed by a soundbite.

Meanwhile, we learn bit by bit of the depressing reality of a public sector far from ready for the next century. Nine Departments are reported as being way behind in their preparations by Taskforce 2000. What is the use of a Department of State getting ready for the millennium by 2002 or 2003? How can the Department of Trade and Industry spend so much time and effort telling British business to get ready and then spectacularly fail to prepare itself, as the report reveals?

Over at the Foreign Office, the same report states:

"Only 'minimum functionality' will be available . . . around the turn of the century."

Some would say that under the Foreign Secretary, that would be business as usual—but we expect better and so do the public.

The Home Office programme is marked down as "very high risk", and that was before it knew that it had to make the decision on General Pinochet. At the Department of Media, Culture and Sport, we hear that "a dismayingly flippant approach to the problem"

Most worrying of all, the Secretary of State for Health refuses to guarantee that no patient will suffer as a result of the millennium bug. Will the right hon. Lady come clean and tell us whether all intensive care beds will work on the due date? Will all casualty departments operate properly? Will the power be on in all our homes and offices? Will flood defences work? Will all telephone and traffic systems function? When will the nine Departments that are so far behind catch up? How many bugbusters have been trained and appointed? Will all the 20,000 bug busters that we were promised be in place, and might that be before 2000? Why have the Government spent so little time and energy on sorting out the problems in the public sector while spinning so much to the private sector about the importance of the problem? What financial help will be given to health authorities and councils?

We left this problem in good order. There was plenty of time. People at the time said that we were thinking ahead. This Government have been in office for 18 months—the critical 18 months—and very little has happened. Britain is well behind, thanks to the disappointing performance of the public sector, presided over by the Government.

The Government have shown themselves incapable of managing this big changeover. The right hon. Lady should offer more than a few soundbites and platitudes. She should give a deeper, sober assessment of where the problem lies. She should pledge firm action to ensure that the public services work well in just over a year's time. Above all, she should offer the public a millennium guarantee that everything will work properly on 1 January 2000. If she is not prepared to, it will confirm our fears that the Government are way behind the clock and out of their depth.

Mrs. Beckett: I am sorry to say that although I have moved to a different Department, as far as the right hon. Gentleman is concerned nothing has changed. He talked about our managing the media, not governing, but his comments bore even less relation to reality than they used to when he was opposite me at the Department of Trade and Industry.

The right hon. Gentleman said that the previous Government left the programme in good order. I have assiduously refrained from saying it with quite this bluntness since I have been answering on this matter, but they left it in the hands of Taskforce 2000. Not a little of the venom behind some of the comments made by that organisation comes from the fact that it is no longer in its hands but in those of a different organisation headed by Don Cruickshank, who, in the right hon. Gentleman's day, was director general of the Office of Telecommunications. He commands a great deal of public confidence and support.

I have assiduously refrained from being as rude about Taskforce 2000 as it is about everyone else because we welcome anything that raises awareness and acceptance of the fact that there is a problem that all organisations need to recognise and tackle. However, the right hon. Gentleman would be wrong simply to take at face value what is said by Taskforce 2000, which, in some cases, straightforwardly misunderstands what is said. Moreover, in many other cases, events have very much moved on since its last report.

The right hon. Gentleman talked about the Government going to sleep on the matter. Far from doing any such thing, within three weeks of the general election, we commissioned the work that led to our being able to publish—for the very first time—the type of information that I am now updating in the quarterly statement. Moreover, the body that we established—Action 2000, under Don Cruickshank—has undertaken an independent assessment of the problems across the national infrastructure. We are the first country to make such an assessment. Therefore, far from being behind the game, as the right hon. Gentleman seeks to pretend, we are very much ahead of it.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned a leaked letter from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. As I am sure the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly well aware—as the letter did leak—my right hon. Friend was writing about issues involving the Territorial Army. He was as well aware as every other Minister that there is a normal procedure of preparedness and contingency planning, during which plans for civil authorities to call on aid are occasionally considered. He was only referring to the existence of such contingency plans, which are in permanent existence. They existed under the Conservative Government, and they are being updated now to deal with a foreseeable contingency—the arrival of the millennium date change.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned comments on the Department of Trade and Industry and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office that come mostly from Taskforce 2000, and demanded a whole string of guarantees. I shall deal with a couple of the points that he made.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the national health service. The NHS has made it plain and public that it is now making satisfactory or good progress. I have already pointed out to him that the Audit Commission—I have much more confidence in it than in Taskforce 2000—described the NHS's work as a well-managed programme and said that, of all the groups that it surveys, the NHS has made the best progress since the previous quarter. The fact is that 93 per cent. of NHS organisations are said to be making satisfactory or good progress towards compliance.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the bug busters programme and how many people have been trained. Almost 1,000 people have completed their training, and about 5,500 are now signed up in the programme, which represents a very sharp increase in demand. It took some time to establish the programme because it has to be a quality programme. There are 970-odd such programmes in place. There has been a substantial increase in the number of those signing up, and we hope that that will continue.

The right hon. Gentleman called for a deeper, sober assessment, and tried to pretend that the United Kingdom is falling behind. A few weeks ago, I attended an international conference on the matter that was attended also by people from Taskforce 2000, who I am sure were made aware of the views expressed at the conference. I was gratified—although, given that we are internationally vulnerable, slightly alarmed—to hear someone from the International Chamber of Commerce say that, of the 130 countries whose programmes she had studied, not only was the United Kingdom much the best prepared, but the British Government had done much more than any other Government to prepare.

In answer to the string of issues that the right hon. Gentleman raised, I tell him that every Department and agency has stated that its business-critical system-checking programmes will be completed and that business-critical systems will be rectified, tested and back in service by 31 December 1999.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East): Having worked in the information technology industry for 20 years, I get very depressed when I hear unfounded comments. Some of the Cassandra-like comments that have been made about impending doom are not helpful, particularly when there is a serious problem. Does my right hon. Friend agree that there are other key dates in 1999, starting with 1 January, that are just as critical? I used to programme things that finished on 9 September 1999 as the end of the record; in other words, we could shut down on 9 September 1999 and wake up again on 1 January 2000.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that the most likely scenario is not a major problem, but such a volume of minor individual problems that the help desk and emergency officers cannot cope? What is my right hon. Friend doing to counter that and give support to help desks? What are local authorities doing to prepare for that scenario?

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, whose comments are more informed than those of others might be. He is right to say that there is more than one critical date in 1999. I take some comfort from that, because it means that those small and medium businesses that continue to ignore the problem as if it will go away, despite everyone's best efforts, should have their minds concentrated as the effects of other dates are reported.

I also share my hon. Friend's view that all that we can be confident of seeking to deliver is an assurance that there will be no material disruption of public services and that the public will be inconvenienced as little as possible. We should have no credibility if we pretended that we could ensure that nothing would go wrong, particularly as Britain is an open economy and a nation that trades internationally.

My hon. Friend may be right in saying that many small matters will go wrong. We are trying to encourage all organisations to identify their areas of greatest vulnerability and to put in place contingency plans for the unforeseen impact of the millennium date change. My hon. Friend is right to identify the fact that the problem is more complex than it sometimes seems, but I hope that it is less sinister.

Mr. Nigel Jones (Cheltenham): I thank the right hon. Lady for her statement and for her courtesy in letting me see it beforehand. I compliment her on the vigour with which she is tackling the millennium problem, which many have identified as a serious matter. I thank her for her candour in identifying areas that have worrying delays, particularly in local government and NHS trusts.

Does the right hon. Lady recall that the Science and Technology Committee produced a report on the issue about a year ago? We commented that the Government expected local government, the NHS and other public services to find the money to fix the millennium bug from existing budgets and were not giving additional funding. With time running out and some delays having been identified, will she talk to her friends in the Cabinet and impress on her colleagues that emergency extra funding may be necessary, particularly for local government—perhaps through extra capital allowances?

To ensure that vital public services remain running at the start of the millennium, will the right hon. Lady have a word with the electricity generators and distributors and the insurance companies before her next quarterly statement? I have heard reports that some companies have found that their insurers will not insure them for their electricity supply over the relevant period. That was brought to my attention by Bird's Eye Walls, which will have tonnes of ice cream stuck in deep-freezes and will want to keep it cold.

Will the right hon. Lady also try to encourage the media not to pick up on scaremongering stories which are not helpful? The last thing that we want at the millennium is for people to panic and everybody to try to take money out of a hole in the wall or fill up the car with petrol. There may not be enough notes in circulation or refined petrol onshore for everyone to do that.

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks. I am familiar with the report that was published some time ago by the Committee on which he serves. He will appreciate that, since then, taking account of that report and other matters, the Government have completed their comprehensive spending review and allocated substantial extra resources to public services, including the health service and local government.

I welcome informed comment and helpful advice. We also picked up on the most recent Public Accounts Committee report and followed its suggestion that Departments should produce initial contingency plans by January 1999. We are certainly willing to take useful advice on these matters.

We are talking to the electricity generators. More important, we have encouraged suppliers of the key services to talk to one another, although that has taken a great deal of effort from Action 2000 and involved a great deal of time. When we began working on the problem, the main difficulty was that many key organisations and companies, perhaps on the advice of their lawyers, were refusing to reveal their plans, despite being dependent on one another. Through the infrastructure forum, we have finally begun to overcome that major problem.

My understanding is that most insurance companies—although there may be some specialists—will not offer cover on the millennium date change impact itself, which, they reasonably argue, is a foreseeable contingency. However, if one is insured against a freezer going down but that happens as a result of the date change, any loss may still be covered. It is important that people identify and seek to rectify any insurance problems, as I am sure happened in the example that the hon. Gentleman gave.

I whole-heartedly agree with the hon. Gentleman's final remark. We must strike a difficult balance. We want key people in major—or minor—organisations to take seriously their responsibilities for the continuity of the core services and businesses that they supply; they should not think that they can leave to the IT people what is a business continuity and management issue. If people panic, however, that will bring about the dangers that we are trying to avoid. A rather alarming statistic is floating about: if, across the world, about 6 per cent. of people try to take money out of the banks, a financial crisis could be precipitated. There is no need for such a crisis, so that is another important message.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Given her engineering background, my right hon. Friend is better placed than most of us to understand the importance of the issue for the nuclear industry. I refer her to the written answer given on 19 October in column 1015 by my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry on the software reliability unit headed by Professor Bev Littlewood and the proposals that it was to make to the Nuclear Safety Advisory Committee. Has the unit come to any conclusions?

What is being done about the terrible problems in eastern Europe? For example, there are terrible, scary stories that Smolensk in Kozlodoy—which has close relations with our nuclear industry—has a very relaxed attitude. Moreover, has anyone asked any searching questions about what is happening in the Soviet Arctic fleet? We are all going to suffer—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am having some difficulty in relating what the hon. Gentleman says to the matter before us.

Mr. Dalyell: The question whether we have responsibilities—with our technical expertise in terms of the millennium bug—to do something about eastern Europe and developing countries has been raised. I ask a general question: are we looking after our own self-interest by trying to help them?

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. I do not have the answer to his detailed question, but he may find that someone has that information at DTI questions tomorrow; otherwise, my hon. Friend can ask my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry to write to him.

My hon. Friend's example about the concern in the nuclear industry is a good one in terms of highlighting the fact that we should be sensible and responsible in terms of ensuring proper compliance, but not foolish. The Taskforce 2000 report, to which the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) referred, said that BNFL's programme provided no useful information and no basis for confidence. However, that judgment was made on the first return for the wider public sector bodies, and the company has now provided more substantial information.

The key issue is that BNFL's compliance strategy has been approved by all nuclear safety committees, and has been accepted by the nuclear installations inspector. We are doing everything we can. The Health and Safety Commission considers that the reports reveal a generally satisfactory position, but the HSC is keeping its evidence under review.

My hon. Friend drew attention to the wider impact of this problem across the world—something of which we are very mindful—and we have striven with might and main to raise the issue in international forums. We did so when we held the presidency of the EU, and we have continued to do so in the presidency of the G8. Our embassies and contacts across the world have been urged to raise the matter with the Governments of the countries concerned, and some of the pressure seems to be getting through. In particular, in eastern Europe there seemed to be an initial assumption that, because the countries operated on different dates, they might be unaffected. However, the information technology does not necessarily operate in that way.

Mr. White indicated assent.

Mrs. Beckett: I see that my hon. Friend agrees. The IT does not necessarily operate in terms of different dates, and that has now been brought home to those countries.

We are seeking not only to raise the matter internationally, but to make contributions—and to encourage others to make contributions—towards tackling the problem. On last hearing—a couple of weeks ago—we were, I am sorry to say, the only country in the world to have contributed to a World bank fund geared towards helping developing countries to solve the problem. We put £10 million into the fund, and we are encouraging other states to do the same.

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North–West Cambridgeshire): Some of us understand why the Leader of the House would not want to make a statement that tended to further the growing anxiety about the problem. However, I hope that in future she will strive to sound less complacent than she did this afternoon. Given that she has wisely started to refer to the need for Government Departments and agencies to develop contingency plans against any possible failures, will the right hon. Lady undertake today to gather those contingency plans together and publish them by Easter next year, so that there can be wide consultation on them before decisions have to be made on how to deal with whatever failures occur?

Mrs. Beckett: First, I appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's acceptance that we must strike the right note. However, I reject totally his suggestion that the note that I struck was complacent. The many concerns that we have expressed could not in any way be said to support that. As a prominent member of the previous Government, the right hon. Gentleman should be as aware as anybody that we have substantially increased the programme of work that we inherited from them.

The right hon. Gentleman said that we had begun to refer to contingency plans. We have done so for the very good reason that, although we have always understood the need—and warned of that need—for contingency planning, it was right to put more emphasis on tackling problems that could be solved. As we get nearer the changeover date—obviously, we continue to press people to take action to solve problems—we recognise that more effort must be put into contingency planning.

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether I would publish the plans by Easter. I said earlier that we have told Departments to draw up initial contingency plans. When we have had a chance to assess them, we will discuss whether to publish, and how much of the plans we can publish. Our record of openness in this matter is not matched anywhere in the world, and if he goes to the Library or studies the internet he will see the degree of openness that exists, right across the public sector in the UK.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): Does my right hon. Friend share my surprise that, out of the tens of thousands of sources throughout the world, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) could find only one from which to derive his information? Is he a chap with a chip on his shoulder?

On a positive note, may I commend to my right hon. Friend the work of the Government office for the north-west and MERIT, which are working hard to try to raise awareness—particularly among the SMEs in the north-west, where there are difficulties? Perhaps such organisations could be used at a regional level to help solve the problems that my right hon. Friend has identified in terms of local authorities.

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is well aware of the importance of the issues. He has good contacts with local authorities and organisations in his area that are seeking to tackle the problem. My hon. Friend the Minister for London and Construction and I attended a conference in London this morning to focus attention on planning across London and, in that context and others, we are working with the Local Government Association to increase awareness and to encourage people to seek help.

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): Is the Leader of the House aware that, yesterday, the Assembly of the Western European Union in Paris debated the effect of the millennium bug on European defence and security, and resolved that we could not conclude that the computer systems involved in the defence alliances of the WEU and NATO would be millennium compliant? What discussions are the Government having with our allies to ensure that our collective defence will not be at risk in 395 days' time? Will she confirm that there is no internationally agreed definition of millennium conformity, which seems to be a recipe for disaster when countries and companies do talk to each another on this issue?

Mrs. Beckett: We are continuing to seek to raise awareness internationally of our concerns about the matter and to encourage other Governments to pursue the same proactive stance that we have taken. We are mindful, as are my colleagues in the MOD, of the importance of the issue in terms of operational readiness. We have been encouraging discussion of that matter across international boundaries.

The hon. Gentleman believes that it is alarming that there is no international agreement on what is meant by millennium compliance. I take his point, but all I can say is that that is inevitable. If he took part in the discussion in the WEU, he would be well aware that there is a great disparity of acceptance, understanding and awareness of the issue in the international community. There are those who show all the signs of regarding this as merely something got up by the Anglo-Saxons to embarrass everybody, and they have not been taking it seriously at all. That highlights the reason why we must take all the precautions and make all the contingency plans that we can—because we are vulnerable in respect of our supply chain.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating Tendring district council in my constituency, which yesterday signed up to the Government's commitment to the year 2000 action pledge? Part of that commitment was a commitment to report to the local community every 100 days to show any progress that it had made. Will my right hon. Friend encourage all other local authorities to follow that example?

Mrs. Beckett: I am doubly grateful to my hon. Friend, because he has reminded me of something that I meant to say in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North–East (Mr. White). I do indeed congratulate Tendring council on signing Pledge 2000. So many valuable initiatives have been taken by Action 2000 that it is hard to pick one out, but that is certainly one.

I referred earlier to the anxiety that existed some time ago when it was impossible to get companies and organisations to talk to each other because of their nervousness about rendering themselves legally vulnerable. The whole idea of the Pledge 2000 programme is that people will undertake to be open with each other, to share information about their operational readiness, to offer advice and to discuss areas of common concern. I whole-heartedly agree with the call for openness. This morning, my hon. Friend the Minister for London and Construction and I told London local authorities that one of the most important things that we could all encourage our local authorities to do was to be open about their plans and preparations.

Mr. Redwood indicated assent.

Mrs. Beckett: I am glad that that commands agreement.

If we find that a local authority is not making preparations as we would hope, that in itself will be a useful spur; if we find that it is, that will be a useful reassurance to the local populace. I entirely share the view that openness is key.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): I am sure that the Leader of the House will have read with some alarm Cap Gemini's claim that, when the Labour party came to power, Britain was first in the European league table for millennium compliance but that we slipped six months ago to second and are now at eighth. We can all argue about who is to blame, but surely the key problem is that, when people, especially those in the public sector, have checked their systems for compliance, they then need money to put right any problems.

I do not think that a single word was said in the local government settlement about what the fire and police services and all our local councils will have to spend to meet the Government's expectations. Too many organisations have written to their suppliers saying, "We expect your kit to work on 1 January," and then reported to the Government that they have done everything that they need to do for the millennium.

Mrs. Beckett: Of course I am aware of the Cap Gemini survey. I am perfectly happy not to blame anybody, because viewing with hindsight is easy. I am more than well aware that organisations that have spent a huge amount of time, professional effort and money on the matter believe that planning should have started way back in 1994 and 1995; so if the hon. Gentleman wants me to apportion blame, he should not look at the present Government.

In fact, I do not blame the previous Government, because at that stage nobody anticipated that this would take so long; but it is a bit silly to try to turn this into a party political matter, when we have done far more than our predecessors, starting on the day we were elected.

The Government have substantially increased investment in public services. Indeed, we have been called reckless by the Conservative party. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions announced only a few moments ago—I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was here—the most generous settlement for local authorities for seven years.

Of course we are concerned about the fire and police services. The police and fire inspectorates are working with different organisations, and many detailed arrangements are in place in the police service, for example, involving publication of plans on its website and on that of ACPO.

It is certainly not the case that the Government—or anyone else in this country—will simply accept an assurance that everything will be fine. I cannot say that everything is fine with the Cap Gemini survey. I have no wish to cause any ripples in the Foreign Office pond by naming countries, but we know perfectly well that some of those that are shown on the survey as better prepared than the United Kingdom have done almost nothing to prepare, because they do not believe that there is a problem. That casts some doubt on the reliability of the information in that survey.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): The Leader of the House has spoken of a greater emphasis on contingency planning. My constituency is close to Manchester airport, so I am well aware that contingency planning is not adequate to deal with air traffic control. Can she give some assurance to my constituents and any others who might be affected that air traffic control procedures will not be tested by aircraft having to experience difficulties in 2000 but will be certified as safe before then?

Mrs. Beckett: As I have said, all Departments and Government agencies have said that they expect to be millennium ready. We are in constant contact with organisations such as the CAA and the national air transport system, and they are sharing their preparations and plans with us. We are continuing to monitor the situation. The organisations' preparations are well regarded, but no one is complacent and we are continuing to put information in the public domain.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): References have already been made to the concerns of the Secretary of State for Scotland about the effect of cuts in the Territorial Army on its ability to deliver emergency services in the event of any disruption. Is it wise to make any reductions in preparedness for civil difficulties caused by the millennium bug, when the Leader of the House is, understandably, not in a position to give us a guarantee that there will be no disruption to public services?

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman is inviting me to stray into the territory of the strategic defence review and its aftermath, which I fear I am disinclined to do. Of course we will have the normal contingency planning in place. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has had extensive discussions with the contingency planners and intends, heroically, at no little personal sacrifice, to be on standby on the key night; but the whole thrust of our work and programme is to try to ensure that there is so little material disruption to public services that there is no need to call on contingency services.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): In her list of prime culprits, the Leader of the House omitted to mention the Department of Trade and Industry. The Taskforce 2000 report, published on 11 November, said:

"We were critical of this Department's plans in our last analysis and remain so . . . less than half of the progress to be made on business critical IT by September has in fact been made."

Is that slow progress not attributable to the fact that the present political management of the Department of Trade and Industry is even worse than that of the immediate past?

Mrs. Beckett: I certainly cannot countenance for a second any criticism of my successor, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who is doing an excellent job.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): What about your predecessors?

Mrs. Beckett: Even less do I criticise them.

Yet again, we are relying on the analysis—if one can call it that—of Taskforce 2000. It is certainly true that the DTI has encountered more work than was initially anticipated, and that is entirely consistent with what is happening elsewhere in the public and private sectors. That has been the forecast for some time, but the Department is still on course to meet its declared deadline of April 1999 for business-critical IT. The estimated completion dates for embedded systems and telecommunications, for example, are deliberately cautious, so they should be well founded.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): I welcome the sober and systematic approach of the President of the Council in her statement, which contrasts with those who seem to want to predict the coming of the four horsemen of the Apocalypse creating attendant panic. Does she agree that people who make statements suggesting that hard-working IT staff in the public sector have not dealt professionally with the issue are insulting those staff? In a spirit of sober analysis of the problems, may I draw her attention to the new national insurance recording system, which has a potential late delivery date of 31 October 1999, as some of the recent deliveries of systems by the private sector to the Department of Social Security have faced a few small problems in implementation?

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his remarks and his understanding of the issues. I am aware of some of the problems that have occurred, but I am sure that he is aware that independent analysis of the work of the Department of Social Security has suggested that it is going well. I suspect that his point is slightly different, because the Department has had problems with its computer systems in the past, but it has done much work on them recently.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Given that one company, Unilever, has estimated that the costs to it alone of the millennium bug will be £300 million, is the right hon. Lady satisfied with her estimate that the cost to the entire national health service will be only £320 million?

Mrs. Beckett: We are saying that that is the further cost as we see it now. I am familiar with the work of Unilever and impressed by it. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is aware that the Prime Minister's adviser on the matter is Dr. Anderson, who was in charge of millennium compliance at Unilever. He has brought a wealth of experience and information to the issue, including the basis of the observation which I made earlier that it is now clear that we should all have started work on the matter much earlier. That is partly why I am happy to recognise a general responsibility for the problem: it does not lie in one quarter rather than another. Under Dr. Anderson's overall supervision, we continue to monitor, probe and assess the cost to various Departments, and we hope and believe that we have the measure of it. We may see some small increase, and that has been the experience over time at Unilever, but as we get closer to the date change our confidence in the accuracy of the financial predictions should strengthen.

BILLS PRESENTED

Scottish Enterprise

Mr. Secretary Dewar, supported by Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. Calum Macdonald, presented a Bill to make provision with respect to the financial limits in section 25(2) of the Enterprise and New Towns (Scotland) Act 1990: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 6].

Greater London Authority

Mr. Secretary Prescott, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Straw, Mr. Nick Raynsford and Ms Glenda Jackson, presented a Bill to establish and make provision about the Greater London Authority, the Mayor of London and the London Assembly; to make provision in relation to London borough councils and the Common Council of the City of London with respect to matters consequential on the establishment of the Greater London Authority; to make provision with respect to the functions of other local authorities and statutory bodies exercising functions in Greater London; to make provision about transport and road traffic in and around Greater London; to make provision about policing in Greater London and to make an adjustment of the metropolitan police district; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 7].

European Parliamentary Elections Bill (Allocation of Time)

5.34 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): I beg to move,

That the following provisions shall apply to proceedings on the European Parliamentary Elections Bill:

Timetable

1. Proceedings on Second Reading, in Committee, on Consideration and on Third Reading shall be completed at the sitting this day and shall be brought to a conclusion, if not previously concluded, four hours after the commencement of proceedings on this Motion.

Questions to be put

2. When the Bill has been read a second time—

(a) it shall, notwithstanding Standing Order No. 63 (Committal of Bills), stand committed to a Committee of the whole House without any Question being put,

(b) proceedings on the Bill shall stand postponed while the Question is put, in accordance with Standing Order No. 52(1) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills), on any financial resolution relating to the Bill,

(c) on the conclusion of proceedings on any financial resolution relating to the Bill, proceedings on the Bill shall be resumed and the Speaker shall leave the Chair whether or not notice of an instruction has been given.

3. On the conclusion of proceedings in Committee the Chairman shall report the Bill to the House without putting any Question and, if he reports the Bill with amendments, the House shall proceed to consider the Bill as amended without any Question being put.

4. For the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 the Speaker or Chairman shall forthwith put the following Questions (but no others)—

(a) any Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) any Question necessary to bring to a decision a Question so proposed;

(c) the Question on any amendment moved or Motion made by a Minister of the Crown;

(d) any other Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded.

5. On a Motion made for a new Clause or a new Schedule, the Chairman or Speaker shall put only the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill.

Miscellaneous

6. Standing Order 15(1) (Exempted business) shall apply to proceedings on the Bill at the sitting this day; and the proceedings shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

7. The proceedings on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for varying or supplementing the provisions of this order shall, if not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion one hour after commencement; and the Standing Order No. 15(1) shall apply to those proceedings.

8. Standing Order No. 82 (Business Committee) shall not apply in relation to proceedings on the Bill.

9. No Motion shall be made to alter the order in which any proceedings on the Bill are taken.

10. No dilatory Motion shall be made in relation to the Bill except by a Minister of the Crown.

11. If at the sitting this day a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 24 stands over to seven o'clock and proceedings on this Motion have begun before that time, the Motion for the Adjournment shall stand over until the conclusion of proceedings on the Bill.

12. If the House is adjourned at the sitting this day, or the sitting is suspended, before the conclusion of proceedings on the Bill, no notice shall be required, of a Motion made at the next sitting by a Minister of the Crown for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order.

The Government remain determined to press ahead with the European Parliamentary Elections Bill in the form that this House has decided by overwhelming majorities. I shall say a little more about why we subscribe to that belief when we come to debate the Bill itself. Let me now explain why the Government believe that the allocation of time motion is appropriate. The answer is simple: the House has already devoted a huge amount of time to discussing the Bill. There may be a little more to say, but we think that the time allocated is adequate in the circumstances.

The Bill has only six clauses and four schedules. In the Session that ended only 10 days ago, we spent more than 34 hours debating the Bill, which works out at more than three and half hours for each clause or schedule, whether substantive or not. The Bill is a constitutional measure and, for that reason, we have taken it on the Floor of the House. It is worth pointing out that it is not exceptional for Bills of a constitutional nature to be guillotined. Some hon. Members will recall—and some Conservative Members will do so with discomfort—that the European Communities (Amendment) Act 1986, which introduced the single market, had to be guillotined by the previous Administration. The then Lord President of the Council, Mr. John Biffen, said when moving the timetable motion—and he explained why. Earlier in the debate, he sought to justify the Government's decision to guillotine the measure. He said:

"Since 1966, six constitutional Bills have been timetabled."—

"The Bill received its Second Reading with the clear majority of 319 votes to 160. That is an indication that the Government fully have the authority of the House for wishing to ensure that the passage of the Bill can be concluded."—[Official Report, 1 July 1986; Vol. 100, c. 933-34.]

If Mr. John Biffen was correct on that occasion, we must be even more correct when we say that this Bill has received the overwhelming authority of the House, because it received a majority of 355 to 160 on Second Reading on 25 November 1997.

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): Can the Home Secretary give any precedent for a constitutional Bill being guillotined with only four hours for debate, including the three-hour guillotine motion?

Mr. Straw: The simple answer is that no Opposition since the war have suffered from the madness that infects the current Opposition. This is the first constitutional measure on which a Government have been forced to use the Parliament Act 1911 procedures. Every other constitutional measure, however controversial it may have been and whether it appeared in a manifesto, has eventually been accepted as having received the authority of the elected House and been allowed through by the unelected House. Given that the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) has raised the issue, he may wish to learn that the only Bill that has been the subject of the Parliament Act procedure since the war—three started out, but agreement was reached on two—was the War Crimes Act 1991. The guillotine motion on that Act provided for no Committee stage.

[Mr. Straw]

Conservative Members have only themselves to blame for tearing apart fundamental conventions on the constitution, as I will show in a moment. We are having to debate the matter again, despite the fact that the Bill and its principle received the overwhelming endorsement of the British people in the manifestos of not one but two of the major parties. It has also received majorities of more than 150 on every occasion that it has been the subject of debate, not only on its principle but on its detail. It does not lie in the mouth of the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield—or any other Conservative Member—to complain that the Bill has not been subject to the most thorough debate. I myself have always sought to answer any question raised with me in the time that is available.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): Does the Home Secretary accept that one of the clearest pieces of evidence that he does not have overwhelming support for what he is saying is the tiny handful of his parliamentary colleagues who have bothered to take their places in the Chamber this afternoon? Another is the fact that there were so few speeches in our earlier debates in support of what the Government are trying to ram through. In effect, the Bill has no support at all.

Mr. Straw: As I have explained to the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends before, the best indication of support is not only the substantial majorities that we have enjoyed in this House, but the fact that we have put the principle of the issue to the vote of the British people. Of that, there can be no doubt.

I am very happy for the available time to be used up principally by Conservative Members. Four hours have been allocated for completion of the measure, and the longer they spend on the guillotine motion, the less time there will be for the detail, even if that detail needs further examination. That is a matter for the Conservatives, not for us.

Mr. Brian White (Milton Keynes, North–East): Does my right hon. Friend accept that whether or not we started by supporting an open-list system or a closed-list system, many of us on the Labour Benches now firmly hold the view that the Bill should go through as we are arguing about the elected House versus the unelected House? My right hon. Friend has the overwhelming support of Labour Members.

Mr. Straw: I accept that, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for anticipating my next point. I expect that the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield will work himself up into a fury, implying that the motion is an abuse of the procedures of the House. He should, however, be rather cautious given the record of the previous Administration, particularly in the 1980s when they never sought agreement on Bills and used guillotine motions with gay abandon. There has, indeed, been an abuse of Parliament over the Bill, but it did not occur in this Chamber. The abuse was the responsibility of the Conservative party, which relied on its inbuilt three-to-one majority in the other place. It relied on the votes of hereditary peers to frustrate the wishes of the democratically elected House.

None of us on the Government Benches—and precious few Members on the Conservative Benches, if they were allowed to speak their minds—believe that the hereditary peers have a right to block Bills introduced by the Government. I have never objected to the other place seeking to revise Bills. Far from objecting, I have welcomed revisions, and I have never suggested that a Bill introduced even by my Front Bench colleagues represents a paradigm of perfection that cannot be improved in any way. That would be an arrogant impertinence, and it would plainly be untrue.

On two major Bills out of the several brought forward by the Home Department during the past session—the Human Rights Bill and the Crime and Disorder Bill—the other place entered serious reservations. We did not say, "Damn them, they are Conservative hereditaries so we should ignore their arguments." We sought, on press freedom and, particularly, on the protection of the churches, to listen to what was said in the other place, and to seek to accommodate it, as I believe we did.

A number of detailed amendments were made to the Crime and Disorder Bill, such as that made when the Lord Chief Justice expressed reservations about the breadth of what was then clause 40 on the powers of justices' clerks. Many noble Lords backed him, we listened to what he had to say and we changed the Bill. In the particular case of the age of consent, the whole House knows that we accepted the view of the other place that that measure should not come before the House for a free vote without its having alongside it associated offences where people were in a position of trust that they might abuse.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): The Secretary of State has made the accusation that what the House of Lords did was somehow an abuse of procedure. Has he not heard of the Parliament Act 1911? Does he realise that its whole purpose is to deal with situations such as this one? In fact, the House of Lords acted completely within the conventions and within the statutory provisions for matters of this kind.

Mr. Straw: It would be rum if I had not heard of the Parliament Act since that is precisely what we are using. I heard of the Parliament Act as a schoolboy, and I remember the history of the Budget in 1910—more accurately, the Budget was in 1909—

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): I did not realise that the right hon. Gentleman was that old.

Mr. Straw: I have a considerable affection for the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan), but I shall lose it if he questions my age. I was not present during the passage of the Budget of 1909, but I learned about it at school. It will be remembered that Mr. Lloyd George moved his Budget, that the Lords blocked it, that not one but two elections were required in 1910, and that the Parliament Act followed in 1911. It is worth bearing in mind, too, that there was then a general agreement that the Act should be the first part of a two-stage process of reform of the House of Lords, but the Conservative party consistently blocked the second stage, a point that Conservative Members should note.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): I am interested by the reasons adduced by the Secretary of State in relation to the Parliament Act, but I do not understand what he is saying. The House of Lords acted perfectly constitutionally. The Government disagreed, and the Chamber disagreed on a vote. The Bill was returned to the other place, and the Government are now invoking the Parliament Act. Is not that the proper constitutional arrangement? Has not every party acted within the terms of the Parliament Act and the constitution?

Mr. Straw: The difference, and the central burden of what I must say, is that the Parliament Act has not previously been needed even for the most controversial of proposals. In addition, there has been an expectation of its use only when there has been a Labour Government. It has never been raised against a Tory Government—

Sir Norman Fowler: The War Crimes Bill.

Mr. Straw: The only case is the War Crimes Bill, which was not an issue of extreme controversy between the parties.

Sir Norman Fowler: The Home Secretary just cited it.

Mr. Straw: I cited the Bill to answer a different point raised by the right hon. Gentleman, which was whether there had been a Committee stage on a guillotine under the Parliament Act. There had not.

The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) asked whether the action of the House of Lords was not consistent with the Parliament Act, and with the conventions and understandings that amount to an important part of our constitution. It would be tautologous to say that that action was consistent with the Parliament Act, as that is a simple statement of fact. It is wholly wrong, however, to claim that the procedure followed by the Conservative party is in any sense consistent with the conventions of the House of Commons and the other place, or of the understandings between parties that form an essential part of our uncodified and unwritten constitution. I shall explain in considerable detail why that is so.

The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield was, until recently, the non-executive chairman of Midland Independent Newspapers. He ceased, I believe, to be chairman not so long ago.

Sir Norman Fowler indicated assent.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman assents to that. If the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to take advice from us, he may wish to think again and to take the advice of The Birmingham Post, which that group owns. The paper is not particularly in favour of closed lists, and it is against proportional representation. Its view is straightforward, but a recent editorial said that the Conservative party was making a fool of itself by the way in which it was behaving. The editorial read:

"The Conservatives cannot muster a decent opposition in the Commons, the party organisation has fallen into disrepair in the country, its ability to communicate any message to the electorate has virtually ceased. Yet it still has a chance to wield its power in the Lords . . .

The Labour Government may be wrong in wanting closed-list PR but our democracy is based on the fundamental belief that the will of the majority in the Commons must prevail.

It is hypocritical nonsense to defend 'democracy' by undemocratic means and shows the Tories' desperation to cling on to the last vestiges of power.

Throwing out the Government's Bill is a monumental blunder by the Tories".

It was indeed a monumental blunder. The Conservative party has torn up one of the most essential conventions regulating the balance of power between the elected House and the other place. That convention was articulated, although it had been followed before, by Lord Salisbury, the grandfather of the current Viscount Cranborne. In a speech to the House of Lords in November 1964, Lord Salisbury spelled out what the convention meant.

Mr. Shepherd: This does not answer my question.

Mr. Straw: I am seeking to answer the point raised by the hon. Gentleman. He began his speech by talking about relations with the new Labour Government elected in 1964 with a very tiny majority. He said:

"In 1945 we were faced, in one sense . . . with an easier problem than now, for the Labour majority in another place . . . was far larger than it is today, and it was therefore possible for us who belonged to the Opposition to make it our broad guiding rule that what had been on the Labour Party programme at the preceding General Election should be regarded as having been approved by the British people. Therefore, as your Lordships will remember, we passed all the nationalisation Bills, although we cordially disliked them, on the Second Reading and did our best to improve them and make them more workable on Committee stage. Where, however, measures were introduced which had not been in the Labour Party Manifesto at the preceding Election we reserved full liberty of action."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 4 November 1964; Vol. 261, c. 66.]

That is a reasonable statement.

The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield has said that closed lists were not specified in our manifesto. Even when our manifesto is clear and categorical, as it is on the two-stage process for the reform of the House of Lords—it could not be clearer about the self-contained stage one—the right hon. Gentleman still says that the Conservative party intends to tear up the basic fundamental conventions of the Salisbury convention—[Interruption.] That is what we all heard him say on Monday. Of course, the Conservative party may have changed its mind since then.

Let us leave that to one side. In order to justify the Conservative party's actions on this Bill the right hon. Gentleman is saying that, although the basic idea of proportional representation for European elections was in the manifestos of the Labour party and the Liberal Democrats, the detail was not. I must tell the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Aldridge–Brownhills that, when Lord Salisbury was making his statement, he did so against the background of the manifestos that had been brought before the British people in 1945. Those manifestos were far less detailed in every particular than those of any party at the last election. I happen to have before me the winning Labour party manifesto for 1945. It says that the Labour party intended to submit to the nation an industrial programme which included public ownership of the fuel and power industries. There is then an explanation about why that is to be done, but there is not a word about how. The list continues by saying that the programme will include the public ownership of inland transport. There is a little word about co-ordination and about why it is to be done, but not a word about how. It then talks about public ownership—

Sir Norman Fowler: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are in substantial difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman has tabled a guillotine motion which allows only four hours of debate in this House. He has now been speaking for 20 minutes on that motion—not the Second Reading—and we are now going back to the 1945 Labour manifesto. With due respect to the Home Secretary, I believe that it would be in the constitution and order of the House for him to make briefer remarks on this important guillotine motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The right hon. Gentleman knows that the Chair cannot be responsible for the content or length of speeches. The Home Secretary will have heard what the right hon. Gentleman said.

Mr. Straw: I particularly heard the right hon. Gentleman saying that he was in some difficulty, and that is true. I have taken 20 minutes because I have given way to hon. Members. The right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends would have been the first to complain had I not given way. Let us be clear, the content of the 1945 manifesto is absolutely central to the context of the Salisbury convention and the fact that the Opposition have broken that convention.

The 1945 manifesto said that the programme would include public ownership of the fuel and power industries, public ownership of inland transport and public ownership of iron and steel. No other detail was given, but Lord Salisbury did not use that fact, even casuistically to argue that they could accept the principle, not just to dissent from the detail, but to block the whole Bill. That is the difference between any previous action taken by the other place and the action being taken now by the Conservative Opposition in the other place with the full support of the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid–Bedfordshire): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Straw: I am sorry, but I do not have time.

I was reflecting on why the Salisburys, the Cecils and the Cranbornes—the same family—had been able to survive in power for five centuries or so when others, not including those in the Conservative party, had failed. I came across a quotation not from one of Viscount Cranborne's predecessors but from one of his predecessor's associates in the other place, the Marquess of Winchester, who was heavily involved in Tudor politics. He said—I translate from the Latin—that he had survived by being a willow and not an oak. That is how the Conservative party has kept its power in the other place until now. We are now seeing the Conservative party, a once great oak of distinguished lineage, breaking in the wind. Whether it has a future is gravely open to doubt given these tactics.

The motion is in no sense an abuse of parliamentary procedure. The abuse of parliamentary procedure is the action of the Conservative party which has broken the Salisbury convention in every particular. The Opposition have challenged the democratic will of the House and, above all, the democratic will of the British people.

5.57 pm

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): That was an unconvincing speech. It did not even convince the four Labour Back Benchers who are here today. The Home Secretary was keen on quoting precedents. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd) wishes me to give way, I will happily give way to him. If he is a Whip, I suggest that he keeps the silence for which he has doubtless been appointed to that office.

The Home Secretary was keen on quoting precedents. He went back to the 1945 general election. I notice that he did not quote his own article in The Times on 4 February 1985, which was entitled, "Cut the Guillotine Down to Size." In those days, he argued that ill-thought-out legislation should not be forced through without change,

"brandishing the theory of the detailed mandate in face of the reasoned argument."

With this legislation, he cannot even claim a detailed mandate.

Let us get this straight: we all know that the closed list was not, and never has been, a manifesto commitment of the Labour party. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) totally destroyed that argument. In fact, the Home Secretary destroyed his own argument. On Second Reading, my right hon. Friend the Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney), who is here today, interrupted the Home Secretary when he said that he would look at the Belgian list. The Belgian list is not a closed list so, if it was a manifesto commitment, it was quickly and easily broken by the Home Secretary.

On the abuse of power, let us go back to the War Crimes Bill and to the comments of the then shadow Home Secretary, Lord Hattersley. He made the point that my hon. Friends have been making. He said:

"The House of Lords possesses the right under the constitution, to reject legislation, and we possess the right to overrule that rejection. The House of Lords, this House and the Government, if I may say so, have acted with absolute constitutional propriety by bringing the matter forward again."—[Official Report, 18 March 1991; Vol. 188, c. 30.]

That is the point and that is what my hon. Friends were saying.

Obviously, I recognise that the guillotine procedure has been used before. However, I caution the Government to hesitate before guillotining a constitutional measure. There should be no doubt that the Bill goes to the heart of our constitution. The rules whereby Members of the European Parliament are elected are vastly important, above all to the public.

Of course there are precedents of the guillotine being used even on constitutional Bills, although the BBC report this morning, which suggested that the Maastricht Bill was guillotined is wrong. The whole point about that Bill is that it was not guillotined. It would be nice if the BBC gave parliamentary reporting the priority that it used to have.

Mr. Straw: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Norman Fowler: I shall give way in a moment. The right hon. Gentleman should listen to my point. He regards this debate as a leisurely Committee stage, but this is a debate on a guillotine motion. He is forcing the House to pass all the Bill's stages in four hours. We do not regard this as a leisurely Committee stage in the way that he would like. There have been precedents, but this is probably the most severe guillotine that has ever been introduced, and I shall tell the House why.

Under the Government's proposals, the guillotine motion could be debated for three hours, but that would come out of the total of four hours that is allowed for the whole debate. The Government would be content for the debate on the guillotine motion to run its full course. I assume that even they do not believe that we will nod it through without a Division, so they would leave the House 40 minutes to debate the Second Reading, the Committee stage, the Report stage and the Third Reading of the Bill. Even if the guillotine debate could be finished earlier, it is unlikely that we shall have any more than two and a half or three hours to complete all the Bill's stages. One does not have to be a paid-up member of the Conservative party to find that unacceptable.

Mr. Straw: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Norman Fowler: I shall give way in a moment. The right hon. Gentleman should restrain himself.

Many hon. Members will regard the Government's proposals as entirely objectionable. One point that is clear about the Bill is that it is highly controversial on both sides of the House. Much of the criticism of the Bill has come from Labour Members. The measures are as disliked by many on the Government Benches as they are by Conservative Members. That is demonstrated this afternoon by the fact that only three Labour Back Benchers are present.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): There are five.

Sir Norman Fowler: I was not counting the Parliamentary Private Secretaries. If the hon. Gentleman is down to counting them, he really is in difficulty.

I hope that, on the issue of the guillotine we will, for once, have the support of Liberal Democrat Members. They have taken an extraordinary view throughout the entire debate, and I hope that they will at least have the courage to say that we should be able to debate the Bill for longer than the four hours that the Government have given us.

The time that has been allocated to the Bill is totally inadequate to do any justice to it. We are once again considering the whole Bill because it has been reintroduced. We are considering not only open and closed lists but the abolition, in effect, of European by-elections. We all know why such a proposal might now attract the Labour party. Having been beaten into third place in the by-election in Scotland last Thursday, it may well want to avoid such contests. By-elections, for Europe and Westminster, have been an important part of our political system.

Mr. Straw: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Norman Fowler: I shall give way in a moment. The right hon. Gentleman need not keep bobbing up and down.

If the Government think that forcing unpopular legislation through the House without giving us a realistic opportunity to debate it will restore their political fortunes, they are in for a surprise north and south of the border. I shall now give way to the Home Secretary.

Mr. Straw: Will the right hon. Gentleman name another Bill, including constitutional Bills, of only six clauses which was the subject of more than 34 hours of detailed debate in the House?

Sir Norman Fowler: There must have been constitutional Bills that were so well debated, but that is not my point. My point—this is the Government's proposition—is that this constitutional Bill has been reintroduced. It is therefore a new Bill and the Government are allowing four hours of debate, including the debate on the guillotine motion. I cannot think of a precedent for that, and if the Home Secretary can think of one, I will gladly, in my generosity, give way to him again.

Mr. Straw: The simple point is that the Bill has already been the subject of lengthy debate. The four hours allocated to it today must be added to the 34 hours of extraordinarily detailed discussion that have already taken place, and the Bill is exactly the same as it was then.

Sir Norman Fowler: The right hon. Gentleman's answer is that he cannot think of a precedent, because there is none. The guillotine motion is the most severe since the war and, as far as I can tell from the extent of my research, the most severe that has ever been moved.

Mr. Shepherd: I do not entirely understand the Home Secretary's point because, although the House has debated the Bill many times, it has done so only on a particular, narrow issue. We want to debate the entire Bill, which is understandable.

Sir Norman Fowler: That is exactly the point that I was about to make, and I thank my hon. Friend for making it in his usual skilled way.

The Bill makes a fundamental change in our arrangements for European elections. We are, for example, abandoning the first-past-the-post system. That is a profound mistake, and many people will resent the abolition of the constituency system. They want a Member whom they can call their own and with whom they can take up issues. That will be lost under the Bill.

[Sir Norman Fowler]

It is not merely a case of open and closed lists. That issue has dominated the debate because of the action of the House of Lords, but there are many other issues.

The Bill raises the issue of the balance between the party and the public, and that is the issue at stake between the two Houses. The Lords rejected not the whole Bill—again, the Home Secretary is wrong—but the closed list system, in which people vote for the party and not the candidate. That stand has been widely applauded, and not only by the Opposition. The Government Benches are not crowded because one Labour Member after another has spoken against closed lists. Let us have no nonsense about closed lists being a manifesto pledge; they are not and never have been.

Mr. Cash: Does my right hon. Friend accept that, as we have rightly endorsed the principle of first past the post, we should gently persuade their Lordships to do the same and return the Bill or at least seek to amend it, including the long title, so that we can debate first past the post rather than the difference between open and closed lists?

Sir Norman Fowler: On Second Reading, we can debate exactly that point, which is very important. That is why it is false to say that, because we have debated closed and open lists, we have disposed of all the issues in the Bill. We clearly have not.

For all those reasons, the House needs substantially more time than has been allocated. We should remember that, until the debate had developed, the public did not know about all the issues that were involved and, today, those are better understood. The result is that, even in the past few days, major points have been made, such as the point of conscience. Before some people vote, they want to know the candidates' stance on the major moral issues that we all face. We all know that that is the case, because all hon. Members are elected according to that system, and when we stand for election we must answer questions on our beliefs. One report said:

> "Bishops last night accused Tony Blair of destroying voters' rights to make moral choices on issues such as abortion and the arms trade. They joined ethical campaigners in a fierce assault on plans to adopt a new voting system in Euro-elections next year. In a strongly worded letter to the Prime Minister, they warn that 'closed lists' . . . will effectively disenfranchise millions of people with strong religious or moral views."

That argument has developed during debates on the Bill. It is therefore nonsensical to say that opposition to the Bill is confined to the Conservative party and the House of Lords. There is a very wide coalition of opposition to the Bill.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is a need to scrutinise a further aspect, concerning the nature of the European Parliament? Unlike the House, it does not have a system in which one party is in power as such, but, if the Government's proposal for the European elections were implemented, the work carried out by individual MEPs might be influenced by whether they were assiduous, and attended and had responsibilities on committees, or whether they chose not to. Obviously, their role in a particular constituency, especially where there was no affiliation between the electorate and a specific Member, might mean that some MEPs could spend all their time doing constituency work, building up profiles and so on, while others carried the responsibility of committee work. If that position were mirrored in this House, Members of the party in government could be disadvantaged.

Sir Norman Fowler: My hon. Friend makes a strong and powerful case. I shall not, if she will forgive me, develop it, because there are such obvious and unsatisfactory time constraints on the debate.

The Government have unquestionably and undoubtedly lost the argument on the Bill. They have been unable to persuade their own Back Benchers; they have been unable to persuade the press. I was delighted to hear my old newspaper, The Birmingham Post, being set up as an example of the massive press support for the Home Secretary. He said that I used to be chairman of the company; that is true, but he omitted to say that it is now owned by the Daily Mirror. The Government have been unable to persuade the public or the press.

I say in all seriousness that I believe that it is insulting, not only to the House but to the public, to truncate discussion of the Bill, as is proposed. I hope that, during the debate, we shall not hear from the Government great complaints about the constitution, when they are forcing through a Bill under the severest guillotine measure that any hon. Member can remember. It shows that the Government have lost the argument and the debate. The motion should therefore be rejected.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): The Liberal Democrats accept the guillotine motion; I am sorry to disappoint the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) yet again. The Conservatives' concern for the mortal souls of the Liberal party—as they style us—has been touching throughout the many debates on the Bill, and is greatly appreciated by me and my colleagues.

We have debated this subject for so many hours that we believe that there are no new arguments to be made—only decisions, which, unfortunately, have been lacking due to the nature of the ping-pong in ermine that we experienced towards the end of the previous Session. We have been asked to back the provision of more time for debate on this subject, so that we can follow the common dictum that the primary tool of opposition is the use of time, but, in my recent time in the House, I have learnt that that dictum often leads to us giving our debate plenty of quantity but little quality. I suspect that we may well again be running into a situation where the Opposition are talking about issues other than the issue on which they have chosen to focus for most of the time, and saying, "These are the issues that we want to debate." In that case, why did they choose to spend so much time on the specific issue of closed and open lists if they are really interested in the other subjects?

Mr. Sayeed: The Home Secretary described the question of closed lists versus open lists as a detail. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the proposition of closed lists is just a detail?

Mr. Allan: We are returning to a familiar subject. We have said that we have two primary objectives.

The first—and key—one is the achievement of proportionality; the second is the extension of voter choice. We believe that the benefits of greater proportionality in the Bill as tabled far exceed any disappointment that we have at not achieving the open lists, and therefore back the Bill as it stands, as the alternative to first past the post. We can make that position clear again in the later stages of consideration of the Bill.

Mr. Sayeed: Answer the question.

Mr. Allan: I thought I had said that the issue of greater proportionality is far more significant than the issue of closed or open lists. The voter choice element is secondary to the principal issue of proportionality.

I have gained a great benefit from these debates. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield and others who have participated for giving me an opportunity to learn about the more arcane elements of parliamentary procedure at a greatly accelerated rate—experience that it often takes hon. Members many years to acquire. My only sadness is that the proposed changes to another place may shortly render that knowledge redundant; I certainly hope so.

I have discussed this subject with a far wiser head than mine—my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), who has great experience of these matters and of parliamentary procedure. We have agreed that, as the Home Secretary outlined, there has been abuse of convention in the debate so far.

I draw attention to contributions made to the most recent debate on this subject in another place by my noble Friend Lord Russell and by the Conservative Lord Garel-Jones. Both had resisted the change, but, in the final debate, they argued that, in that fifth and final battle, it would be an abuse of convention not to allow the Bill to pass, as the Government had a mandate for it. Both argued that, having made their opposition clear in a perfectly honourable way within the conventions, it now behoved them, if they wanted to stay within the conventions, to allow the Bill to pass. I am disappointed that other Lords on the Conservative Benches were persuaded otherwise, having been given an indication as to their duty. I believe that Lord Garel-Jones and Lord Russell had the entirely correct approach to the conventions.

We believe that all the key issues that have been mentioned by Conservative Members were debated at length in all the stages that preceded our final charade over the open and closed lists. The suggestion that there was no debate on the principle of proportional representation versus first past the post, or on the size of regions, or on whether we should have regions, is a gross misrepresentation of debates that I sat through in the previous Session, in which all those issues were debated at length.

We believe that many people outside this place—including many prospective Conservative candidates—are now desperate for us to resolve the issue and pass the Bill. Conservative candidates—including the Conservative, Lord Bethell—have expressed great concern at the tactics employed.

The Conservative party obviously needs a strategic diary secretary, as at present its opposition is in the wrong place and at the wrong time. It would be appropriate for the Bill to proceed with all due speed, as the debate that we need on the subject has been had—as hon. Members present know, however much they argue otherwise.

Miss Melanie Johnson (Welwyn Hatfield): I believe that this is the sixth time that the subject has been debated in the House. The fifth time that it was debated, on 18 November 1998, there was a massive majority in favour of the Bill.

The danger—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) wishes to say something, I shall give way to him to allow him to say it.

Mr. Shepherd: Of course the Bill was not debated six times. It was the Lords amendment that was debated a number of times. That is a narrow point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Sedentary comments that lead to further interruption of debate are not very helpful in a time-limited situation.

Miss Johnson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

There is a danger that a Bill about a system to be used for electing MEPs will dominate the main business of the House. The key points have been debated and, as was remarked earlier, 34 hours of debate have taken place. As the Home Secretary commented, three and a half hours on each clause or schedule is a great deal of time. If the Opposition have not advanced their arguments, although they have had ample time in which to do so, many would say that they had wasted their time.

The vote on the last occasion was Ayes 326 and Noes 133—a clear majority of 193 in favour of the passage of the Bill.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): Does the hon. Lady recall that, at that time, the vote was on the motion to disagree with the Lords in their amendment, and to send to the Lords another amendment in lieu of that amendment? Although I opposed it, the House agreed to a review of the electoral mechanism proposed by the Government, yet the Government have now brought back a Bill that does not include such a review. Will the hon. Lady explain why?

Miss Johnson: Rather than strengthening the hon. Gentleman's case, the fact that we have gone through much additional scrutiny, which has seemed tortuous to many of us, detracts from it. We are now discussing issues for which precedents exist but, as the Home Secretary observed in his opening remarks, to some extent we are beyond precedent, because we have seen torn apart in front of us fundamental conventions by which the House operates.

It is important for you as the Opposition to realise that closed lists are not controversial for Labour Members. If you believe something different—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is confusing second and third person. I have nothing to do with the matter.

Miss Johnson: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Opposition Members are confused if they believe that a few speakers from the Government Benches who disagree with the Government represent disagreement by the vast majority of Government Back Benchers.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) rose—

Miss Johnson: I will not give way. A majority of 193 is a clear sign. The mark of whether we support the Government is whether we support them in the Division Lobby. Those of us who passed through that Lobby are keen for the measure to go ahead in its present form.

On 1 July 1986, in the debate on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, to which the Home Secretary referred, the then Leader of the House, Mr. John Biffen, moving the allocation of time motion, said that the Bill had "constitutional importance", as does the present Bill. He said that had already been provided for the Bill, and that is also true in this case. He remarked that, on its Second Reading, the Bill had a "clear majority of 319 votes to 160", which is a majority of 159. It is worth noting that, at its last consideration, the Bill received a majority of 193, which is clearly in excess of that.

"a significant amount of time"

In closing the debate, the then Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Lynda Chalker commented:

"The public are not impressed when we sit here night after night raking through the tepid embers of past battles. They want Parliament to get on with the job."—[Official Report, 1 July 1986; Vol. 100, c. 933-974.]

That is what this motion would do. The debate has been held; the issues have been fully aired. If they have not, it is the Opposition's fault for not doing so. A clear majority support the Bill, and there are plenty of precedents. I support the motion.

Let us remind ourselves of the precedents. The motion for the allocation of time—or the guillotine, as people happily call it when they want to add to the drama—is mentioned by "Erskine May" as one of the devices that it is important to consider in balancing

"the claims of business and the rights of debate."

I accept that that is an important balance. It is our task both to get business done and to enable hon. Members to debate matters properly in the Chamber. There have been several occasions since 1945 when an allocation of time motion has been accepted.

"Erskine May" goes on to say that such procedures affirm

"the rights of the majority".

In the present case, we seek to affirm the rights of the majority in the House who supported the Bill, as well as the rights of the majority of the people, who sent us here on a manifesto which, as the Home Secretary commented, made it clear that we would make such changes. Democracy is the will of the majority when the debate has been had. The debate has taken place, and now is the time to move forward.

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North-West Cambridgeshire): This is the first time in almost 20 years in the House that I have spoken on a guillotine motion. I spent more than 11 of those years on the Government Front Bench, so the opportunities were more limited than the original statistic might suggest. When I stepped down from the Opposition Front Bench in June, had anyone suggested to me that this, my first Back-Bench speech since 1985, would be on a guillotine motion, I would have been deeply sceptical. Nevertheless, that is the speech that I shall make.

I am sorry that the Home Secretary has left. I hope that the Minister will tell him that I feel moved to speak because of the Home Secretary's insistence that closed lists were some sort of matter of principle that lay at the heart of the Government's thinking on the Bill. For, as my right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary reminded the House, it was my intervention at the Dispatch Box on Second Reading that elicited from the Home Secretary the acknowledgement that he had an open mind on whether there should be a closed list or an open list.

I shall not quote verbatim, but I believe Hansard records that the tenor of my remarks was that that was a significant statement by the Home Secretary, which I asked him to repeat. I said that we would want to consult with him during that period of open-mindedness. I hope the House will understand why I am singularly unimpressed by those on the Government Front Bench who now try to peddle the line that they were always in favour of the closed list, as a matter of principle.

May I add, for the Minister to convey to the Home Secretary, that in the House on a number of occasions since the general election I have expressed appreciation to the Home Secretary for his courtesy and for the way in which he has behaved? So I am not—I repeat not—suggesting that the Home Secretary is behaving in a duplicitous way. However, it is right to point out to the House that that newly acquired principle is precisely that—a newly acquired principle to enable the Government to get their legislation.

I have no problem in principle with the concept of guillotine motions. I have always held in high regard my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), who has principled opposition to guillotine motions. He will recall that on a number of occasions during the previous Administration, when he was speaking vehemently against the previous Government introducing guillotine motions, I frequently came into the House to listen to his contribution, even though the Government Whips might have thought him slightly less helpful than they would have wished.

There is a principled argument against guillotine motions, but I do not hold it. It is right that the Government of the day should get their legislation. We introduced guillotine motions and, in doing so, followed a precedent of the previous Labour Government. I have no problem with the Government introducing a guillotine motion as such this evening, or with the Government invoking the Parliament Act. The Home Secretary, rather unconvincingly, spoke about the conventions of the other place having been torn up in the case of the Bill.

As my right hon. and hon. Friends have pointed out, the Parliament Act exists precisely because there is always an opportunity for the other House to move beyond revision on an issue that may affect the passage of a Bill. As Labour Members have said, if that happens, it is right that the elected Government of the day should have their will. The Parliament Act is there is ensure that that happens. But I hope that the Minister will not persist in the charade—a charade that is hard to defend—that, because the Government of the day have lost a few votes in another place, that can be spun into a great constitutional crisis.

I remember when—weekly, it seemed to me—Viscount Cranborne reported to the last Government the number of votes that that Government were losing in the House of Lords. Losing votes is not in itself a prelude to a constitutional crisis.

Mr. George Howarth: The difference is that, on this occasion, the House of Lords has overturned decisions made by the House of Commons. I do not think that a precedent for that was established when the right hon. Gentleman's party was in government.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: There may not be a precedent for this degree of repetition, but there was a recognition of something that still obtains today. It was recognised that the Parliament Act was intended to ensure that the will of this Chamber would ultimately prevail. That is right. It is the Government's view, and it would be the view of the Conservative party whether it was in government or in opposition. None of us questions the fact that, ultimately, the will of the democratically elected Chamber should prevail—and it will prevail in regard to this Bill. That is what the Parliament Act is about.

I hope that the Minister will forgive a Member of Parliament who has been in the House for quite a long time for not falling prey to the excitement about this great constitutional crisis that Ministers—with, I must say, a conspicuous lack of success—are trying to generate. I must tell the Minister that my feelings about the motion are ambivalent. I believe that depriving my constituents of their historic rights to vote for an individual is an outrage. I will not mince words. I am interested by the number of constituents who, without being prompted, have made clear to me that sense of outrage during the past few weeks. It will not comfort the Minister to learn that the affiliations of those people extend well beyond those of people whom, even in my wildest fantasies, I would expect to vote for me as a parliamentary candidate.

The Minister will know from my speech on Second Reading—the Bill's first Second Reading, that is—that I am deeply unhappy about the ending of constituencies, as opposed to areas.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That may displease the right hon. Gentleman, but we are debating a timetable motion, and he should not go into matters that will be dealt with on Second Reading in any depth.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: I note your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

My point is that I am outraged by the imposition of a guillotine. Owing to the lack of time for debate, hugely important issues cannot be explored in the detail that they require. I must tell the Minister, however, that although I am outraged by the timetable motion, in a sense I welcome it. It will be apparent even to the most partisan Labour supporters outside the House that, when their Government provide for a timetable motion, a Second Reading, a Committee stage, a Report stage and a Third Reading to take place in four hours, it is clear that that Government do not expect the primary legislation that is being debated to be given the scrutiny—from elected Members—that it deserves. I welcome that aspect of the motion, which constitutes the most powerful demonstration to the public of the Government's arrogance.

The Prime Minister became very frisky the other day. He does not like being called a control freak. I assume that the Minister does not like being called a control freak either.

Mr. George Howarth: I never have been.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: In that case, the Minister does not understand the collective nature of government. The present Government are made up of control freaks: people who are arrogantly telling the country that, in regard to major legislation, they know better than the combined wisdom of the House of Commons. They will not even give the House of Commons an opportunity to examine this fundamental constitutional Bill. However the Minister wishes to slice it, that conveys an arrogant message to the people, who now understand that it is increasingly the Government's attitude.

In that sense, I welcome the motion. It is politically hamfisted. The Minister expects the House to look at a constitutional Bill and debate the timetable motion relating to it, all in four hours. That is the message that is being sent to the public. The issue is not the guillotine, or even the timetable. As the Minister will recall, when we debated the Bill in the last Session we discussed the amount of time that it would be appropriate to set aside to examine the issues. The Minister will, I think, be gracious enough to concede that we did not filibuster at any stage. We kept our word, and gave the Bill adequate consideration—and, having done so, we did not berate the Government for tabling it.

I give way to the Minister.

Mr. Howarth: I was not asking the right hon. Gentleman to give way, but as he has been kind enough to do so, let me say this. I confirm what he has said, but it rather contradicts the overall point that he is making. The Bill was given detailed consideration when it was dealt with in the House of Commons during the last Session.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: On the contrary. Only a few days ago, the Minister and I went to another place and heard Her Majesty introduce a new Session of Parliament. We heard a list of Bills that would constitute the business of the current Parliament. Although this Bill was not mentioned, it has been introduced, and the House has a right to scrutinise it.

If the Minister genuinely believed that an element of scrutiny had taken place that ought to be taken into account this time around, it would have been courteous of him—or the Home Secretary—to replicate the discussions in which we engaged during the last Session, in order to secure an arrangement. Ministers did not do that; instead, they sent the country a message conveying the Government's arrogance in tabling a motion allowing a total of four hours—including three hours for the guillotine debate—for discussion of every stage of a constitutional Bill.

[Sir Brian Mawhinney]

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush): I cannot allow the right hon. Gentleman to persist in his charge of arrogance, given that he served in one of the most arrogant Governments in recent history. I should also be interested to learn why the right hon. Gentleman felt perfectly able, in the last Government, to impose a list system on Northern Ireland.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: As the hon. Gentleman—better, perhaps, than most Members of Parliament—will recall, the legislation to which he refers was intended to enable parties—not individuals—to become involved in discussion, with a view to building on the foundations that we had laid for the Good Friday agreement. The nature of the passage of that legislation was different from the passage of this Bill. The hon. Gentleman, with his detailed knowledge of Northern Ireland, knows that and I hope that he is encouraged that I know it, and remember it, as well.

I give my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) a message. We have four hours, of which more than an hour has been used. I hope that Opposition Front Benchers will not play the Government's arrogant game and that, when the guillotine motion takes effect and we move to Second Reading, my right hon. and hon. Friends will give the Bill the detailed consideration that it deserves, as is appropriate to a Second Reading debate.

If that gets us to the end of four hours before the debate on Second Reading is completed, so be it. The message that will be sent to the country is that the Government are arrogant. The fact that we could not complete the debate on Second Reading, even though there was no hint of filibustering, would add weight to that charge of arrogance. This is a despicable motion, and I hope that the House rejects it.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): If I set off now, I could reach neither Skipton nor Ripon in four hours. If I had set off when the debate began, I could not have been in my constituency meeting people by the time that we had completed the entire consideration of a major constitutional Bill. That shows the extent of the discussion that we shall have.

The Home Secretary has only himself to blame for his situation. He began by treating the measure with the utmost flippancy, and he has ended by treating it as constitutional outrage. There has been no intermediate stage between the two—it is quite a transition. He began by reminding us that he was quite open to the idea of an open list, which is why we are so concerned, but it fell foul of the Belgian consideration. The House fell apart, having realised that because the Belgians use it, it is, almost by definition, something that cannot not be pursued. I am afraid that that is rather typical of some attitudes.

I have three concerns, and they are all to do with time. First, we need time to discuss three things that matter. Unlike some hon. Members, I believe that we need a European Parliament that enjoys legitimacy. It has a major role to play—a role that neither this House nor any national Parliament can play. As legislation in the European Union develops and becomes more complex, it has to be subject to scrutiny. We in this House try to play our role and try to play a complementary role to the European Parliament, as we should, but it will not do to bundle into this world—through a sort of Caesarean section imposed by a guillotine motion—Members of the European Parliament who do not have the legitimacy to do their job properly.

That is not the right way to deal with constitutional legislation. I have been in the job, and it is difficult enough to discharge one's responsibilities in the European Parliament without feeling that the whole thing has been pushed into a slightly contemnible existence.

This is happening against a background of the ethnic cleansing that has taken place in the Labour party, in respect of the purging of its lists. Selection in my party has not exactly been in disarray, but there have been one or two minor disagreements. No doubt selection in the Liberal party—using whatever jargon it needed to make sure that selection was man-woman-man-woman and perfectly matched to the latest social trends—went extremely well.

All of us would have a certain amount of fun and games if we had to go back to the first-past-the-post system, but the key is that we must have legitimacy for the Parliament. We need to discuss the fact that the Bill will impose institutional anonymity for MEPs, and impose it by guillotine.

The second reason why we need more time is because we have to reflect on the legitimacy of this House. It is a curious and slightly perverse coincidence that, only a week or so ago, we were discussing how to improve our scrutiny of European legislation, and the fact that we were not doing the job adequately and needed to do it better. Practically simultaneously, the guillotine motion has shown what we really feel about the scrutiny of European legislation—it is a secondary issue.

It is crucial that we be consistent with ourselves. I believe in scrutiny, by this House and by the European Parliament. We need equivalent legitimacy to do that job in the name of all our constituents.

Mr. Ian Stewart (Eccles): The right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) said that the measure had been adequately scrutinised. Does the right hon. Gentleman disagree with him?

Mr. Curry: Of course I disagree, for two reasons. First, the scrutiny was of the extremely narrow amendments that came back from the other place. Secondly, we are in a new Session. As far as I am aware, the constitutional rule of this House is that each Session is sufficient unto itself. I understand that only private Bills can roll across Sessions; we have not yet changed our rules.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that nothing about the imposition of the Parliament Acts requires a Bill to be guillotined in such a way when it comes back for consideration in a second Session?

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend, who has been a Member of the House for twice as long as me, is absolutely right. I am grateful for his remark.

The third reason why we need more time is that the Bill diminishes democracy in one obvious way—there will be no by-elections. We all know what a check by-elections are on Governments. Moods and circumstances change, and by-elections are massively inconvenient. We might wish that they did not happen.

The one crime that is even worse than openly dissenting from one's party is dying while a Member of this House, which is massively inconvenient for the Whips. I go to the gym so that I can be difficult by the former method rather than the latter, but by-elections are a useful check and their absence will lessen democracy.

A list system also lends itself to abuse. We used to have the list for the European Parliament, which is why the issue of time needs to be developed—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When we debate Second Reading, the right hon. Gentleman can put all those arguments. At the moment, we must talk about the narrow subject of the guillotine motion.

Mr. Curry: Thank you very much, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall merely offer an aperitif, in that we must be allowed time to consider how the measure could be disfigured. Continental politicians or the leaders of the party—

Mr. Soley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand that the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Lords has resigned. Could we have a statement from the Opposition about whether Conservative Front Benchers in the Commons are speaking for the Conservative party in the House of Lords any more, or are there two Conservative parties—one in the Lords and one here? Either way, it would assist the debate if we knew who is speaking for them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Only the Government have powers to make statements in the House.

Mr. Curry: Many accusations may be laid against me, but speaking for the Conservative Front Bench is not currently one of them. Therefore, I can continue.

The abuse of the system that can take place is that party leaders—significant political figures overseas—may lead the list and be Members of the European Parliament for 10 minutes before resigning. Did people vote to have Mr. Chirac, Mr. Giscard d'Estaing or Mr. Jospin resign after 10 minutes? Are we to lend ourselves to that manipulation of the lists, where people are merely spectators and are exploited? That is why time—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Only the right hon. Gentleman's last comment was relevant to the motion. He cannot put arguments about closed and open lists at this stage.

Mr. Curry: A talent in politics is to have the intuition to realise when an argument has been taken as far as circumstances permit. I shall therefore conclude.

The Government should have their business, but they should work for it. They should have the Bill, in the end, because that is democracy—but they should work for it. This serious constitutional measure breaks with tradition in our politics. It changes how we have naturally thought about the way in which our politics operate and the chemistry of the democracy that we defend. That is why we should give the Bill detailed scrutiny. The Government's imposition of this guillotine is an abuse of the spirit of the way in which things are done in this country.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills): There is an element of deja vu about these debates. What goes around, comes around. It is cheering to see Conservative Members solidly opposing the guillotine with such fire, and the extraordinary spectacle of the Home Secretary defending what I genuinely believe to be the worst written guillotine motion that has ever been put before the House.

To support his contention that this motion is desperately necessary, the Home Secretary invoked the words of Lord Biffen, when he was Leader of the House of Commons, during the passage of the European Communities (Amendment) Act 1986. I voted against the guillotine motion on that legislation, and I seem to remember that the Home Secretary also did so. The Home Secretary referred to it not because of his voting record, but because it was a constitutional measure. He wanted to show that this business motion is in tune with many previous business motions.

Many parents tell their children that, if something that was done before was wrong, doing it again does not make it right. That is an evident truth. However, the basis of the Government's argument is that the Conservative Government were wrong to impose that guillotine motion, but now that they are doing it on a constitutional issue it is right to do so. That is nonsense.

The difference between the European Parliamentary Elections Bill and the European Communities (Amendment) Bill of 1986 is important. This motion imposes a guillotine before we have had Second Reading and before we have had a stumble in Committee. It is not being imposed because the Report stage is manifestly being delayed wrongly. It is being imposed before we have even come to debate the issues in the Bill. That did not happen under what I believe was a profoundly wrong guillotine on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill, and that is the difference.

When has there been a similar guillotine motion?

Mr. Allan: I have listened to the hon. Gentleman with great care, because he is, by repute, good on such matters. I can point to another difference. The right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) announced before the Bill came to the House that he would show zero tolerance towards it and would do all that he could to obstruct it. How could we have had agreement on a sensible timetable given the Leader of the Opposition's comments?

Mr. Shepherd: The hon. Gentleman refers to a "sensible timetable", and that is the point. I am addressing the timetable motion before us—I hope within the terms of the Standing Orders. My proposition is that it is not a sensible timetable. As it is the only timetable I can refer to, the hon. Gentleman will understand why there is no way I can row in his boat.

What were comparable motions? I regret that the Home Secretary is following in the footsteps of my noble Friend, Lord Baker. The great precedent is that sterling piece of legislation, the Dangerous Dogs Act 1989, which was guillotined before Second Reading. That was an outrage. Under the terms of that motion, six hours were allowed for Second Reading, which included—as this motion does—the guillotine. The Committee of the whole House lasted for five hours and Report and Third Reading took one hour, so 12 hours were allowed to debate the Bill's contentions.

That Bill also had something that this Bill does not have; I regret to say that it had the support of all parties in the House. Lord Baker put to us an imperative, sent to him by those two trusty, Labour-supporting papers, The Sun and the Daily Mirror, which assured him that the nation was at risk of being consumed by dangerous dogs. As I recall through the mists of time, he wanted action this day on all stages, because he had identified that the summer was when bitches were in heat, and that a new breed would assault us before Christmas.

The Government have grasped the worst possible way of constructing a guillotine. I accept that the House does not necessarily share my reservations about guillotines. The Home Secretary has allowed three hours for debate on the guillotine motion and a vote. The Government are prepared to countenance the possibility that the debate on the guillotine and the vote will reduce the time allocated for Second Reading, Committee of the whole House, Report—we know that that will not be allowed—and Third Reading to 40 minutes. The Home Secretary's opening speech took half an hour. He was generous in giving way, which is proper because these are sensitive and difficult matters, but that was at the expense of the debate and vote. That is why this is a vile and outrageous motion. The Government are seriously contemplating taking all the stages of this Bill in the short time of 40 minutes.

Assuming that we get through Second Reading, we would then consider the reasonable amendments that have been tabled, such as those dealing with by-elections. That matter is relevant and concerns many people. We may want to divide on such an amendment. The Home Secretary has barely stood up; we will have a vote; the business will be over and the Bill shipped to the Lords. That cannot be right. We are adults.

We represent people, and we understand the processes. I understand the fight between the Opposition and the Government, because those matters touch on the electoral process, on the people whom we represent and on why we are chosen to represent people. The Government are prepared to condense the debate into 40 minutes at the most. That is the proposition on the Order Paper. They may have hoped that the debate on the guillotine would be over in a minute or two, so that we would have had four hours for the rest of the proceedings. We should reflect on that. We would have had four hours to debate a Bill affecting our parliamentary electoral system and the nature of representative democracy in comparison with 12 hours devoted to the Dangerous Dogs Bill.

That legislation never did the Conservative Government much good. Some hon. Members may remember the long line of people who came to tell us that their favoured and loved mutt was not what other people claimed it was. The new law bedevilled the courts. I do not think that Lord Baker of Dorking would include in his learned range of interests on his curriculum vitae the fact that he introduced the guillotine on the Dangerous Dogs Bill.

I do not want to think of the Home Secretary in that context, but he has introduced the Dangerous Dogs European Elections Bill, and it does not do him justice. This process has become almost farcical, and it denigrates the Chamber. I am seeking to get just some glimmer of sympathy from Labour Members. We know that there is no problem on the Bill. The 1911 Act is being invoked, which is in accordance with the constitution. That is the Government's position.

The previous Government acted in a similar manner with the War Crimes Bill and that did not create great excitement. This Government have insisted on playing ping-pong with the House of Lords. After the second time the Bill returned they could have announced their intention to invoke the 1911 Act and the Bill would have proceeded on a proper course, in accordance with both our written constitution and the conventions of that constitution, but this is a play. [Interruption.] I am sorry, I do not understand. If the hon. Member for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall), the Labour Whip, wants to interrupt, I am prepared to sit down and listen to him. [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] There is no point in making that comment. We have a Deputy Speaker who keeps good order. Even during the worst days, when I was in fear of my life from my side, the Whips showed some form of courtesy in the discussion across the Floor of the House. I point out to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that there is a role here for you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is definitely a role for the Deputy Speaker. I ask hon. Members on both sides of the House to be quiet, but particularly the Whips.

Mr. Shepherd: I am grateful for your protection, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

This is part of a bigger game, a bigger play, to which we mere Back Benchers are not party. The Government's actions are an attempt to grab public opinion. Remember that part of the role of an Opposition is to try to cause delay; Oppositions have done it in the past. That is understandable because, ultimately, we will all stand in front of the electorate and be judged on the way in which we conduct ourselves. Unfortunately, many of my former colleagues have already been judged. That, in turn, will be the fate of this Government, so we should be more mindful about the processes in which we take part because they protect all the interests of all the people here.

It was only the Government who brought the Bill back, not the Opposition. The Government are invoking the 1911 Act. Given that the Bill had been rejected twice in the Lords, it would have been right to invoke that Act then, but we went through the farce five times, backwards and forwards, trying to see down their lordships. Now we are going to go through it again with the nonsense of trying to assert that there is a constitutional blockage. There is none and the Home Secretary knows it. That is why we have this outrageous, truly humiliating guillotine. It cannot be a serious guillotine.

Like most of the people of this country, I trust the Government. By and large, we want our Governments to succeed. We do not want them to fail, but to see such contempt for constitutional propriety is extraordinary.

Mr. George Howarth: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, in the previous Session—I accept that this is a new Session—the Bill, which is six clauses long, was debated for 34 hours and that the identical Bill has come back again? Does he not think that that should have some bearing on the way in which we deliberate on the matter?

Mr. Shepherd: I have weighed that up, but the point is that the Bill came back for debate on the narrow focus of Lords amendments. I never spoke during the entire consideration of the Bill. There was only one major discussion of it—Second Reading—and because of time constraints, I did not get called. That is not unusual, but what came back from the House of Lords were the narrow Lords amendments. That is what we have been discussing five times.

Now the Bill has been re-presented in a new Session of Parliament in its entirety but, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), there is an omission from the amended form—the Government's only amended form: the review mechanism after the elections. That is now omitted, for reasons that we understand. The Government may wish to include it again, but they cannot because they are trapped by the 1911 Act. We understand that, but it is not us who have made the fuss. It is the Government.

I understand why the Government may want to obscure the issues behind this matter with their intentions on the House of Lords, but they have their mandate on that. They will get what they want on the House of Lords; no one doubts that either. Our question on that has always been where is the check and balance, and what will be the second stage of that reform? That is a perfectly reasonable question to pose in political debate.

As I said at the start, in the middle and towards the end of my speech, this is a thoroughly bad guillotine. If we do stand for something, and we are all judged, as I tried to show, as individu.. Members of Parliament, we should have a word to say about the proper processes of this House. Leastways, let us have amendments and properly discuss the matter.

The amendments that were mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) are worthy of discussion. I hope that the House has respect for that and that the Government reflect that this is nonsense. Even at this late stage, they can move to make the process more acceptable to all hon. Members.

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush): Although I have missed some of the debate, for which I apologise, I have heard more than enough to convince me that there is a case to speak on the guillotine motion, which is causing so much distress among Conservative Members. I will refer to the comments of the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) in a moment. I know his views on this very well; I have some sympathy for the general thrust of his argument, although not on this issue.

If anything, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary should stand condemned for doing too much to help the Conservative party by getting the Bill through as fast as possible. If the Leader of the Conservative party in the House of Lords has resigned because he is trying to do a deal to try to cope with the problems that the party in here has caused him—

Miss Melanie Johnson: He was sacked.

Mr. Soley: Sorry, he was sacked; that is right. I am never sure whether they use a guillotine in the House of Lords, but, if he has been sacked, fair enough. What we knew full well is that the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Lords was saying one thing, and the leader of the Conservative party in here was saying something entirely different. I would have thought that the guillotine would do them a favour by getting the Bill through as fast as possible and out of the way, with the least possible embarrassment.

Let us consider the Back Benchers' role, which is what genuinely concerns the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills. As we all know, this is a battle between the Lords and the Commons. It involves the rights of this elected Chamber on a certain issue, which the Conservative party in the House of Lords, using its in-built majority, has sought to push back here time and again. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), was accurate in his intervention. This Bill has already been debated in the previous Session.

I think that one Conservative Member referred to that debate being in the previous Parliament. If that had been the case, Conservative Members would be right about providing adequate time for debate because Parliament would be full of new Members—or there would be many new Members. The previous Session, however, was attended by the same people as are present during this one; they had the same debate on the same issues for more than 30 hours. People outside do not understand it when hon. Members spend 30-odd hours on a fairly narrow issue: in this case, proportional representation.

There are many different forms of proportional representation throughout the world—closed lists, open lists and others—all of which have their advantages and disadvantages. They are all relevant. None is totally bad, any more than the first-past-the-post system is totally bad. They all have merits and problems, but the point is that to debate that matter over and again is nonsense and we know it.

There is one problem for Back Benchers; the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills is an example of it par excellence. I know that he has frequently been in a minority of one in his party and I respect him for that. The problem for Back Benchers is that they want to use time to challenge the Government. I have had this debate with the hon. Gentleman before, but tonight I extend it to his party, to which I offer some advice. It has had about 18 months in opposition. I had 18 years of it and much of that time was spent trying to prove that time was the best weapon that I had against a Government with a big majority. As the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) knows full well, it very rarely worked. As for my contributions on the issue of time, even when I was making the best case possible, it was the painful elaboration of the obvious. I would repeat it time and time again in the hope that one day the Government would say, "My God he's right. Why don't we do what he says? It is so sensible." Of course, it does not work like that. Sometimes one can get a Government to change but very rarely by the exercise of time, unless they are up against the end of the Parliament or Session.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: The hon. Gentleman's expositions were always excellent, they just were not persuasive.

Mr. Soley: The right hon. Gentleman is kind but if they were excellent, I should have had some credit for it. Even one or two amendments would have been appreciated.

As the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills knows, I sympathise with his frustration about the declining power—not role, but power—of Back Benchers. He is right that there is a problem, but as I have told him elsewhere, the issue is about timetabling. As I have said before, having learned the painful lesson over 18 years, there is a real advantage for Back Benchers in good timetabling. That needs to be agreed between parties. The problem in this case is that we cannot have a normal timetabling programme because of how the matter was handled in the previous Session and because it is part of a much bigger battle between the House of Lords and House of Commons. We need to get the Bill through, and without any more messing about.

Given all the debate in the previous Session, and as we know full well what the issue is, and as the issue has already caused enormous problems in the Tory party, the Opposition should be trying to get the Bill through. I was in Brussels the other week at the European Commission. Conservative Members of the European Parliament were saying, "For God's sake, don't give us first past the post at the European elections." One reason is that many more of them would lose their seats. The other reason that they are worried about what is happening here is that they fear that the Conservative party is trying to marginalise those of its members who are sympathetic to Europe, such as the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry). He referred to institutionalised anonymity. For a terrible moment, I thought that he was referring to the Leader of the Opposition.

The problem for the Conservative party with its MEPs is real because they do not want first past the post. They would like this Bill to go through and to have a list system precisely because they know that in large constituencies where Members are not known, it is better—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Some hon. Members have been given some leeway, so I have given the hon. Gentleman some. However that leeway must finish because we must get on.

Mr. Soley: I had anticipated your intervention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, though not quickly enough. I simply note that Conservative MEPs would like the guillotine to work to get them off the hook.

The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills has a genuine point about the power of Back Benchers. As I have told him often before, constantly talking at Governments does not work. I have 18 years of intensive experience to prove it. What works is good timetabling of Bills, giving plenty of allowance to the Opposition, taking evidence about Bills and all the other things that we have discussed on the Modernisation Committee, on which we both serve. They also make more sense to people outside.

We have had more than 30 hours of debate on the issue. The fact that this is a new Session does not mean that those words were wasted or that those who spoke had nothing to say but that we have had that debate and need to move on. I end as I began: we need to move on, if nothing else for the sake of the Conservative party and its various parts in the House of Lords.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): I have sat through many of the 34 hours of debate, so hon. Members will not accuse me of coming new to the issue. Three myths are being propagated about this guillotine motion. The first was perpetuated by the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley). It is the idea that this is all about a debate between this House and the upper House. It is not; it is a debate on a guillotine motion strictly confined to the question of how much time should be allowed for debate of this Bill in this House before we send it back to another place. It is then for another place to determine how to deal with it in the light of the events of the previous Session.

The second myth is that the Bill had all the attention that it needs during previous debates. Let me instance two respects in which that is not true. Firstly, my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) rightly pointed out that on Second Reading on 25 November 1997, the Home Secretary left his mind open on open and closed lists. Interestingly, it was on 9 March, before Report and Third Reading, that he told the House that he opposed open lists and favoured closed lists; the Committee had concluded its deliberations on 5 March. The Home Secretary came back to the House when only one day's debate was left for open and closed lists.

Although the Committee was able to examine the Bill, it was not examined on the basis of the Home Secretary's final decision on open and closed lists or of his explanation for the decision. Although lists were debated several times in this House, much of the debate was on whether we agreed or disagreed with the Lords in their amendments, not on whether this House wanted to substitute a different form of open list from that chosen in another place.

Mr. Allan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: I shall in a moment because the hon. Gentleman understands my point perfectly well. In Committee, the Liberal Democrats proposed a Belgian list system, which the Home Secretary wished to consider. That was not the system sent back to this House by their lordships, which was a perfectly viable alternative open-list system that was not then debated at length in this House.

Mr. Allan: The hon. Gentleman noted our amendment but there was a Committee in the other place in June in which the issue was debated at length. A vote on open lists was taken and lost. At that point, many sensible hon. Members realised that the decision had been taken and the argument lost.

Mr. Lansley: That is a weak argument with a weak defence. The Labour and Liberal Democrat coalition on the matter has moved to the defence that we do not need to debate it in this House because there was a debate in another place. That will not do. The debate on open lists has still not taken place to a satisfactory extent in this House for the simple reason that we have not had an opportunity to move a series of different amendments. Because of the way in which the debate on the amendments moved by the Lords took place, questions such as those that I raised about the form—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The only hon. Member who has kept to the guillotine motion was the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd). Every other hon. Member has gone on to matters that could easily be brought up on Second Reading. I ask the hon. Gentleman to take a leaf out of the book of the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills.

Mr. Lansley: My purpose is straightforward and I shall be as brief as I can. I want to show that there are valid reasons for allowing greater time for this debate because these matters have not yet been satisfactory debated in this House. I shall not dwell on open and closed lists because I have shown by reference to the timetable so far that debate has not taken place in this House in the open-ended form in which it should have.

The third myth—the Government's third false statement—was the Home Secretary's assertion that we are dealing now with exactly the same Bill. Earlier in the debate, I made the point, which was developed by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge–Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), that we are not dealing with the Bill that was sent back to the other place with an amendment on reviewing the electoral system. Although I realise that Ministers will say that we are not dealing with that Bill because of the requirements of the Parliament Act 1911, it begs the question—if the Government persist in their intention of using closed lists—in what form should the Bill be sent back to the other place? Should it be sent back specifying closed lists and no review, or with a review? What intentions do the Government have to amend the Bill further in the other place?

I hope to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on Second Reading to elaborate on the point that we are not dealing with exactly the same Bill that we debated for all those hours in the previous Session. Not only have recent events, for example, the European parliamentary by-election in Scotland, suggested a valid need for amendments on by-elections—and we have not debated such amendments—but attached to the Bill is an explanatory memorandum differing from that which applied to the Bill that the House considered in the previous Session.

The Minister will know that, with the enactment of the Human Rights Act 1998, Ministers must now make a statement in a Bill's explanatory memorandum on its compatibility with the European convention on human rights. The Home Secretary made such a statement of compatibility on 26 November—therefore, after the point at which the House could have debated the previous Bill.

The point—which we shall debate subsequently, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I am merely trying to demonstrate that there is a point of real substance—is that article 3 of the first protocol of the European convention on human rights, which was brought into force by the Human Rights Act 1998, states:

"The High Contracting Parties undertake to hold free elections at reasonable intervals by secret ballot,"— so far so good—

"under conditions which will ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature."

It is entirely debatable whether the Bill is compatible with that convention provision, and whether voters will be able to express an opinion on issues such as the moral stance taken by a party's candidates on issues of conscience or to express freely their opinions on the choice of candidate presented by a party. It is far from demonstrable that the Home Secretary is right on the matter.

After passage of the Human Rights Act 1998, the important issue for the House to decide is whether it is right for us to pass this legislation in the form in which the Government are proposing it. If I catch your eye on Second Reading, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope to elaborate on that argument.

In only a few moments, I have demonstrated that—in addition to the amendments that my hon. Friends have tabled, which should be debated, but for which the Government have allowed inadequate time—a range of issues should be addressed.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Nigel Waterson and Mr. Stephen Day.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That the following provisions shall apply to proceedings on the European Parliamentary Elections Bill:

Timetable

1. Proceedings on Second Reading, in Committee, on Consideration and on Third Reading shall be completed at the sitting this day and shall be brought to a conclusion, if not previously concluded, four hours after the commencement of proceedings on this Motion.

Questions to be put

2. When the Bill has been read a second time—

(a) it shall, notwithstanding Standing Order No. 63 (Committal of Bills), stand committed to a Committee of the whole House without any Question being put,

(b) proceedings on the Bill shall stand postponed while the Question is put, in accordance with Standing Order No. 52(1) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills), on any financial resolution relating to the Bill,

(c) on the conclusion of proceedings on any financial resolution relating to the Bill, proceedings on the Bill shall be resumed and the Speaker shall leave the Chair whether or not notice of an instruction has been given.

3. On the conclusion of proceedings in Committee the Chairman shall report the Bill to the House without putting any Question and, if he reports the Bill with amendments, the House shall proceed to consider the Bill as amended without any Question being put.

4. For the purpose of bringing any proceedings to a conclusion in accordance with paragraph 1 the Speaker or Chairman shall forthwith put the following Questions (but no others)—

(a) any Question already proposed from the Chair;

(b) any Question necessary to bring to a decision a Question so proposed;

(c) the Question on any amendment moved or Motion made by a Minister of the Crown;

(d) any other Question necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded.

5. On a Motion made for a new Clause or a new Schedule, the Chairman or Speaker shall put only the Question that the Clause or Schedule be added to the Bill.

Miscellaneous

6. Standing Order 15(1) (Exempted business) shall apply to proceedings on the Bill at the sitting this day; and the proceedings shall not be interrupted under any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

7. The proceedings on any Motion made by a Minister of the Crown for varying or supplementing the provisions of this order shall, if not previously concluded, be brought to a conclusion one hour after commencement; and the Standing Order No. 15(1) shall apply to those proceedings.

8. Standing Order No. 82 (Business Committee) shall not apply in relation to proceedings on the Bill.

9. No Motion shall be made to alter the order in which any proceedings on the Bill are taken.

10. No dilatory Motion shall be made in relation to the Bill except by a Minister of the Crown.

11. If at the sitting this day a Motion for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 24 stands over to seven o'clock and proceedings on this Motion have begun before that time, the Motion for the Adjournment shall stand over until the conclusion of proceedings on the Bill.

12. If the House is adjourned at the sitting this day, or the sitting is suspended, before the conclusion of proceedings on the Bill, no notice shall be required, of a Motion made at the next sitting by a Minister of the Crown for varying or supplementing the provisions of this Order.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Today I have received a written answer from the Secretary of State for Health, who says that he will announce his decision on the closure of a hospital in my constituency "shortly". It turns out that he announced it today and has embargoed the announcement so that he can be photographed in the local newspaper tomorrow with the neighbouring Labour Member of Parliament, who does not have the hospital in his constituency. That seems to me to be an abuse of the House. The decision should have been announced to me as the local Member of Parliament. The Secretary of State refused to see me, the person in whose constituency the hospital is, but saw the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Cann), who happens to be a member of his party. In 16 years as a Minister, I never did anything of that sort to a member of the Opposition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I am sorry about the right hon. Gentleman's difficulties, but that is not a matter for me. The right hon. Gentleman has been in the House for a long time; he will know how to proceed.

Orders of the Day

European Parliamentary Elections Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

When I moved the guillotine motion earlier, I said that there was little new to be said about the Bill. As the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) more eloquently put it, the time for debate is over and the time has come to make a decision. That is the truth of the matter. I have here copies of the Official Report of the debates in the other place and this House on this short—albeit important—Bill. The debates fill many columns. Indeed, we have debated the matter on six or more occasions. We had not only a full day on Second Reading, as we should have done, but three days in Committee on the Floor of the House and a further day on Report and Third Reading.

We were committed at the general election to introducing a proportional system for elections to the European Parliament. So, too, as I said in the debate on the guillotine motion, were the Liberal Democrats. Like everything else in our manifesto and in those parts of the Liberal Democrat manifesto that were coincidental, that proposal received a substantial vote of approval by the British people.

No electoral system is perfect. That was all that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said when, as Leader of the Opposition, he commented on the introduction by the Conservative party of closed lists to the Northern Ireland forum in 1996—I have to remind Conservative Members of their two-faced position on closed lists. The hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) may sigh, as though I should not mention it—

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): It is tedious.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman, unable to think of anything else to say, claims that it is tedious. The moment the Conservatives admit that it was they who first introduced closed lists for an electoral system in the United Kingdom, we can have consensus on the issue and they can recognise the extraordinary position into which they have manoeuvred themselves.

One can understand why the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) was slightly twitchy during the debate on the guillotine motion. As he was speaking, he was no doubt wishing that he had been present at the emergency meeting of the shadow Cabinet that was called to consider a further consequence of the Opposition's extraordinary tactics in seeking to abuse the Salisbury principles and to override the will of the House of Commons. Talk about pushing one's luck too far. The Conservatives have completely overreached themselves—the whole tactic has blown up in their faces.

As I said, no electoral system is perfect, so one has to balance advantages. For reasons that I shall explain, we believe that the closed-list system best balances the advantages for the European Parliament.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Does the Home Secretary recall that, in debating the measure in the previous Session, the leader of the Conservative party and his Front-Bench colleagues regaled us with a great deal of information about the supreme wisdom and judgment of Conservative hereditary peers and, indeed, all Conservative members of the other House? Will he comment on the judgment that they have shown today?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. The Home Secretary may want to do that, but not here. Perhaps he will do so outside the Chamber.

Mr. Straw: I shall certainly not abuse your authority, Mr. Deputy Speaker—I have known you too long even to try. Before you pull me up, however, I shall say that lawyers know of the doctrine of estoppel. Given what has happened, the argument that those in the other place have shown great wisdom does not entirely lie in the mouths of Conservative Front Benchers.

The European Parliament is different from the Westminster Parliament. The Westminster Parliament exists primarily to sustain a Government and—an honourable function for most of the time—Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. The European Parliament is not an executive body—the Executive is not drawn from it—but primarily a representative body. We believe that it is entirely reasonable that the representatives in the European Parliament—who are, in any case, only one of 15 groups of representatives drawn from all the European Union member states—should be broadly representative of the people of Great Britain. That is better achieved by a system of proportional representation.

As I said on Second Reading on 25 November, and despite the reasonably well-known fact that I see some advantage in first past the post for Westminster, the small number of Members of the European Parliament to which we are entitled—less than 100—and the huge constituencies that we have had to create have meant that that system has failed to achieve a representative result.

I do not think that anyone can seriously argue that the huge constituencies have operated in such a way as to create the connection between the electorate and the elected Member that genuinely is a feature of the system for elections to Westminster. I pay tribute to the work of Members of the European Parliament of all parties, but they themselves say that, given the size of their constituencies and the fact that they have to spend so much time in Brussels and Strasbourg, their ability to make that connection is limited.

The issue that has caused the greatest argument across the Chamber—it is why we are debating the Bill this evening—is the form of the list system. I am glad that, in the dialectical process, we at least achieved unanimity on using in the counting system the divisors invented by our old and now famous friend Victor d'Hondt rather than those invented by Sainte-Lague or even those in the modified version of Sainte-Lague.

For those who, like me, take a real interest in these issues, I add that in America—where there have been great debates about proportional representation systems, even though such systems are not often used there—the d'Hondt and the Sainte-Lague systems have different names. One is called Webster, although I cannot remember which one, and I forget the other name. For those who are interested—

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Straw: One second. I always try to ensure in these debates that more information is imparted. Cambridge, Massachusetts, has a system of proportional representation, whereas Louisiana, reflecting its French heritage, has a majoritarian system similar to the one that operates in France.

Mr. Linton: I thank my right hon. Friend for giving way. Before he is given the golden anorak award for being the greatest expert on counting systems, will he accept that the correct name for the d'Hondt system is the highest-average system and the correct name for the Sainte-Lague system is the rounding-up system? The habit of naming such systems after their inventors rather obscures their simplicity.

Mr. Straw: I am afraid that I shall give my hon. Friend only a bronze award for trying, as I do not think that he is correct. The principal difference that has concerned hon. Members lies in the numbers in the divisors. The d'Hondt system divisors go 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, the unmodified Sainte-Lague system divisors go 1, 3, 5, 7, 9 and—as everyone will recall—the modified Sainte-Lague system divisors go 1.4, 3, 5, 7, 9. Hon. Members should know by now—I am happy to give an anorak to anyone who can tell me—why the modified Sainte-Lague system starts with 1.4.

Mr. Linton: I shall be receiving the silver anorak award. Those mathematical formulae only obscure the point that a divisor of 1, 3, 5, 7 is another way in which to describe the simple process of taking an average, as hon. Members will discover if they try it on the back of an envelope—it is the process by which one rounds up. The point of starting with 1.4 is to avoid what was discovered to happen when the system was first used—that a party with only 5 per cent. of the vote could have its vote rounded up to 10 per cent. and so win a seat. Starting with 1.4 provides an effective threshold.

Mr. Straw: I award my hon. Friend a second-hand anorak for that. As we all know, 1.4 is the square root of two.

At Second Reading, I sought to be open-minded on the exact list system—as I have tried to be on many Bills, as I hope my record makes clear. That has been held against me. The closed-list system was in the Bill. I said that that was our preference, but that we were open to argument. I made no undertaking that we would change our mind, but I said that we would listen to the argument. Indeed, we did—we examined it in great detail. In the event, we came down against the so-called Belgian system, and against the open-list system.

It adds no strength to the argument of the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield to criticise us for not being willing to listen to the argument. We took part in considerable debate about the matter. Had the argument been slightly more weighted on one side, we might have gone for the Belgian system. In the event—and for the reasons that I explained in February or March—we decided not to do so.

We felt that the open-list system, proposed by the Opposition, would produce the worst consequences of all. It would not provide people with voter choice. It is called an open-list system, but a proper open-list system ensures that there are as many votes as there are vacancies on the ballot paper. Under the Conservatives' back-of-the-envelope proposals, even if there are 11 vacancies—as there will be in one region—there can be only one vote. Therefore, how does one express a preference for the other 10 candidates who are to be elected? The Opposition cannot explain how that will be sorted out.

The Opposition must face the fact that one consequence of their proposal is that somebody in one party who gets 500,000 votes may not be elected, while someone in another party who gets 300,000 votes is elected. The British public will not regard that as fair or explicable.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): What is the point of having regions at all? If the people will not play a part in deciding who is elected, why do we not have a national list and a national voting system?

Mr. Straw: We could have a national list, and it is perfectly fair to say that some European countries have such a system. I must tell the hon. Gentleman that there has not been a great deal of argument about this point. However, we judged that it was better and fairer to operate the system in regions, but to have national lists in Scotland and Wales. It is a balanced argument—it is not a huge issue of principle one way or the other. A national list would increase the chances of a small extremist party gaining not only support, but Members. That would be an argument against it, but this is not an issue on which people have been engaged.

In my region, people have a strong sense of place for Knowsley, Liverpool, Manchester or Blackburn, but they also have a sense that they are part of the north-west region. Interestingly, that is partly due to the development since the 1950s of commercial television. People's sense of regional identity—even in England—is strong, and it is reasonable to reflect that in the system.

We are told that the closed-list system is a complete abberation and is undemocratic. However, it is used by the majority of voters within the EU—it is used in France, Germany, Greece, Portugal and Spain. We know that, generally, the Conservatives are European-haters. However, the implication of what they are saying is that, in all those countries, the people are not interested in democracy. I do not accept that argument, and their experience has, on the whole, been satisfactory.

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge): By-elections are a subject close to my heart. I cannot see how it can be democratic that, three or four years into a term, the electors of a region do not have the opportunity to choose—if they want to—someone from a different party. I also wonder what would happen in the case of someone crossing the Floor, as it were—I do not know what one does in the European Parliament. Would that person have to resign his seat?

Mr. Straw: That matter will come up in discussion on the amendments later. The hon. Gentleman's point would be entirely fair if what we were sustaining in the European Parliament was a Government. I readily accept that by-elections play an important part in regulating the conduct of the Government, and in giving the electorate an opportunity—on the random, but reasonably frequent, occasions that they arise—to send a message to the Government and to Opposition parties. However, those arguments do not apply in terms of a representative Assembly. It is not the case that by-elections in the countries concerned have caused difficulty, and I do not think that they will here.

No system is perfect, and this is about the balance of advantage. Given the nature and function of the European Parliament, it is more important to ensure that it is broadly representative than to accommodate the prospect of by-elections. On the occasions when by-elections have taken place, the earth has not moved—[Interruption.] Not even in Scotland, where there was a 20 per cent. turnout and 80 per cent. stayed away. In Merseyside, we had the lowest-ever turnout in any by-election—11 per cent.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere): There was one that was lower.

Mr. Straw: I bow to the hon. Gentleman's superior wisdom.

The Opposition should have some humility about the system before they try to elevate it into some great moral principle. The Conservative Government introduced closed lists for the Northern Ireland forum.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Straw: No, with great respect; I am just about to finish.

The Conservatives can wriggle as much as they like, but they proposed the closed-list system for Northern Ireland, which is part of the UK. It may have been for a particular purpose—this system also is for a particular purpose. At the time, the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), said that the closed-list system was fair and reasonable. If it was fair and reasonable then, it is fair and reasonable now.

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): I can see why the Home Secretary is so keen on a guillotine. Even by his own standards, that was not a persuasive speech. Calling in aid the constitution when he is bludgeoning the Bill through in a few hours will not persuade even his most uncritical supporters. Nor do I think that any of us finds his argument on Northern Ireland at all convincing, given the situation when my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), the then Prime Minister, made it clear that the system was for the special circumstances of Northern Ireland.

Let there be no question about it—the debate on the Bill has gone overwhelmingly against the Government. Labour Member of Parliament after Labour Member of Parliament has spoken against it. However, let me tell the House who has done the best destructive hatchet job on the proposals in the Bill.

The other day, the Home Secretary chided me for a book that I had written. The Home Secretary has not written a book, as far as I know. If he has, it was remaindered before I got to it. However, he has written articles. His House of Commons file is stuffed full of them, including one for The Times, entitled "What's So Fair About PR?", dated 4 August 1985. What is significant about the article is not so much the general view as the particular views that he put forward, which go to the heart of the Bill.

In the article, the Home Secretary said:

"Where PR is based on a list system, with votes effectively cast for a party, and the winning candidates taken, pro rata, from each party's list, power passes from the individual constituency party to those who draw up the list."

That, of course, is precisely the case that we have put throughout the debate.

Under a list system, power is transferred from the people to the party organisation. I have made that point, as have the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), and now we know that the Home Secretary agrees with it.

When the Home Secretary wrote the article, he was observing the position in France. He noted that the system had caused a major battle between national and regional parties, with the latter objecting to the "parachuting in" of national candidates without roots in their area.

Again, that is precisely the point that we have been making. That is precisely the case in the west midlands, where an EastEnders actor who appeared at the Birmingham rep is preferred over the local candidate, who may be politically incorrect but possibly knows something about the west midlands.

The Home Secretary then turned to the Liberal Democrats and our old friend Roy Jenkins, if I may be so familiar. He said, correctly, as the Social Democratic party—of happy memory—and the Liberals were about to hold their conferences, that we would be in for two weeks of high-flown phrases about the superior morality and fairness of proportional representation and the way in which it can lead, as Roy Jenkins said, to greater stability of national direction of policy.

The Home Secretary then said:

"It is not an argument which I have ever found convincing. It is giving legitimacy to the semi fascist and overtly racialist French National Front"

I am not sure that I go all the way with that argument, but as it is directed at Liberal Democrats I will not quibble over the details.

Then the Home Secretary produced an entirely new argument. He said:

"There is the inconvenient little fact of Hitler."

I have debated the Bill four or five times—it seems more—and even I have not adduced Hitler in argument, but according to the Home Secretary, the "inconvenient little fact" is that Hitler

"rose to power in the Weimar republic which used a very respectable system of PR. I do not suggest that any other system would have prevented his rise. I do assert that PR did not prevent it—yet moderation and stability is the large and wild claim made for this system by our own centre parties."

I do not believe that any Minister could have more effectively demolished the case for a Bill that he has introduced. The Bill does all the things that he previously condemned. That is why it has been so condemned by his colleagues. The hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson) took courage this afternoon and made a speech that I believe was intended to be in favour of the Government, but she must be joking if she thinks that the Bill has been overwhelmingly supported by her colleagues.

On October 27, the Bill was attacked by the hon. Members for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) and for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). On another occasion, the hon. Member for Wrexham said:

"At the end of the day, if I have the choice, I am an open-list person."

In case we were in any doubt, the hon. Member for Walsall, North reiterated his position. He said:

"I am not in favour of the closed-list system, I have never voted for it and I do not intend to do so tonight."—[Official Report, 10 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 222-28.]

On 16 November, the closed-list system was effectively demolished bit by bit by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield. He was supported by the hon. Members for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) intervened to support the Government—I think—but his support was qualified by his later confession. When challenged, he said:

"I would prefer an open-list system, but I gave the rationale for a closed-list system."—[Official Report, 16 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 701.]

Not perhaps the most overwhelming support in principle that we have heard.

On 18 November, the Bill was attacked by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie), and the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) said:

"I shall support the Government tonight even though I am 150 per cent. committed to the first-past-the-post system."

The hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) sought to make a helpful intervention. He proclaimed:

"The closed-list system ensures that women and people from ethnic minorities can have their rightful place in the list."

Unfortunately for him, the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) was sitting directly in front of him at the time. She said:

"As a woman from an ethnic minority who succeeded under first past the post, I ask my hon. Friend whether he thinks that the closed-list system proposed tonight would be passed in the House on a free vote."

The hon. Member for Swansea, East rather weakly replied:

"I am not a Whip . . . and my arithmetic is very bad, so I would not like to answer that question."—[Official Report, 18 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 979–81.]

So it goes on. The prize for the most fatuous comment and stance goes, I regret to say, to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan). Attempting to define the Liberal Democrats' position, he said:

"My party's position remains consistent. Our preferred option is neither a Belgian nor a Finnish model, but one closer to home—the Northern Irish model of the single transferable vote."—[Official Report, 27 October 1998; Vol. 318, c. 183.]

[Sir Norman Fowler]

The hon. Gentleman spent the whole debate voting for the closed-list system.

The Government are putting power into the hands of the party, not the public. Outside candidates, with no local roots, are being "parachuted in", to use the Home Secretary's phrase. The public are being given no choice. The Bill does away with the public's right to choose a candidate and abolishes by-elections if a candidate resigns or defects.

The Home Secretary justifies all that with a series of arguments that, frankly, convince almost no one but his Front-Bench colleagues; and they probably do not convince even them. He reveals an obsession with candidates being parachuted into constituencies—he was at it again on Monday when he accused Conservative central office of doing it at the general election—but who, may I ask, is the biggest political parachutist of them all? How did he get his seat? He inherited it. He was special adviser to Lady Castle, and when she moved on to Europe, she bequeathed it to him in her living will.

It is becoming a quaint old custom for Labour Ministers to look after their special advisers. Lady Castle gave the Home Secretary her seat. He cannot do the same for his special adviser, Norman Warner, so he puts him in the House of Lords: new Labour, new hereditary principle.

Mr. Straw: I am enjoying the right hon. Gentleman's speech—which makes a change. Leaving aside the fact that, as it happens, I was selected in Blackburn fair and square without Lady Castle being present, he has just accepted that the party, not the people of Blackburn, chose me. There we have it: an admission that a closed list of one operated. What is his argument?

Sir Norman Fowler: The right hon. Gentleman has not in any way dented my case. My admission is that he was parachuted into Blackburn from outside; I believe that he stood at Tonbridge and Malling in the preceding election.

The Bill is bad by any standards. It is detested both by Conservative Members and, frankly, by many Labour Members. The Government complain about the Lords, but the Lords have challenged only the worst feature of the Bill: the closed-list system. In that, I believe, they are supported by the majority of the public.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Norman Fowler: If the right hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will not.

The Bill goes to the heart of our constitution: it determines how an important election is to be fought. It is wrong in principle and contrary to what the majority of people in this country want. That is why it should be rejected.

8.9 pm

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): Far from feeling concern that the Labour party has not accepted all aspects of the Bill with open arms, we are comforted by that fact. We are also comforted by the fact that the Home Secretary has changed his position. A simple dogmatic statement of principle at one point in one's life, followed by resistance to any further change, does not contribute much to the body politic.

We welcome the Bill, as we welcomed it during the previous Session, as an important part of the implementation of an agreement that was reached before the election by my right hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) and the Foreign Secretary on a programme of constitutional change. That was a ground-breaking agreement and we have been impressed with the way in which it has worked since to deliver significant benefits for the people of this country, by demonstrating that politicians can work together for the common good rather than simply throw brickbats at each other on every possible occasion.

Fair votes for Europe are vital. The Home Secretary mentioned representation and the fact that we have caused an imbalance throughout Europe. He said that treaties have stated that we should have proportional representation because it is unfair on the European Union if we send an unbalanced delegation to the European Parliament. This Bill offers a chance to reverse the low turn-outs in European elections. Far from decrying the system, we believe that the Opposition parties, in particular the Liberal Democrats and the Conservatives, have an enormous incentive to get people to vote. In many parts of the country, including the Yorkshire and Humberside area, those votes will count as they have never counted before, so the fair vote issue is important and will bring considerable benefits, as well as meeting those treaty obligations.

We want to be more positive. The Conservative approach has been somewhat schizophrenic. The Conservatives say that the system is appalling and that no one will vote, but they also think that they may pick up a seat or two. There seems to be a conflict between the two objectives.

We have enjoyed the contributions to the debate by the Home Secretary, in particular his lessons on history and geography, which have frequently taken us to Belgium. I fully accept the argument of the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) that we could have had a clearer explanation, but nothing brings a smile to the face in these lengthy debates as much as the mention of the word, "d'Hondt". I do not know why, but every time that anyone says that word, little grins and chuckles break out throughout the House. We have also enjoyed watching the Conservative party come, somewhat belatedly and not entirely willingly, to the constitutional agenda. They have got involved with some of the issues and debated them seriously, perhaps for the first time, as many Conservatives have studiously avoided such issues during their internal debates and they rarely brought them to the House when they were in government.

For the Liberal Democrats there are two key issues in choosing a voting system. The first is proportionality: there should be a close relationship between the votes cast and the people elected. The second is voter choice, which has characterised many of the debates. The present Bill clearly takes us a huge way forward as regards proportionality. It is vastly superior to the first-past-the-post system that we have had. We regret the fact that the Bill misses the opportunity to take us further forward with voter choice. We have expressed our preference and, whenever I have spoken, I have been asked our position by hon. Members intervening from both sides of the House. I have been able to say, every time, that our first preference is for a single transferable vote, which would avoid the problems of a single vote in the open system that the Conservatives have chosen. Failing that, we want more open systems.

However, unlike the Conservatives, we can accept that we did not win the last general election and that, having argued our point through the proper democratic procedures in this House and another place, if we then lose the debate or the vote, the Government have a right and a mandate to proceed with their business. It is not our duty to obstruct the Government on an issue on which we have had a fair hearing. We were pleased that the Home Secretary showed he had an open mind about open lists. He gave the argument a hearing, we discussed it and we voted in another place.

Unlike Conservative Members we work with our peers in another place. We are happy to share our decision-making processes, to use similar arguments in both places and to accept the result of the vote in another place. We are also mindful of the fact that we are more likely to win a vote there than here, given the arithmetic that prevails in this House. We were extremely disappointed that when we tabled an amendment on open lists in the other place at the appropriate time, Conservative peers—surprise, surprise—failed to turn out to support it and yet were later converted to the cause.

All the key issues in the Bill were discussed at length in the previous Session. For example, on regional constituencies, we successfully argued the case that a regional team would bring benefits for the structure of the European Union, gaining regional funds and so forth. We discussed the principles of proportional representation and by-elections—all the issues that have been raised again tonight were discussed.

While the Bill is not perfect, we were convinced of our position at the end of that previous process, which is that the system is workable. It is not perfect in every respect and it is not the system that the Liberal Democrats would choose if they were offered a blank sheet of paper, but it is workable and it is a significant improvement on the alternative, which is the present system.

Internal party procedures have been raised in relation to the Bill and selection has been a major issue. Many notable contributions from Labour Back Benchers have concerned that matter and Conservative Members have been happy to draw attention to the fact that unhappiness has been caused by selection in certain cases. There are major issues to be faced as regards the primaries, but they are not sufficient to block the passage of the Bill. One cannot say that a Bill that allows the United Kingdom electorate a fair vote should be blocked simply because one party has more problems with its internal selection processes than the other parties. That is an issue for that party to solve.

Mr. Beith: A number of Conservatives who took part in those vast hustings meetings have told me that they are wondering why the decisions that they took then might now be overturned by a return to the first-past-the-post system and a re-opening of constituency selections within their party, probably on a less democratic basis.

Mr. Allan: An ironic feature of the present situation is that it is fair to say that the candidates and those who have been selected for both the main Opposition parties have been selected by far more people than selected any of us in our single constituency contests. Many thousands of people took part and it was a reasonable test of opinion within those parties.

The Conservatives have trotted out their issue of high principle and, on many occasions, have tried to save us from doing the pragmatic thing. They have suggested that we should continue to stand to one side and bleat in the wilderness about high principle while not achieving any significant goals. We believe that it is better to support a Bill that would achieve some of our objectives than simply to stand by or positively to obstruct something that we want. The Conservatives have been negative throughout. Clearly, they want to fight any fair voting system at every stage of the way. Their position has been explicit. First past the post has favoured them for many years and they see it as their key to success. They want to fight any alternative.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): I should have thought that it was obvious from the lack of numbers on the Conservative Benches that the first-past-the-post system has not been fair to our party. The hon. Gentleman mentioned working together on a cross-party basis. Has he had a chance to read the report published today by the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs? That all-party Committee states in paragraph 91 of its report:

> "We feel that an open list would be more in keeping with the principle of trusting the people and giving them the maximum choice."

Mr. Allan: I do not disagree and the hon. Lady has moved me to my fourth point, which is the high principle on which the Conservatives have been working. That report probably reflects what happened with the Scottish and Welsh decisions. Conservative peers went to the limit and died in the ditch because closed lists are of such fundamental democratic importance and the principle cannot be breached, but they allowed the Scottish devolution Bill through, although I do not believe that the Labour party manifesto mentioned closed lists in connection with that measure. They also allowed the Welsh devolution system a passage and closed lists were not mentioned then. As the Home Secretary pointed out, they supported the system for Northern Ireland, for which closed lists were put forward.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) rose—

Mr. Allan: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment. I am sure that I will enjoy his contribution.

The Conservative spokesman in the other place, Lord MacKay of Ardbrecknish, seemed to recognise and accept in Committee that closed lists were not an insurmountable constitutional principle that they could not cross. He said that the Conservatives accepted that the Bill would be enacted as it was and that the most important thing was to have a review thereafter. However, amendments tabled in a spirit of compromise and co-operation in this House, were rejected because that acceptance seemed to disappear when the Conservatives felt that they could kill the Bill.

Mr. Swayne: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the debate about closed lists came alive only after the

[Mr. Swayne]

Scotland Bill had gone through? We began, then, to see the Labour party making its selections, and it was that example that brought the issue alive. Has the hon. Gentleman read the report of the Scottish Affairs Committee?

Mr. Allan: I know that the Conservative party can be rather slow on the uptake. The hon. Gentleman seems to suggest that the Conservatives had no knowledge of these issues before, and that the light has slowly dawned as we have gone through months of constitutional reform. If that is how the Conservative party works, I suggest that its members do their homework before Bills start rather than waiting until the very end to understand the issues that they have debated.

The opportunism of the—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is far too much noise in the Chamber. I must be able to hear the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Allan: The opportunism of the Conservative party has been breathtaking. I have heard it described as casuistry. I am not exactly sure of the definition of that word, but in Sheffield, we call it twisted. The Conservatives' twisting seems to have taken them to breaking point, and the stand that was taken—so nobly, so bravely—in the other place appears to have caused a rupture within the parliamentary party in the Lords. I hope that that signals that the Bill will, after tonight, receive an easy and sensible passage, despite irresponsible statements by Conservative Members, including the Leader of the Opposition, that they would seek to obstruct the will of more than 60 per cent. of the British people who voted for parties that supported a proportional system for the European elections. I hope that the Bill will proceed, and I urge the House to give it a fair wind.

8.21 pm

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe): I apologise to the spokesmen on both Front Benches for the fact that I probably shall not be here to listen to their responses, but I shall read them with great interest. The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) previously devoted three paragraphs of Hansard to requesting a speech from me. I am not accustomed to being in such demand, so I have hastened to oblige him. In the right hon. Gentleman's speech tonight, I heard more Labour speeches quoted than appear in a typical Millbank press release. We are grateful that he takes such interest in what Labour Back Benchers say. Long may it continue.

Unlike many hon. Members who have spoken against the Bill, I have lived and campaigned in countries that have had both open and closed lists. A point not much discussed is the effect that the open-list system can have on candidates. A candidate in an open-list system must not only assist the party, but ensure that he or she, personally, does better than other candidates on the party's own list. In practice, each candidate is forced to fight an expensive personal campaign in the media to persuade people to vote for him or her rather than the other candidates.

That has produced perverse results across the continent in areas in which the open-list system is practised. In effect, the system introduces the free market to democracy. We all favour openness and freedom, and, as new Labour, we all favour the free market, too. However, I do not think that many people favour a system that introduces a bias towards wealthy candidates who are able to attract support from wealthy backers.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): Putative Members of the European Parliament have limits on their election expenses, and those will not change. Wealthy backers cannot fund candidates to fight each other in the way suggested by the hon. Gentleman.

Dr. Palmer: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that point. It is possible to impose limits on both individual spending and party spending, and that is envisaged in the Bill. However, that gives a bonus to well known and wealthy candidates who are able to make themselves known before the election. That system naturally appeals to, say, Lord Archer, or to Conservative Members who have the resources and the contacts to make it possible that their individual campaigns can become known even before the election starts.

Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): It is absurd to say that only money buys votes. Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge the many other ways of becoming well known? One can work hard in one's constituency, deliver leaflets, run campaigns and get into the newspapers. None of that requires vast sums of money.

Dr. Palmer: I agree that those are relevant factors, and few Members of Parliament are unfamiliar with the type of activities that the hon. Gentleman mentions. However, he must agree that money has talked ever louder for political parties in British politics in recent years. With an open-list system, we would extend that so that money would also talk for individual candidates.

It is unsurprising if that idea sounds familiar, as it is a concept that used to apply in British politics. If you were a candidate in the 17th or 18th century, you could hope to succeed only if you were funded or had the ability to make yourself known more widely than poor candidates or people of limited income who had no friends. It may be natural that that system should appeal to hereditary peers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should avoid using the word "you", as that brings the Chair into his argument.

Dr. Palmer: I am grateful for that correction.

It is perhaps natural that a hereditary peer would appreciate such a system on the grounds that what was good enough for his ancestor is good enough for him. However, in Britain today, we seek advancement for individuals according to their talents, and through the activities mentioned by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Mr. Loughton). It would be a great shame if we gave an incentive to individual self promotion among candidates.

Political parties initially evolved for two reasons. One was so that people might coalesce around certain ideas and promote them when in Government. The other was that parties enabled individuals to seek and gain office purely through the power of ideas, with the political and financial support of the party. That has enriched British politics to an extent that would have been unimaginable if individual candidates had been forced—as they would be forced under an open-list system—to promote their own cause against the causes of other candidates from the same party.

We should recognise that some peers have genuinely been led to believe that the open-list system is more democratic. The phrase itself appeals to the fairness of individuals.

Mr. Lansley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Palmer: I shall carry on for the moment.

Everyone likes the idea of being open, and everyone likes the idea of choice. However, the Conservative party has grossly misled the majority of peers into rejecting the Bill five times, knowing that the open-list system would give an overwhelming advantage to the type of candidates that the Conservatives seek to promote—those who have the finance and connections to promote themselves. I urge the House to support the Bill.

8.30 pm

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): It is liberating, in a sense, to escape the narrow terms of the amendments that detained us over the past few weeks and return to the principles that are contained within the Bill. I am very much against the basic principle of the Bill. I am not sure why we should be presented with such a Bill. As I said when we debated the Bill in the previous Session, at the risk of repetition, the fact is—[Interruption.] I understand that the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) has disappeared from the Chamber and that that is the occasion of some mirth.

The principle that there should be elections to a European parliament is one with which I do not agree. The European Assembly cannot be a parliament because a parliament represents a people and there are no European people—there is no European people. Therefore, there should not be elections to the European Assembly.

We arranged our affairs much more satisfactorily when we nominated Members of this place to the European Assembly. Having moved on from that situation, and having adopted a system of elections, I cannot understand why we now seek to adopt an even less eligible system of election. Constituencies have been replaced by regions that bear no correlation to any understanding that anyone would have in my constituency, for example, of the region in which he lives. There seems to be no logic that our regions should stretch from the Isle of Wight to Milton Keynes. Equally, why should this region be represented by 11 Members of the European Parliament, treading on one another's toes, interfering with one another's responsibilities and creating nothing but confusion?

We move on to the particular form of election that the Government have brought before us, which is based on the closed list. It is instructive to refer to the Scottish experience. Labour Members are right to draw attention to the fact that we have not suddenly found that our electoral system has been polluted by the closed list. They are right to say that under the Scotland Act 1998 and the Government of Wales Act 1997 elections will take place on a closed list.

It is unfortunate that the debate has been guillotined. Time is a huge factor in bringing reasonableness to bear on these issues. Although Labour Members traipsed through the Lobby on the Scotland Bill, as it then was, in favour of a closed list, we now find what the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs reports on its study into multi-led democracy. Paragraph 91 reads:

> "The regional MSPs are to be elected on a closed list system . . . We feel that an open list would be much more in keeping with the principle of trusting the people and giving them the maximum choice."

The Select Committee then refers to the fact that in Bavaria such a system is used and that up to 30 per cent. of the voters interfere with the party-list precedent and change it.

Nevertheless, the Select Committee, with seven Labour Members, produced such a report. Paragraph 91 was the subject of a Division. Of the seven Labour Members, only two voted against the inclusion of the words to which I have referred, given that they had a preference for a closed list.

As for whether the Bill would have been enacted if there had been a free vote, the arithmetic is clear. We do not need to be experts to discern what would have happened. The Bill would have been thrown out. The passage of the Scotland Bill in Committee is instructive when we consider the voting method that has been chosen in European elections. We must return to our old friend Mr. d'Hondt. It is all very well to be told that the answer to the electoral system is 1.4, because that happens to be the square root of two, but that leads one to wonder what was the question that gave rise to such an answer.

I said to the Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, Scottish Office that one of the advantages of our existing electoral arrangements is that, by and large, people understand them. They understand that a cross put in a box, when added to other crosses, can give rise to a result that most people accept and understand. When I said to the Minister that no one would understand the system that was being imposed, he said: "The voters do not have to understand the system so long as the returning officer does." What will that do for voter turnout and confidence in our electoral system? That is the essence of the argument against changing to a proportional voting system. I regard it as a monstrous system.

It all very well for Members to say that the House accepted the proposed form of voting when it discussed, as it then was, the Scotland Bill and the Government of Wales Bill. It is true that it takes time for the ramifications and implications for such a voting system to become obvious. It was not until the Scotland Bill and the Government of Wales Bill had passed through the House and the Government were under way with their business of selecting candidates that the weaknesses of the system became apparent. As soon as we saw the cronyism and the way in which long-standing members of the Labour party were shabbily treated, it became clear that the proposed voting system would be a gift to arbitrary power. It is a gift to party managers and party machines, and a gift that we seek to remove. This is our second opportunity to do so and I think that we should take it.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): Second?

Mr. Swayne: Well, our second opportunity on a Second Reading.

[Mr. Swayne]

The Prime Minister's argument again and again was that the Bill is acceptable because all that it does, in effect, is bring us into line with our European partners, most of whom use the closed-list system. It is entirely appropriate that the Prime Minister should draw attention to the fact that our electoral arrangements differ from those that obtain on the continent. However, that is for an historical reason. Elections took place in this country before political parties were formed. We adopted a system of electing candidates rather than parties. It is only recently in our electoral history that we allowed the candidate's party to be printed on the ballot paper.

On the continent, political parties were well established long before there were elections that enabled them to be elected. Once those elections came along the political parties were in a position effectively to take over the electoral process. Hence the tradition that prevails on the continent, much more than it does here, of electing a political party. Before we fall meekly into line and accept that somehow we are anachronistic, we should remember that our electoral system is our most successful export. It should be understood that 50 per cent. of the voters in the world use the British electoral system, as do 60 per cent. of the world's countries. Our system has served us well and we do not need to take lessons from the continent of Europe. I suspect that we would do much better to retain our existing arrangements by rejecting the Bill.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I spoke on Second Reading and in Committee last time the Bill went round this course, so I am entitled to give myself at least a bronze anorak award. We feel that we have heard every debate and every technicality under the sun, although I am sure that, if my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) speaks, he will come up with new and wonderful technicalities. I shall keep to the matter at hand.

I should say mea culpa because, in Committee, I spoke in favour, in principle, of the open-list system. We had an interesting debate, but no Conservative Member spoke in support of that system. I am pleased that Conservative Members are back on message tonight and returning to their true position of supporting first past the post, although, from time to time, they give the illusion of supporting open lists. I am confused about how they are trying to match proportionality and first past the post.

Our debate considered the implications of open list systems. It is fair to say that both the d'Hondt and Sainte-Lague systems have difficulties, but they are certainly preferable to the open-list system proposed by the Conservatives. It is disingenuous of them to try to persuade us that they are in favour of an open-list system that no one else seems to favour but, until tonight, they have spoken fiercely in its favour. There is opportunism in their support for that system not only in this place but in the House of Lords, where, month after month, they have tried to manipulate arguments on a system in which they do not believe in order to change the position of this House. That is undemocratic, unfair and unacceptable.

I speak whole-heartedly in favour of the opportunity that we have to introduce a proportional system for the European elections. Like the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan), I think that the key principle is that, for the first time in a national election, we have established that votes will be counted proportionally. As someone who has long believed in electoral reform, I welcome that development, which is more important than the issue of open or closed list systems. That is why I voted for the Government and will do so again. We must pass the Bill now. We have had a long debate that has gone over every possible ground and will come to a conclusion—hopefully, sooner rather than later. We know that we must put the system in place.

I recognise the benefits of a regional list system because we are moving towards regional identities with the setting up of regional development agencies and, as some of us would like, regional chambers. There is no reason why we should not elect European Members on a regional list system. By introducing proportionality, we will ensure fairness and justice, which we all desire.

I am rehearsing arguments that we had a year ago almost to the day. Conservative Members referred to the need for suitable checks and balances in the system. Why not have different electoral systems for different representative bodies? Why should first past the post be all-embracing and omnipotent? Many of us seek alternatives because we have seen the damage that the system can do when there is an arrogant belief—as I called it many months ago—that it is the only system that can elect people. That is evidently not true.

We have heard all the arguments. It is important that we put in place a proportional system. Some hon. Members want there to be an opportunity for a review. We have had something of a hokey-cokey with the Bill. The Conservative party may still want to table an amendment in Committee. I do not necessarily agree with that, but it is a delaying tactic and we need to get on with the Bill. The candidates are important and need to know that the process for which they have been selected will take place, but returning officers, who have already been mentioned, and the electorate will have to come to terms with the system. That is not unimportant. There is a belief that the way to increase turnout is through fair votes and proportionality. That belief has to be tested, but that can be done only if people know under which system it is to be tested, so the sooner we get on with it, the better.

We have had all the arguments and constitutional conflict; we now need to move on. The Conservative party has used the issue to delay and to wreck, but their efforts have cost them dear in many respects. We know what we are moving toward and we can see the merits of a closed-list system, which were set out in the speech of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. The sooner we can go out and persuade people of our case, the better.

8.45 pm

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak in the debate, because I have had the pleasure of speaking in all the European debates of the past 25 years and, by and large, warning the House that disaster lay ahead. I find it difficult to do that tonight, because, to be quite honest, I do not understand why on earth the Government are bothering with this legislation.

Implementing the legislation will cost us a lot of money: the Bill reveals that it will cost £4 million to explain to people how the system works. I am the Member of Parliament for Rochford as well as for Southend, East.

I am not making a political point, but every one of the councillors in the lovely old borough of Rochford, which was in the Domesday book, is a Labour councillor. They were told today that their spending increase over the next 12 months has to be 1.1 per cent., which is less than the rate of inflation. That will mean that they will have to cut services. How the blazes am I to explain to them that we are going to pass a silly Bill and spend £4 million on a totally pointless exercise?

We must ask ourselves: does the European Parliament matter at all? If we are to be honest, we must all admit that, if the European Parliament were to close its doors tomorrow, nobody apart from the taxi drivers of Strasbourg would notice. We keep giving the European Parliament pretend powers, trying to create the impression that it has power, but in fact there is no power and no authority in that place, because the whole underlying principle of the European Community is not democratic and there is no way that it can change, even though people continue to believe that it can change. All the power is concentrated in the Court and the Commission and in horse trading in the Council of Ministers, so we can only give the European Parliament pretend powers. If we were being honest, we would ask whether it really matters what system we use to elect Members of the European Parliament, when that Parliament is basically irrelevant.

My second question is for my hon. Friends. Although I appreciate that some of them feel passionately about the issue of closed or open lists, they must ask themselves what the blazes people are meant to do when they go along to vote. If in an area called the eastern region there are 11 candidates for each party, how on earth am I, the average voter, expected to know who those candidates are and what their opinions are?

There is a passionate minority in Britain—a few people, probably 5 per cent. of the population on either side—who are either strongly for or strongly against the European Economic Community, and such people will make it their business to discover candidates' views, so as to have the opportunity to express their opinions. However, the vast majority of people in Britain have gone to sleep on the European issue; they do not want to know anything about it. In addition, the political parties do not want to discuss the issue, because it can cause strong disagreements.

The only real principle at stake is that of answerability. It is important that we should preserve that, but we must ask whether European matters are the area in which we most want to preserve it. How can a Member of the European Parliament be answerable? If he cannot do anything and people do not know who he is, it is difficult to keep up the pretence of democracy here.

I am genuinely curious as to why the Government are bothering. The Government have advanced only two specific arguments, one of which is that other European countries do it. That should make us suspicious, because we can then see the European principle of regional government being imposed on Britain—on England—even though people do not want it. Huge offices are being built in Cambridge, which is in my local region, and large organisations invite me to lunches, dinners and seminars and send me lots of coloured paper, but I am left wondering what it is all about. Unfortunately, what we find is that regional government is being promoted by the EU, even though the people of England do not want it. I wonder whether the whole business of regional assemblies, regional government and regional papers is all to do with something being pushed by the EEC.

The second argument advanced by the Government is that, if we adopt the new system, more Conservatives will be returned to the European Parliament. Is that the principle for which one should support the Bill? I should like to think that we were doing something more significant, not simply expressing a view on that silly matter.

When I came to the House of Commons, the principle of democracy was important to me. When I arrived here many years ago—certainly before many of the hon. Members present were born—I remember that my parents were very proud. They felt that I was joining a worthwhile institution, one that was uplifting and to which Churchill had belonged.

My second son is cleverer than I am, and earns more money than I do because he works for a merchant bank. Last year he was asked, along with everyone else who works at the bank, what his parents did. It upset me when he said, "I did not mind saying that my dad was Teddy Taylor, because people know that you have some unusual views, but I did not like to say that you are a Member of Parliament." That gives us some idea how substantially the standing of this place has gone down.

We should recognise that, over the past 25 years, we have been destroying our democracy. We have taken power away from the people. I hope that hon. Members will think seriously about how we have been abolishing democracy and making people's views almost totally irrelevant. When democracy has been abolished in other parts of the world, the same things always happen: the power goes to individuals who are outwith control, and they always want to help their friends, not necessarily because they are corrupt, but because they are simply not answerable.

It upsets me that the Bill will make Members of the useless European Parliament, which is of no relevance to the people, a tiny 1 per cent. less answerable to the people, even though there is not much for which MEPs can be responsible. I hope that the Government will answer the important question why they are bothering with the Bill. Who has complained about the present system? Who has said that it does not work?

We have had a by-election in Scotland in which only 20 per cent. of the people bothered to vote. They felt that it was irrelevant. The vast majority of the people in Britain think that the European Parliament is irrelevant.

It would be helpful if the Government told us why they are bothering to introduce the Bill. Has there been pressure from the EU to adopt the same kind of electoral system throughout the EU? I have watched all the changes being introduced, step by step, over the past 25 years. Ministers say that changes are taking place not because they are being forced to implement them, but because they want to do so. Later, we find that they have been pressurised to do so.

What has happened to democracy is sad. We are being asked to agree tonight to £4 million being spent wholly unnecessarily to achieve nothing in respect of an assembly that has no power, no real responsibility and no answerability. It is a sad night for Parliament. I hope that the Government will tell us the truth or let us throw out this silly, irrelevant measure.

8.53 pm

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), I look forward to the enactment of the Bill, which I believe will enfranchise millions of voters in this country who, until now, have never had a chance for their vote to make a difference in an election. There are millions of Labour voters in the south—indeed, in the constituency of the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), for one—and millions of Conservative voters in Scotland who at present are excluded by the electoral system from any feeling that their vote matters in elections.

The proposed electoral system will, for the first time in this country—I exclude Scotland and Wales—create a situation where people's votes will count. As well as enfranchising millions of voters, it may well energise our democracy.

In the last European election we had, along with the Netherlands, the lowest turnout of any of the 15 countries in the European Parliament. The hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) may think that that is a good thing, but low turnout is a problem that is peculiarly strong in this country. The voting system has clearly been a major factor in that. The change to a new voting system, together with the right public information campaign—I do not think that spending £4 million on public information before the election will be money wasted—will energise many people to take part in the election, whereas they would not have taken part in previous elections.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): When he opened the debate, the Home Secretary was asked about a national list. He had to agree that a national list would be even more inclusive, in that it would allow people who wished to vote for extremist parties to do so. It would enable people to vote for small minorities, in order to secure representation. That, is it not, is the logical conclusion of the hon. Gentleman's argument—if he really believes that this opens up the possibility of representation of a kind that constitutes the key issue in this context.

Mr. Linton: I would have thought that the point of regional representation was self-evident. Its aim is to give MEPs the possibility of being representative on at least some human scale.

The point made by the hon. Gentleman about a national list is quite different. As he knows, the introduction of a national list would reduce the pressure to introduce much smaller parties in the European Parliament. It is no part of my understanding of democracy that greater democracy can be achieved by our allowing parties with support amounting to 1, 2 or 3 per cent. to be represented. That simply confuses the issue. The point of a regional system is that it will create a threshold against small parties.

The hon. Member for New Forest, West grappled with the names of devisers, which he has apparently mastered. The point of the difference between the systems is this: the system proposed by the Bill will create a situation in which—in the south-east, for example—any candidate winning less than 10 per cent. could not be elected. Under the other system, the same arrangement would obtain, but the qualifying percentage would be 5 per cent. That is the crucial difference between the devisers.

I should have thought that, if Labour Members believe in a system that does not involve encouragement of the proliferation of small parties, they should—in this regard, at least—applaud the proposals in the Bill.

I have followed the hon. Gentleman's argument carefully, but the breakthrough point is different in different regions. It is 10 per cent. or 11 per cent. in the south-east, but it is 33 per cent. in Wales. Should we not have equally sized regions? The political system is being skewed by the existence of large and very small regions.

Mr. Linton: That is probably true. I used the south-east as an example, because, with 10 members in a 10-member region, it will normally take 10 per cent. to be elected if the other deviser had been used, it would, effectively, have halved the threshold.

The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) accused the Home Secretary of employing tedious arguments. I would say that the whole of this debate has become tiresome. In the House of Commons alone, we have discussed it for 36 hours. I hoped that Conservative Members would at least have returned to the new Session—having thought about the system that they supported in the last Parliament—with a workable system. However, we are back with the same unworkable system.

The Home Secretary pointed out that, under this system, a candidate could be elected with 300,000 votes, whereas a candidate from another party winning 500,000 votes might not be elected. That strikes me as enough of a problem with any electoral system, but there is an even worse problem in this system: someone could be elected, appearing as No. 2 on the list, with no votes at all. The system that is being advocated, and was advocated in the last Parliament, means that most voters would naturally take the top name in the box, and all the votes would be counted for all the people in the box—even candidates who received no personal votes and no indication of support from the electorate. Even those people could find themselves elected. No wonder the system is only used in Finland and Luxembourg, and has not recommended itself to any of the other countries of the European Union.

Mr. Randall: Will the hon. Gentleman explain why that system is so apt for Finland? If it is unfair, why are the Finns using it? He is very unfair to them.

Mr. Linton: The onus is on the hon. Gentleman to explain why he advocates the Finnish system. I can only point to the great difficulties of such a system.

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) talked about the experience of Switzerland, a non-European Union country which also has an open list system with voting not for parties, but only for candidates. That system has created competition between candidates and the anomalous position whereby candidates receiving no votes nevertheless get elected.

I struggled for a long time to understand the mystery of why the Opposition ignored open lists, month after month. They abstained on them in Committee and never mentioned them in debates. Suddenly, towards the end of the process, they became obsessed with open lists.

Mr. Clappison: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, because he has given me the opportunity to put right what he and several of his hon. Friends have said.

As the hon. Gentleman heard my right hon. Friend the Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) say, and as I can confirm from my own experience, we raised the question of open lists in the debate on Second Reading a year ago. We have raised it at every opportunity since, and we have opposed what the Government are doing because we want voters to have a choice. The hon. Gentleman, too, has said in the past that he wants them to have a choice.

Mr. Linton: I have spoken in favour of the Belgian system, which is semi-open, but, as I recall, there has been no Opposition support for that system at any stage. Only in the later stages did they discover the apparent benefits of the Finnish system.

I have found the reason why the Opposition changed their opinion during the debate. It is nothing to do with the arguments made in the Chamber or in the other place, but it is to do with events within their own party. Towards the end of the debate, they had already selected their candidates for the European Parliament so they had obviated one of the obvious difficulties that they would have faced had they had an open list system and a lot of pro-European candidates.

I quote from the Financial Times, which states that, rather than having a "'broad church of views on Europe' . . . candidates were put forward only if they vowed 'not to rock the boat on our single currency policy'".

In other words, far from giving the voters a democratic choice of Conservative candidates—which they appeared to do, and which is the principle on which they support such a system—the Opposition carefully weeded out any candidates who would present the electorate with any choice whatever.

An article in The Daily Telegraph carries a statement by two Conservative Members of the European Parliament who had hoped to stand in the Conservative cause in the European elections next year, but were deselected by the Conservative party. They say:

"'It is untrue and unacceptable to claim that the Conservative candidates for next year's election represent 'all opinions on Europe'.

In reality, only two categories of Conservative are represented: those who say they agree with William Hague on a single currency and those who say he has not gone far enough in his opposition to it.

Those who made clear their disagreement with Mr. Hague's opposition to British membership for up to nine years were rejected or, in our specific cases, deselected.'"

Having got rid of any dissenting voices, the Opposition presented to the electorate an apparent choice of candidates, but that choice is of only Euro-sceptic or Europhobic candidates.

Mr. Loughton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, because he quoted two MEPs who were not reselected. One might expect them to say that, but the vast majority of MEPs were reselected. Is it so strange to him that, if that policy was demanded of candidates, it was demanded by all members of the Conservative party who were entitled to vote? It may surprise him that there was unity of purpose on the European policy of the Conservative party in those selections—decided not by the party leadership, but by every individual member acting as one.

Mr. Linton: Of course, but the result was convenient. Only after the result of their hustings—when they realised that they had a complete Euro-sceptic ticket—were the Opposition prepared to offer the electorate choice among their candidates. [Interruption.] If, perchance, the Opposition were successful in pressing their amendments and they were lumbered at the last moment with their Finnish-Luxembourg open system for selecting candidates, it would cause anarchy in the Conservative party. The party would have to reselect candidates at short notice, and that would open up the splits that it has done so much to conceal.

We are discussing the Bill because of the opposition of Conservative hereditary peers in the House of Lords. It is well within our rights to question their right to tell us how to run a democratic election, and to challenge their credentials for pontificating on, of all things, electoral systems. If there is one area that they cannot claim to have expertise in, it is elections.

I shall mention some of the Conservative hereditary peers who voted in the House of Lords to ensure that the Bill fell in the last Session and has had to be re-introduced and discussed again tonight. Why is the Marquess of Ailsa a Member of the House of Lords? Because, in 1831, one of his ancestors married William IV's illegitimate daughter. Why can Viscount Cranborne, the late lamented leader of the Conservatives in the House of Lords, vote on our electoral system? Because one of his ancestors was Elizabeth I's adviser, whom she affectionately referred to as her pygmy—he was surely the original Blackadder. I refer of course to Robert Cecil, the founder of that aristocratic house.

Why is the Earl of Romney a Member of the House of Lords, and why did he have the power to reject this Bill? Because one of his ancestors, Sir Robert Marsham, paid £5,000 for his barony in 1716. Why did Lord Ampthill, a Cross-Bencher, have the right to vote against the Bill and to send it back to the House of Commons? Because he is a descendant of a Victorian diplomat, Lord Odo Russell, who was a member of the family who happened to own Bloomsbury.

Why was Lord Palmer, another Cross-Bencher, able to vote on the Bill, and why was he able to determine our electoral system? His name gives us half the answer. Lord Palmer was one of the great biscuit tycoons of the Victorian era—he was half of Huntley and Palmers. Far more relevant to his ennoblement was the fact that he was a large-scale contributor to the Conservative party.

I come lastly to Lord Sudeley, another Cross-Bencher, who cast his vote against the Bill in the Lords and is one of the causes of our having to discuss it tonight. His family made a fortune in the slave trade in the West Indies. In a recent interview in one of the weekend supplements, he justified his family fortune by saying, "We used to be better orff with slavery." We would be better off getting on with Third Reading.

9.9 pm

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): I followed the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) in a debate a few weeks ago. He was confusing and confused then, and he is no better now. This time he spoke even more claptrap. I shall be extremely brief, because a number of colleagues want to speak.

[Mr. Jonathan Sayeed]

In the past, it was a characteristic of dictatorships that when a messenger came with an unpopular message, the dictator executed the messenger.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Is that what happened to Lord Cranborne?

Mr. Sayeed: No, Lord Cranborne is still going strong.

With this Government we have an elected dictatorship. For them, the merits of the argument count for nothing. The only thing that matters is the size of their House of Commons majority.

We have a Prime Minister who, either through fear of Parliament or contempt for it, does not bother to vote in this place, rarely bothers to attend and relies on obsequious Back Benchers to push his sometimes cockamamie legislation through. Rather than test on the anvil of parliamentary debate the measures that he wishes to put forward, he prefers to use taxpayers' money to pay for spin doctors, who manipulate a sometimes acquiescent media.

Because the Prime Minister does not like the message that the Lords have been sending him, knows that they may do exactly what they did to a Conservative Government—reject certain Bills that the Government put forward—and does not like the Lords, or even the threat of the Lords disagreeing with him, he has decided to execute the political messenger. As he cannot do it fast enough, he has been denigrating the Lords with ridicule, and the Home Secretary has been his assiduous servant.

What have the peers been saying? They have been saying something very simple: local people have the right to determine who their candidate is. They have not been opposing the Bill. They have kept strictly to the Salisbury convention. They have been supporting the Bill, but asking the Commons to remember that this is a democracy; that is all that they have been doing.

I hope that, when the Bill goes back to the Lords, they will continue to support dem[illegible] and stand firm because what has happened in th[illegible]ce is a denial of democracy—true democracy. Even though the majority in this place dislike the way in which the Labour party operates closed lists, the majority have voted for them. That is a denial of democracy.

If the Government had had the humility to accept that the way in which the Labour party operates closed lists is a disgrace and abhorrent to any democrat, and had operated the list system, even a closed-list system, in the way our party or the Liberal Democrats operate it, with local people deciding who the candidates are and the ranking of the candidates, the Lords would probably have let the Bill through. It is because the Government have not done that that they have brought on themselves their own difficulties.

I would have hoped that the House would oppose the guillotine motion, which was disgraceful. I hope that it will oppose Second Reading, but I do not expect it to do so. I hope that the Lords will stand firm because they will certainly need to do so.

9.13 pm

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Sayeed), who, at earlier stages of our debates, has made similar distinguished contributions and taken a principled stand on the Bill.

What has depressed me in this debate is that, from the Home Secretary and other Labour Members, including the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton), we have not heard any recognition of some of the new arguments that have been advanced in relation to the Bill. In particular, I was depressed and saddened that the Home Secretary, who in his speech on the guillotine motion suggested that he had answered every question, conspicuously failed to pick up on both questions that have been asked in previous debates and issues that have been brought forward in relation to this Second Reading.

Time is short, so I want to refer just to two points—well, perhaps three, if you will forgive me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is important that they be debated. I fear that they not going to have sufficient debate, but I want to raise them, so that the Minister can at least give some sort of reply.

The first concerns an argument that has been made time and again and was propagated by the hon. Member for Battersea. The Home Secretary and others have suggested that open lists are unacceptable because if voters can express a preference between individual candidates, it is statistically possible that a candidate of party A could be elected even though he secures fewer votes than the candidate of party B. The Home Secretary signally failed to accept that that occurs for two reasons.

First, the system gives proportionality to parties. The Home Secretary asserts—and, fundamentally, it has not been denied—that people primarily, but not exclusively, vote for parties. Some people choose to vote for candidates rather than parties, though they are probably in the minority. It is purely because of the insertion of proportionality into the system that someone in party A with fewer votes than the candidate of party B might get elected.

Secondly, under the Government's closed-list system, it is possible—indeed, likely—that candidates will be elected for parties when they would be shown to be much less preferred than the candidates of other parties if voters were able to express a preference. The point is that we will never know. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) talked about his candidate preferences, but we will never know what differences may exist among voters in respect of their preference for particular candidates.

Mr. Linton: Does the hon. Gentleman concede that in his Finnish system, it would be possible for a Conservative candidate who attracted no votes on a ballot paper to be elected?

Mr. Lansley: Of course that is possible, but it would only happen if a party's No. 1 candidate was a particularly well known national figure who is likely to attract the largest number of votes. My noble Friend Lord MacKay of Ardbrecknish instanced some such examples on closed or semi-open lists. By virtue of winning such a proportion, a candidate can bring through a tail of much less well known candidates who have had a negligible or even, statistically, a nil return. That is a direct product of proportionality.

Even, however, if we accept the principle enunciated by the Home Secretary—that party is the principal reason why people vote—that does not preclude the possibility that significant numbers of people may wish to express a preference—or wish to have the chance to—between candidates from one party. The hon. Member for Battersea would admit that, even in his party, the homogeneity imposed by the panels in Millbank tower has not yet reached the point where supporters of the Labour party are completely incapable of distinguishing between Labour candidates. Even to this day, they are capable in certain circumstances of distinguishing between them.

That would particularly be so where, as in the west midlands, at the top of the list imposed by Labour's selection system sits someone who is self-evidently not familiar with the west midlands and whose fame derives from work in the acting profession. The hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) apologised for having to leave, so we will forgive him for not being here; but if he were, we could chide him for seeming to argue that a candidate's notoriety would be a reason for a party not to put him at the top of the list. When it came to it, his party went down precisely that route and sought a famous candidate.

That points to one of the besetting sins of closed lists: the examination of candidates down to the second, third, fourth or fifth place on a list is irrelevant. All parties seek to do is to signal party allegiance and, perhaps, in respect of the No. 1 person on a list, seek someone to present it in the best available light. That is an abuse.

Conservative Members have instanced cases in continental systems in which people have been placed first on the list simply to attract the party vote, but who subsequently resign and hand over their office to someone else.

Mr. Linton: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, in the case of the proposed Labour list in the west midlands, no one will be asked to vote for a well known soap opera star just so that other candidates will be elected on his coat tails? People will be voting for a party, and that candidate will be elected according to his order on the party list. The position would be quite the reverse under the scheme—the Finnish system—that the hon. Gentleman is proposing, as the person in the first position on the Conservative list—be it Lulu, Lord Archer or someone else—would carry on their coat tails people for whom no voter had expressed any preference, simply because he or she was sufficiently famous and attractive in their own right to win votes in sufficient numbers.

Mr. Lansley: The hon. Gentleman is right about that. However, he is highlighting a distinction between closed and open lists that supports Opposition Members', not Ministers', argument. The hon. Gentleman has made it clear in previous speeches that he is in favour of open lists—at least the Belgian list system, which would offer some of the benefits of using the attraction of specific candidates, whether they occupy the first, second or third position. That leads to the question of why the Government are proposing to use a closed-list system in which the only preference that voters can express is between parties, whereas they are including on ballot papers parties' candidate lists. What is the point of doing that?

The point is that, in the west midlands, for example, the Labour party believes—erroneously—that it will be able to use the name of a well known soap opera actor, thereby augmenting its vote.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Before my hon. Friend moves on, there is a point that requires amplification. Is not the practical effect of the closed-list system the outcome that parties would tend to transport into the European Parliament—or any other body, if the system were to be extended—people of whom they hold a high opinion, and who would not want the inconvenience of having to serve an electorate in any meaningful or real way?

Is not the truth that that would be a step back to the time before the passage of the 19th century reform Acts, when places in Parliament were in the gift of notables, whose favourites were elevated to Parliament without having to do any of the hard graft? Is that not the real issue? The issue is not, as the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) suggested, about an opportunity for famous people to drag others with them. It is about an opportunity for famous people—in the sense that they are famous in their own party—to be given the opportunity without the hard graft of properly standing for election and making themselves accountable to the electorate.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Liberal Democrats have been trying to argue that we should distance the way in which the Labour party has selected its candidates from our debates on a closed list, as if they were separate and unrelated issues. However, the way the Labour party has selected its candidates is the precise issue. A closed list has enabled the Labour party to select candidates as it has, in what it believed to be the secure expectation of contesting the European parliamentary elections with candidates in the order decided by the party apparatus, rather than requiring it to insert Labour party members' preferences into the system.

On ballot papers, although there will be an opportunity for voters to express a party preference, the Bill will not allow voters to express a preference between a party's candidates. Moreover, voters would not be able, if they were so minded, to express a preference on an issue, thereby elevating it above party. The bishops in another place, for example, were rightly very exercised by the desire of some voters to use the vote that they cast by reference to issues of conscience. Some voters put issues of conscience above party when electing representatives. Under the Bill, that will not be possible.

Since our most recent debate on the Bill, the Home Secretary—whom I am pleased to see return to his place—has asserted, on 26 November, that it was compatible with the European convention on human rights, which we have also debated. This is the first time the House has debated a Bill on Second Reading in the light of the requirement that Ministers should say whether it is compatible with the convention.

Article 3 of the first protocol of the convention says:

"The High Contracting Parties undertake to hold free elections at reasonable intervals by secret ballot, under conditions which will ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature."

[Mr. Lansley]

The Home Secretary made his statement on the compatibility of the Bill with the convention not by answering a question in the House or in the Votes and Proceedings of the House; presumably he simply signed a piece of paper in the Home Office to that effect.

The Home Secretary has not explained why the Bill is compatible, even though I raised the issue during the debate on the guillotine motion. The aim of the convention is for voters to be able to express their opinion freely. That opinion is not expressed exclusively between parties. The bishops in another place made it clear—as have we, time after time—that the expression of opinion by voters between—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman and several of his colleagues have raised issues during the debate and addressed questions to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or to me. It appears that they do not intend to allow us time to respond. Is it in order for him to carry on in such a way that we shall not have an opportunity to respond?

Mr. Clappison: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In the light of the Minister's request for further time, given that the Government have underestimated the time required for the debate, is there any way in which the Government can be assisted to reverse their guillotine motion and give us time to debate the Bill properly?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. Although the debate is time limited, the length of time that a Member speaks is not. The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) has the Floor.

Mr. Lansley: I might have been able to make more progress if the Minister had not interrupted me on a point of order. Labour Members, including the Home Secretary, have said that there is nothing new to be said about the Bill, but lo and behold there is something new and they do not want to hear it. The Home Secretary knew that compatibility with the European convention was an issue, but he failed to address it, just as he failed to say whether he believed—regardless of whether it is in the legislation—that there should be a review of closed lists. It will fall to be debated in another place, as has happened too many times on the Bill, where Ministers will have to answer questions that have been raised here and should have been debated here—but for the fact that the Government have prevented us from doing so.

Mr. Loughton: Many new points have been raised during the debate. Is my hon. Friend aware that only last week 17 angry churchmen, including archbishops, bishops and the chairman of the conference of Methodist Churches, expressed their great anger to the Prime Minister that conscience was being squeezed out by the Bill? No one will be able to vote for a candidate on a matter of conscience.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend illustrates the point with force. The European convention gives voters the right to choose the members of their legislature. As the bishops rightly say, some voters may want to express their free choice on a matter of conscience. Moreover, some people distinguish between candidates of the same party on ideological grounds, but that will not be possible under the closed list system.

Mr. Beith: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the first-past-the-post system, which he favours and to which we would return if the Bill fails, is open to challenge in the European Court of Human Rights on the grounds that it does not allow the voters a choice between candidates of the same party?

Mr. Lansley: I am not saying that, as the right hon. Gentleman and the Home Secretary know. Saying that first past the post is a closed list of one is a red herring, as that system is devised to secure a different objective—a relationship between an elected representative and a defined geographical area. As the Home Secretary made clear, regional electoral areas are being created only for proportionality. Regions could offer voters the opportunity to choose between candidates, but the Bill will deny them that opportunity.

What will happen if, before the European elections, people go to a court to seek a declaration of incompatibility between the European convention and the legislation on the grounds that their right to choose a particular candidate as a matter of conscience will be frustrated? The Home Secretary has chosen not to recognise the consequences of the Human Rights Act 1998, but he should tell us—not through the medium of his Minister of State in another place—whether he intends to make secondary legislation using the Henry VIII powers in the Human Rights Act to change the voting system at the last minute if it is found that there is incompatibility.

I am surprised that no Labour Member has been sufficiently acute to have asked whether any of the five European countries that use closed lists have discovered that the system is incompatible with the European convention on human rights. In fact, no country has done that yet, but only because the matter has not been brought to court. As a consequence of the timetable, we are debating an issue—

It being four hours after the commencement of proceedings on the Bill, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to the Order [this day].

Question put, That the Bill be now read a Second time:—

Bill read a Second time, and committed to a Committee of the whole House, pursuant to the Order [this day].

Further proceedings on the Bill stood postponed, pursuant to the Order [this day].

EUROPEAN PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to the Order [this day].

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the European Parliamentary Elections Bill, it is expedient to authorise the charging on and payment out of the Consolidated Fund of—

(1) charges to which returning officers are entitled by virtue of that Act, and

(2) sums required by the Secretary of State for expenditure on the provision of training relating to functions conferred on returning officers by virtue of that Act.—[Mr. Hill.]

Harefield Hospital

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

11.50 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): It is only nine months since I secured an Adjournment debate on 6 March on the future of Mount Vernon hospital, Northwood. Many of the fears that I expressed then have been realised, notwithstanding a petition of some 80,000 signatures in support of the hospital being built up and not run down, and the public's particularly strong backing for the preservation of its regional burns, plastic and oral maxilla-facial surgery unit.

Now, the future of Harefield hospital nearby is in question and I crave the House's ear again, even though I have no illusions about how difficult it is to influence the direction of the national health service in favour of those who finance it: the taxpayers.

On Wednesday 18 November, the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) secured a debate about West Hertfordshire health authority, which, among other health authorities, funds the treatment of patients both at Mount Vernon and at the regional and national cardiothoracic specialist hospital at Harefield. He complained that, despite the language of the West Hertfordshire health authority, which talks about a new super-hospital, the proposal represented a substantial cut in the facilities available to the people of west Hertfordshire. The hon. Member for Watford (Ms Ward), whose constituents attend Harefield hospital with chest and heart illnesses, echoed those complaints.

There was a shared and relevant anxiety in the debate, which was also expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Page), whose electors, too, are treated at Harefield and whose community health council has formally objected to West Hertfordshire health authority proposals. The Government will not grant money to maintain the status quo, which is crucial to build up existing centres of national excellence such as Harefield and Mount Vernon, but they have a predilection in favour of the construction of new hospitals funded through the private finance initiative.

When the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), responded to that debate—I am glad to see that he is present again—he admitted that the Government's modernisation programme was "extremely ambitious". I would not, however, contradict the conclusion that was drawn by the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead about the proposals of the West Hertfordshire health authority. He said:

"implicit in its plans must be a substantial reduction in the asset base, which means that an awful lot of hospital closures that have not been accounted for must be in the pipeline."

The Minister of State boasted that

"work has started on the construction of eight hospitals under PFI"

and boasted about

"the biggest new hospital building programme in the history of the NHS—31 new hospitals worth almost £2.4 billion, 25 of which will be built through PFI, with a total value of almost £2.2 billion."—[Official Report, 18 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 917-18.]

Where does that leave existing specialist centres of national and, in the case of Harefield, international excellence, which need, by comparison, very modest additional capital funding to modernise their facilities? If the dire precedent of Mount Vernon is anything to go by, they are left in a very vulnerable position. At Mount Vernon, between a mere £5 million and £7 million are required to modernise a superb burns, plastic and oral maxilla-facial surgery unit. However, West Hertfordshire health authority would like it to be moved into its new £150 million green-field site, private finance initiative hospital. Hillingdon health authority would like it to go to the new, costly inner-city Westminster and Chelsea hospital.

Harefield is known globally as the hospital that has done more heart and lung transplants than any other: well over 2,000 since 1980. Professor Sir Magdi Yacoub's internationally famous team has done an immeasurable service to the reputation of British medicine worldwide. It will be remembered that Diana, Princess of Wales attended, masked and medically gowned, an operation there.

Harefield hospital also has an extensive programme of heart and lung operations, more than 3,000 a year. The hospital makes a profit. Doctors from 60 countries have been trained, and patients from as many countries treated, there. Surgeons trained at Harefield have taken their skills of heart and lung transplantation back to the countries of their birth.

Research at Harefield is integral to the work of the hospital. As with the superb cancer and burns research facilities at neighbouring Mount Vernon, the research has been made possible by an impressive combination of public and charitable funding. As Sir Magdi has said about the Harefield heart science centre:

"Most of our work to date has been on the fault repair side of the heart and lung business. I believe it should be possible within a generation to identify the causes of heart and lung disease with a view to their prevention and thus deprive fault repair surgeons like me of their jobs."

Phase 1 of the heart science centre was completed in 1993. It has developed the artificial heart, evolved therapies to reduce transplant tissue rejection and analysed the processes of heart degeneration and the causes of cardiovascular disease. Building phase 2 will cost £2.5 million at 1996 prices, plus revenue costs, but its work on the prevention and treatment of cardiomyopathy and studies of the molecular and genetic origins of heart disease and of means of preserving donor organs longer will save the NHS millions of pounds in the longer term. Above all, it will save countless human lives.

Harefield hospital owes its origin to the Australian great war hospital on the site at Harefield park where many thousands of wounded Anzac soldiers were treated when they were brought back from the battlefields of Gallipoli and France. The hospital has a numerically small, but inspirationally famous, focus on children. Giving children born with heart problems a chance to lead a healthy life is an important part of its work. When Harefield received funding as a supra-regional transplant centre, the next project was to raise money for a new children's ward. The give-a-child-a-chance appeal was most successful, and in July 1989 the ward was opened by Her Royal Highness, the Princess Royal. Sadly, this ward is due to be closed and its facilities moved to the Royal Brompton, although out-patient paediatrics may remain at Harefield.

When the Royal Brompton and Harefield hospitals merged this April, it was my private fear that asset stripping at the expense of the country cousins at

[Mr. John Wilkinson]

Harefield would occur, not only in terms of equipment and facilities but of its supreme asset, its personnel. This is now a grave risk, starting with paediatric surgery.

A west London cardiothoracic review was initiated. In mid to late October 1998, its conclusions were lodged with the Department of Health. It suggested three possibilities. First, that the Royal Brompton and Harefield NHS trust should maintain its services in the existing locations. That would be the wise course, building on the hospitals' respective strengths and complementing effectively their talents and expertise.

Alternatively, it was suggested services at Harefield should be concentrated at the Royal Brompton, which could only involve a diminution of facilities and beds, to the detriment of patients in need of cardiothoracic treatment. It would also be a breach of faith with the joint message in the merger consultation document issued by Sir Geoffrey Errington, the then chairman of Harefield, and Sir Philip Otton, who now chairs the joint trust, which made no mention at all of closing Harefield, but spoke only of improvement of care for patients and better coordinated research.

Finally, it was suggested that both Harefield and Royal Brompton hospitals could be combined in a new hospital, to be built alongside St. Mary's on the Paddington basin site. We are told that it could still keep the proud title of Royal Brompton and Harefield NHS trust, but what consolation is that to the wonderful people who stand to lose their jobs? I do not know how much the project would cost or how it would be financed—perhaps through the private finance initiative, such as the project in west Hertfordshire. I also would not presume to know whether Chelsea needs another Lanesborough hotel, such as that constructed on the old St. George's hospital site at Hyde park corner.

I do know that closing Harefield hospital would tear the heart out of Harefield village. It is the only major source of employment in the last village left in what remains of rural Middlesex. In the words of the author of its history, the cardiothoracic surgeon Mary Shepherd, who worked there for some 20 years, Harefield hospital is "the heart of Harefield", the place where in the great war 50,000 wounded Anzacs were treated, and close to where 114 of their number remain to lie in St. Mary's churchyard, in graves bedecked and garlanded with spring flowers by local school children every Anzac day.

Between the wars, Harefield hospital treated the scourge of tuberculosis. In the second world war, Harefield dealt with casualties north of the river Thames and, with St. Mary's hospital, Paddington, enlarged its scope to deal with general and thoracic surgical war casualties, hence its current expertise.

Harefield hospital is, in short, a special place, and covetous eyes are cast upon its skilled and devoted staff—even Northwick Park hospital, in Harrow, might aspire to employ them. Its asset value must tempt potential developers, too. However, surely modernising the NHS means building on its strengths. Harefield, in peace and in war, has won a place not only in the hearts of its staff, of the villagers and of its patients and their families, but of the nation. Surely that transcends property valuations.

Harefield hospital's situation in rural green belt, at the nodal point of the M1, M25, M40, M4 and M3 motorway network, near to Heathrow and Luton airports, with its very own helicopter pad, ample space, surrounding quiet countryside, clean air and cheaper housing, is surely the right one to make it the right place for the country's premier cardiothoracic transplant centre, now and well into the century that is to come.

Developers, PFI financiers, and great and good committee men may have other ideas, but I simply pray that Our Lady of Harefield—whose image in glass glorifies a window in the hospital chapel—and of the parish church dedicated in her name may bring advent wisdom to Ministers and allow the work of the healing of hearts to continue in the village where England's first and only Pope, Nicholas Breakspear—Adrian IV—was born.

12.5 am

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. Alan Milburn): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) on securing this important debate on the future of Harefield hospital—one of the best-known heart hospitals in the national health service. I am grateful for the opportunity to describe the high regard in which we hold its services.

Coronary heart disease is the most common cause of premature death in the United Kingdom. It accounts for about a quarter of deaths under the age of 65 and is on the increase. In 1997–98 in England, 389 heart and lung transplants were performed, of which around a quarter were undertaken at Harefield.

The Government have recognised the importance of getting the treatment and the prevention of the disease right by making it a major national priority for the NHS. It will be one of the first two services to be subject to uniform standards through a new national service framework. The framework will be published in April 1999 and will seek to improve the quality and consistency of services by setting clear national standards for providing care.

Today's service must be of high quality, but we also need to invest in tomorrow's service by researching the disease and teaching and training the young doctors and nurses who will provide care in years to come. The Government's commitment to research on cardiac and respiratory diseases is unwavering. This year, NHS providers in England will receive a total of £349 million for spending on research. The Royal Brompton and Harefield NHS trust is the health service's pre-eminent provider of research into cardiac and respiratory diseases and is receiving £20 million—just under 6 per cent. of that total.

Many people are aware that, under the inspirational leadership of Professor Sir Magdi Yacoub, Harefield hospital has become a world leader in heart and lung transplantation. It has the largest transplant programme in Europe, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said, and has accumulated experience over the past two decades that is second to none, not just in this country or in Europe, but in the world. Since its programme was set up in the early 1980s, Harefield has completed well over 2,000 transplants. I pay tribute to Sir Magdi and the whole team at Harefield, who have helped so many people over so many years to live a rich and fulfilling life.

Harefield not only provides top-quality medical care, but makes a major contribution to world-class research into cardiac disease through its links with the Imperial college school of medicine. The research output of the cardiac and respiratory sciences department at Imperial has been recognised in successive assessments by the Higher Education Funding Council for England as of the highest international quality. Some 20 per cent. of the UK's research output in cardiac and respiratory diseases is completed at Imperial and its associated NHS hospitals. Perhaps even more impressively, two thirds of top-quality research citations in the UK are generated by the same department.

However, like all hospitals, Harefield is not immune to pressures and it would be wrong to try to ignore them. Some of those pressures are the inevitable result of its own pioneering effort. Following the success of Harefield's transplant programme in the 1980s, eight centres in England are designated to undertake heart and lung transplantation. Harefield continues to have the largest transplant programme, although Papworth hospital in Cambridge is now of a broadly similar size. All centres have benefited from Harefield's work and from the teaching and training that it has provided to young specialists, many of whom have gone on to work in other centres throughout the country. Through its success in sponsoring the development of other centres, Harefield has seen a substantial fall in the size of its transplant programme, with 98 transplants this year compared with 219 when the hospital was at its peak 10 years ago.

The key to future success in the research of cardiac and respiratory disease is also changing. Increasingly, top-quality medical research needs to combine basic scientific research with more specialist condition-based research, which tends to take place closer to the patient. That is why we were pleased to announce the opening of the new £67 million basic medical sciences building at Imperial college in September 1998—£20 million was contributed by the NHS, a further £20 million came from the Department for Education and Employment and the remainder was funded by the university itself.

Recently, Imperial has expressed concerns that the level of fragmentation in specialist cardiac services in and around west London may erode the future international competitiveness of the university and the national health service's research base. Those are serious concerns and we need to look at them seriously.

As part of the independent review of London's health services, the Government asked Sir Leslie Turnberg to assess the need for change in that area of London. He was also asked to look at the process that had been developed involving both the NHS and its academic partners to shape the change. Sir Leslie was encouraged by the progress that he saw. His report registered a particular concern that the way in which the service is organised in west London may not be maximising its long-term contribution to national and international research. He advised the Government to ensure that plans were carried out for a more rational distribution of specialist services across west London. The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood may recall that we accepted all Sir Leslie's Turnberg's recommendations, including that one.

The NHS executive asked hospitals and health authorities in that part of west London, along with Imperial college, to take part in a review of specialist cardiac and thoracic services. The review commissioned expert clinical input from a panel chaired by Sir Terence English, an internationally respected figure in heart transplantation who completed the very first heart transplant in this country and who is a former president of the Royal College of Surgeons. The review was completed in July and broadly confirmed Sir Leslie's impression that cardiac and thoracic services in west London were not organised in a way that would continue to support the highest-quality service and academic endeavour.

Sir Terence English said that three of the four cardiac centres in west London were not seeing a sufficient critical mass of patients. He recommended that existing services should be focused on fewer, larger centres. He also advised that collocation of specialist cardiac services with other related specialties would bring benefits that were not available to single specialty hospitals such as Harefield.

We have also received advice on the national heart and lung transplant programme from the joint consultants committee, which comprises the royal medical colleges and the relevant specialist associations. The advice was that the NHS should be working to a position where such complex acute services are provided only from multi-specialty hospital sites.

Sir Terence English's recommendations are being considered, alongside the conclusions of parallel reviews into specialist paediatric services and renal transplantation in west London, by the west London partnership forum. The forum comprises the hospitals and health authorities in west London as well as Imperial college and the NHS. It is chaired by the noble Lord Newton of Braintree, for whom I have the highest regard; I am sure that he will do a very good job for NHS services in that part of London and, indeed, in the rest of the country.

As the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood rightly said, the forum is examining a number of options for the future of cardiac services. Those include consolidating all the work of Harefield at the Royal Brompton site in Chelsea, keeping Harefield as a specialist centre and investing in the site, and building a new major heart and lung hospital adjacent to St. Mary's hospital in Paddington. Any firm proposals will be subject to formal consultation.

As the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood knows, I cannot comment further, since I would have to adjudicate in the event of a community health council objecting to any such proposals. I can tell him that the Government recognise the unique nature of Harefield. The interaction of science, research, teaching and services is an enormous strength. We also know that, if the Harefield team were broken up, it would be very difficult—if not impossible—to reassemble it.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has met with Sir Magdi and given him a personal assurance that, while the issues are being considered, planning blight will not be allowed and funding will be made available to ensure continuing essential investment at Harefield. I hope that the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood finds some comfort in those reassurances, and that he will think again about some of the language, about asset stripping and so on, which he deployed in his speech.

There are difficult issues to consider in this case, and we will take the time and the trouble to do so. We will take advice from leading clinicians in the land, we will listen carefully to what Sir Magdi and others have to say and we will listen to the proposals of Lord Newton and his team. We will then reach our conclusions, following a full and proper public consultation.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was asked—

Post Office (Social Security Benefits)

1. Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): What assessment he has made of the contribution to Post Office revenues derived from handling over-the-counter payments of social security benefits. [61292]

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): Details of the contractual relationship between the Benefits Agency and Post Office Counters Ltd. are commercially confidential. However, work carried out by Post Office Counters Ltd. on behalf of the Benefits Agency represents very broadly one third of all transactions carried out by the business, and a roughly similar proportion of its income.

Mr. Webb: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer, which demonstrates how important benefits payments are to the Post Office's business, yet the Government are pressing more and more people to receive their benefits through bank accounts. The working families tax credit will be paid through pay packets, not over the post office counter. What assurance can the Minister give to the postmistresses and postmasters in rural villages in my constituency that that key element of their business will not be steadily eroded through Government policy?

Mr. McCartney: The Government are committed to a national network of post offices. As the hon. Gentleman knows, because I have said many times from the Dispatch Box, we are also committed to promoting the development of those small businesses, alongside the capacity of the Post Office to deliver services on behalf of the Government. We want the network of post offices to be maintained on the basis of their increased capacity to do other types of work, in addition to delivering traditional services. The Government's review of the Post Office is critical because it will underpin that commitment.

Mr. Alan Johnson (Hull, West and Hessle): Although I support the work of my right hon. and hon. Friends in their review of the Post Office, and appreciate why the option of share sales must be included in a comprehensive review, is my hon. Friend aware of the deep disquiet felt on these Benches and in other parts of the House about share sales, and our concern that we do not go down that railtrack? Will he confirm that there is no earthly reason why a publicly owned Post Office cannot compete successfully against European postal administrations that have enjoyed the same commercial and financial freedoms for many years?

Mr. McCartney: First, the Government are totally committed to the Post Office remaining in the public sector. Privatisation went out the door when the previous Government were kicked out by the British people. Secondly, for the Post Office to develop on an international and global basis, it needs commercial freedom, commercial discipline and resources to do that job. That is the purpose of the review. It will ensure a sound financial and commercial framework, so that the Post Office can move forward to become a major player in the global postal and telecommunications markets.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): The Minister may not know that I wrote to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about 10 days ago to ask what progress was being made in the Department with regard to the decision to introduce or not to introduce computerised swipe cards for the transaction of Benefits Agency business through sub-post offices and post offices. Can the Minister tell me whether his Department has made a decision on the matter?

Mr. McCartney: Since the election, the Department and the Government as a whole have been developing a strategy to eliminate financial and social exclusion. We are trying to ensure that we get the resources which, over time, will allow us to provide social banking and a cost-effective and fraud-resistant means of paying benefits. We will ensure that information technology systems are put in place in the post office network to do that job for customers of the Post Office. We have cleared up the mess left by the previous Government in relation to those matters.

Energy White Paper

2. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): If he will make a statement about the impact on electricity prices of the measures announced in the Government's energy White Paper. [61293]

The Minister for Energy and Industry (Mr. John Battle): As we set out in the White Paper, "The Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation", that was published in October, the existing distortions in the electricity market make prices higher than they should be. We consider that as the market is reformed, wholesale price falls of at least 10 per cent. in real terms and possibly more can be expected in the medium term. That, of course, cannot be a guarantee, as the Government do not have power to set prices in open and competitive markets.

Mr. Gray: Is the Minister aware that electricity prices fell consistently from privatisation onwards? Whereas gas-fired electricity cost 2.5p per kWh, coal-fired electricity cost 4p per kWh. Is he not concerned that his ending of the dash for gas on behalf of his friends in the trades unions will result in higher electricity prices, as well as greater environmental damage?

Mr. Battle: The answer is no. We are working to reform a totally flawed wholesale market structure set up by the hon. Gentleman's party in government. I recall that it was my predecessor as Energy Minister, the noble Lord Fraser of Carmyllie, who was responsible. I am tempted to say that to lose one leader of the Lords is unfortunate, as the great wit would put it, but to lose two in a day seems downright incompetent. However, the entire country now realises that that lot opposite are not capable even of joined-up opposition.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): I thank my hon. Friend for his reply, which demonstrates the Government's fair approach to the concerns of many of my constituents about employment in the electricity-generating industry and in the mining industry. I challenge the figures given by the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) for the price of electricity generated from coal. There are examples of it being much cheaper than gas, and I hope that my hon. Friend will ensure that that pressure on the gas-generating industry to reduce its prices continues, so that we can have the benefit of the full generating of electricity from coal.

Mr. Battle: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has championed a fair market in power generation throughout his time as a Member of the House. That is what the review was about. It is up to the coal industry to make its output commercially attractive to generators, but there was not a level playing field for coal to compete in that flawed market. That is the whole point, and why we will keep up the pressure to ensure that the pool is properly reformed and there is a level playing field on which one fuel is not unfairly stacked against another.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): But the Department of Trade and Industry decided that it would reform the pool price—surely the Minister has left the market wondering what is going on. Cannot we have some decisions from the Government, rather than yet another bit of consultation and another bit of spinning? Clearly the energy industry wants to know what will happen with the pool, and any reform—which would be welcome, if it brought down the price of electricity to consumers—should be carried out now.

Mr. Battle: The energy industry asked us to work at reforming the flawed structure of the pool. For example, it pressed for a challenge to the dominance within the pool of two major generators. What have we done? We have taken action and suggested that power companies divest plant: PowerGen has agreed to divest 4 Gw of plant and National Power is looking at divestment opportunities. We have taken action—[Interruption.] That is within the pool, if the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) does not understand the pool. The power stations come on line to sell their energy, but they are being dominated by one or two generators. We are tackling that, and sorting it out now. We are not hanging about; we are mopping up the mess that we were left by the Conservative Government.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the Minister agree that all those involved in generating electricity have responsibility to be more efficient and to ensure that electricity is produced at the cheapest possible price? Will he join me in congratulating NIGEN in Northern Ireland, which is introducing proposals to reduce electricity costs, in co-operation with the regulator?

Mr. Battle: Yes. Those Conservative Members who seem to think that prices are going up should consider time-weighted pool prices in the period from April to November when prices were about 1 per cent. lower than in the same period last year. Of course summer and winter prices cannot be compared, so we should look at the winter period. There has been a 3 per cent. fall in real terms in prices, and we hope that that will continue. We think that there is space for that to happen—through working with the regulators, as the hon. Gentleman suggested.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): But is my hon. Friend the Minister aware of the great damage being done to the steel industry by the warped system of electricity prices inherited from the previous Government? Is he aware that the increase in prices charged to the steel industry allowed by the regulator are higher than the windfall tax paid to the Treasury by the electricity industry? The steel industry cannot wait until 2000, 2001 or 2002 for the review. Will he look urgently at what can be done now to allow our steel companies to have energy prices at a European level, not the high Tory prices that we inherited?

Mr. Battle: I share my hon. Friend's concern. Electricity contracts are financial contracts, often outside the pool. It depends what contracts the companies have, but there is concern in the steel industry about rising energy and electricity prices. In the new trading arrangements, we will change the relationship between the generators and their customers.

I have asked the Director General of Electricity Supply, who is responsible for prices, to keep a close eye on progress as it affects heavy industry to ensure that our industry is not priced out during the restructuring of the pool. In the light of my hon. Friend's question, I shall ask the Director General for a progress report on his views.

Indonesia

3. Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): If he will make a statement on trade between the United Kingdom and Indonesia. [61294]

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Brian Wilson): Indonesia was the United Kingdom's 37th largest export market in 1997, with exports totalling £701 million. This year has seen a 50 per cent. decrease in year-on-year exports to the end of September, whereas imports from Indonesia have remained steady at £740 million.

In the short term, Indonesia faces a period of economic and political uncertainty. In the longer term, the pace of economic recovery depends on the Indonesian Government's management of political change and its continued implementation of the International Monetary Fund reform programme.

Mr. Wareing: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer, which gives some comfort. Last year, £118 million-worth of transport equipment was exported to Indonesia. Similar contracts have probably been implemented this year. Will my hon. Friend take steps to ensure that none of that equipment is used for the suppression of the Indonesian people, or for Indonesia's genocidal campaign in East Timor?

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend's concerns are understandable. I assure him that, in the past, we have taken up with the Indonesian Government our concerns about the use of British-supplied equipment. It is the Government's policy that no equipment should be exported that would be used as my hon. Friend described. Every application for export licences to Indonesia is measured against that criterion.

Worker Rights

4. Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): Whom the Government plans to consult on the extension of trade union and worker rights. [61295]

8. Ms Claire Ward (Watford): If he will make a statement on the progress on implementing his fairness at work policies. [61300]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Mandelson): We have been consulting a range of organisations that wish to offer views on fairness at work policies. As stated in the Queen's Speech, the Government will be bringing forward legislative measures in this parliamentary Session.

Mr. Syms: Will the Secretary of State publish those consultations, so that we all know the thinking of the Government and the trade unions on this matter? There is great concern that any extension of rights will increase the costs to industry, which will have a knock-on effect for employment. Dorset has already had some bad news today from GEC. The Marconi communications group is to lose 1,000 jobs, including many from the Wallisdown road site, which will affect many of my constituents in Poole and others in Bournemouth. Costs to industry are of great concern, especially given the current state of manufacturing in Britain.

Mr. Mandelson: I have put a list of the more than 470 organisations that have submitted responses to the White Paper in the Library. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman contacts those organisations. When people submit their views to the Government, they do so in confidence. We listed those who have submitted their observations, and it is up to the hon. Gentleman to contact them. It is for them to let him have the information if they so wish.

Ms Ward: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the principles of fairness at work should apply to all employees, including health service workers? Will he make clear his position on the application of the 40-hour rule to health service workers?

Mr. Mandelson: I agree with my hon. Friend. The central objective is to support a new culture of partnership and co-operation at work, whether in the private or the public sector. That is what I want to see. I have been greatly encouraged by the responses to the "Fairness at Work" White Paper, many of which have been very supportive of the Government's proposals. It is important that people in the public and private sectors, including the national health service, feel encouraged by the Government's proposals. They will help create partnership at work and a committed work force, whether in private firms and companies or in public services such as the national health service.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): The hon. Member for Watford (Ms Ward) may have been referring to a report in The Times today, which states that the European Union may overrule the Secretary of State on the 48-hour week for junior doctors and thousands of workers in the haulage industry. Will the Secretary of State confirm whether that is so? If it is, is it not a direct result of the fact that the Government, immediately they were elected, acceded to the social chapter? We are not able to veto these proposals, because they can be accepted by qualified majority voting. These measures will be imposed on this country whether we like it or not.

Mr. Mandelson: It was not the present Government who signed the working-time directive; it was the Government of whom the hon. Gentleman was a member.

The hon. Gentleman says that the European Commission is seeking to overrule me. I do not know on what it can overrule me, as I have yet to reach a final view as a result of our current discussions with the Commission about the extension of the directive to other sectors, including junior doctors and the road haulage industry.

My view is well known. I believe that the position must be examined on a case-by-case basis. It is important for us not to create either unacceptable inflexibility in the working practices of junior doctors, or unacceptable costs to the national health service. It is with both those considerations in mind that the Government will proceed with their discussions with the Commission.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil): Labour Members are pleased that my right hon. Friend is using expressions such as "the promotion of social partnership", and is trying to inculcate a spirit of co-operation in industrial relations. Has he received any representations from Members of the other House about proposals relating to unfair and, in particular, constructive dismissal?

Mr. Mandelson: I do not know whether there will be a right of appeal for Members of the other place under our legislation. I am sure that someone somewhere in the Commission in Brussels will be prepared to hear such an appeal if the person concerned wishes to make it—but if he wants a friend during the disciplinary proceedings, I can think of no one better than my hon. Friend the Minister of State to come to his aid, and to hold his hand when he is next summoned to the headmaster's study.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): Has the Secretary of State not observed that, during the last month, four of the five national broadsheets—The Guardian, characteristically and perhaps significantly, dissenting—have carried stories suggesting that he intends to perform what is described as either a U-turn or a climbdown in regard to powers for the unions? Will the right hon. Gentleman now tell the House specifically—no spin, honest—whether he intends to impose a moratorium, or cooling-off period, if he prefers, on trade union membership, in order to meet the automatic recognition criteria?

Would the right hon. Gentleman be content to go down in history—if I may slightly modify a deplorable ditty—as the man, the very smooth man, what waters the workers' rights?

Mr. Mandelson: I am sure that there are many competing issues in regard to which I may go down in history.

We are considering all the points that have been made to us in the consultation that we have undertaken following the publication of the White Paper, including a number of points made by employers' organisations. Some of those points are reasonable; others are not. Some are workable; others are not. I am confident that we will produce a Bill which, while not pleasing every single person in every respect, will be legislation with which everyone can live. It is important for a basis of consensus among both unions and employers to underpin legislation that will have serious practical effects and a considerable impact on people at work. Given its ramifications, it is right for us to spend as much time as we need to get that legislation right.

The Bill will strike a balance. It will be true to its principles and aims, but acceptable to all in its application.

Manufacturing Industry

5. Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): What steps his Department has taken to create a stable economic climate for manufacturing industry. [61296]

The Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry (Mrs. Barbara Roche): The Government have established new frameworks for monetary and fiscal policy to ensure a platform for long-term economic stability and growth. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will shortly be publishing a White Paper, which will include a series of measures to promote the competitiveness of UK industry.

Mr. Griffiths: While the whole country welcomes what the Government are doing to create economic stability, is all that not being undermined by the Conservative party questioning and challenging and talking down British business—questioning the independence of the Bank of England, challenging the new deal and the working families tax credit—and by the chaos that the Conservative party has created in the House of Lords by sacking Viscount Cranborne and the resignation of Peter Fraser?

Mrs. Roche: I agree with my hon. Friend. The previous Government were prepared to sacrifice the economy's long-term health for short-term political gain. I also agree that, despite the present difficulties in the world economy, the tough and decisive action that this Government have taken means that Britain is well placed to steer a course for stability and growth. It is about time that Conservative Members stopped talking down the British economy and started to support British business.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): Listening to that response from the Minister with responsibility for small business, I am sure that she will be pleased to know that a firm called Carbospar in my constituency has just been awarded millennium project status. It is its response to the Prime Minister's challenge to show that Britain is a creative powerhouse, but I hope that she will be appalled to learn that that same firm has lost 50 per cent. of its projected overseas sales as a direct result of high interest rates and the unstable value of the pound. It is clear that winning shiny plaques is no substitute for winning orders and keeping jobs, so will she take a message back to the Prime Minister that what Britain's industry needs is a clear commitment on Britain's entry to economic and monetary union, not bits of tin to stick on the office wall?

Mrs. Roche: I congratulate the company in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I had the great privilege to be with the Prime Minister at the launch of that challenge. It is tremendous to see some of those products come forward and to see creativity.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, sterling is now at around the same level as at May 1997. The difference, of course, is that inflation is now under control, not out of control. What is absolutely clear is that the Government will make the right decisions in relation to EMU, based on the interest of the country and of our businesses.

Ms Rosie Winterton (Doncaster, Central): In seeking to create a stable economic environment, will my hon. Friend look at the situation that is faced by companies such as Bridon International in Doncaster, which is extremely concerned about dumping, through cheap imports, of steel wire ropes from countries such as India, South Korea and Mexico? What action can her Department take to assist companies such as Bridon's in my constituency?

Mrs. Roche: I am well aware of my hon. Friend's interest in that matter and in these issues. As the House will be aware, if imports are being dumped or unfairly subsidised, the European Commission has the power to take appropriate action. It is currently investigating the import of steel wire ropes into the Community. I assure my hon. Friend that the Department is following that matter closely and we will ensure that we keep in touch with her.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): At a time of factory closures and mass redundancies in manufacturing, it is typical of the Secretary of State that he decides unilaterally to reduce Trade and Industry Question Time by 10 minutes, and then he sits there with a smug grin, unwilling to answer anything on manufacturing on today's Order Paper, but may I ask the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry, who is a bit more sympathetic to manufacturing than the Secretary of State—that is not difficult—this important question, which many manufacturers are now asking the Government?

Those manufacturers tell me that business needs lower and stable taxes, not the tax rises of this Government. Does the Minister agree that the Government's failure to stop France and Germany from pressing for higher business taxes is unsettling British business and potentially very damaging to it? Will she promise that the Government whom she supports will veto, first, the withholding tax on savings, which damages savings and the City of London, and secondly, any abolition of corporation tax breaks that are enjoyed in this country, sometimes on the advice and policies of the Government?

Thirdly, will Ministers guarantee to veto any move from the Commission—it is now planning one—to make corporation tax a centrally controlled and centrally collected tax, which will be bad news for Britain and British business? All those things mean higher taxes. They will be bad for business and bad for democracy.

Mrs. Roche: The right hon. Gentleman does try—he tries very hard. However, try as he might, there is no escape from the facts. It has been made absolutely clear—my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made it clear—that we will not support any action at EU level that will damage business competitiveness or jobs. There is no question about that and there is no question of changes being imposed on us.

The right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues really have a cheek. Given that under the last Government Britain had to go through two major recessions when 2 million manufacturing jobs were lost and manufacturing output was devastated, it is rich to hear what the right hon. Gentleman has to say about manufacturing. The Labour party is committed to our manufacturing sector. When I go round the country talking to businesses of all sizes, the one thing they say to me is that I should stop the Conservative Opposition talking down their businesses.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): Will the Minister join me in reminding Her Majesty's Opposition that, throughout their period in office they refused to take a close look at how the dumping of products affected the British cycle industry? Will my hon. Friend have a particular look at what is happening with cycles from Taiwan? The sale of cycles from Taiwan to the UK economy has increased by 55 per cent. in the past year and there is already evidence that the Taiwanese Government pay for the research and development and provide the advertising in the United Kingdom for that to take place. Will she look at the distortion of trade that such an intervention constitutes?

Mrs. Roche: I know that my hon. Friend has taken a keen interest in this industry. He will know that this is a matter for the European Union Commission to investigate. The Commission needs hard evidence and, if that exists, I am sure that the industry will supply it. As I said earlier, the Department will continue to monitor the situation closely.

EU Trade Deficit

6. Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): What the total deficit in all trade with the EU has been since 1973 in 1998 prices. [61297]

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Brian Wilson): Figures measuring EU trade since 1973 in 1998 prices are not available. In the first nine months of 1998 the deficit on trade in goods with EU countries was £3.2 billion.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Does the Minister agree that, since we joined the EEC, our deficit in overall trade has been £155,000 million, which is equivalent to £6,000 million every year or, put another way, £16 million every day of the week, including Saturdays and Sundays? Does that not suggest that those who argued that membership of the EU would improve our trade were perhaps over-optimistic? More significantly, does the Minister agree that, bearing in mind that we have a serious structural deficit in trade with Europe, it could create appalling problems for jobs and prosperity in Britain if we were to join the EMU?

Mr. Wilson: I do not agree with the last proposition. Ultimately, it will be a decision for the British people to take, hopefully on the basis of rational argument and the evidence put before them. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman will participate in presenting such evidence according to his own views.

The figures quoted by the hon. Gentleman are highly selective and do not provide anything approaching the full picture of our relationship with the rest of the European Union. He must be aware that the sort of figures he was seeking are badly skewed by the fact that, although, as I said, there is a £350 million a month deficit on goods just now, in the late 1980s, under the Government of whom he was a supporter, the monthly deficit was £1.5 billion. The figures that he wants are not as simple as it may seem.

He might also take into account the investment into the United Kingdom not only from the rest of the EU but from elsewhere that we certainly would not receive if we were not a European Union member.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): Will the Minister explain how our trading position with the European Union—and our ability to create jobs—would improve if we ever decided to hand over to the European Union power over interest rates, public expenditure levels and taxation?

Mr. Wilson: Those are all evolving matters on which the Government and—on EMU—the British people will eventually give their verdict. This week, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, and, today, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry have made it perfectly clear that nothing will be done by the Government that damages British competitiveness. That is the starting point. Attempting to adduce wholly anti-EMU arguments as if our relationship with Europe is an entirely negative one is unrealistic. It is an argument of the 1970s rather than the 1990s.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton): Does the Minister accept that the 150 business men who signed the Financial Times advertisement, which already carried more than 100 signatures—so we are talking about 250 or so business men—stating that they want the Government to provide greater clarification on the EMU entry timetable did so precisely because they are worried about trading prospects for United Kingdom companies after 1 January, when one single currency will dominate 80 per cent. of the single market? Will he assure the House that he will take up with the Treasury the need for it to be much clearer on how British economic policy will achieve convergence, so that the Minister himself can achieve the Secretary of State's objective of ensuring that the question is "when" not "if"?

Mr. Wilson: Since May 1997, the Treasury's policies have been absolutely clear and have carried widespread public support. Part of the problem for the Treasury and the Government in the debate on Europe is that, for the last 18 years, that debate has been skewed by irrational hostility of exactly the type we heard again today from the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor).

Mr. Ben Bradshaw (Exeter): Does the Minister accept that, by any measure, our trade deficit with Europe would be much worse if we were not in the European Union? Does he also share the concern of many Labour Members, most Liberal Democrats and the few remaining sane Conservative Members that our exporters will suffer a disadvantage as long as we remain outside the euro zone?

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to mention the other side of the coin of our trade relations with the European Union: more than half our exports are to the European Union. I was certainly very pleased to note in last month's trade figures—particularly against the background of difficulties elsewhere in the world—that the value and volume of our exports to fellow EU countries increased in that period. Moreover, we still have a very substantial inflow of investment from EU countries. In general, it is a healthy and balanced relationship. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that, if by any mischance we were outside that relationship, the United Kingdom's economic prospects would be very much worse than they are now.

Community Pharmacies

7. Mr. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham): What discussions he has held with the Community Pharmacy Action Group in relation to resale price maintenance. [61298]

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian McCartney): None. However, during the passage through Parliament of the Competition Act 1998, my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) met representatives from the Community Pharmacy Action Group to discuss resale price maintenance in that legislation.

Mr. Loughton: Does the Minister think that he knows better than the Community Pharmacy Action Group, which has warned that at least 3,000 community pharmacies could close because of changes to resale price maintenance in the Competition Act—a view that was echoed by 150 Labour Members in early-day motion 643? What comfort can he offer community pharmacists in my constituency, particularly in Worthing and Southwick, who offer vital services—such as 24-hour opening, emergency cover and free delivery, particularly to pensioners—but who now face going out of business?

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Gentleman is talking arrant nonsense. During the passage of the Competition Bill, the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) admitted that the action group had accepted the way in which the Government were carrying out the proposals and had dropped its objections. The Director General of Fair Trading has applied to the restrictive trade practices court for leave to have the continuation of resale price maintenance reviewed. If the court concludes that resale price maintenance for over-the-counter medicines continues to be in the public interest, it will benefit from a five-year exclusion from the prohibition of anti-competitive agreements in the Competition Act 1998. The Government are committed to community pharmacies. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health increased resources to that sector in his recent review.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): If competition from superstores puts local chemists out of business, will not the elderly and the poor lose most?

Mr. McCartney: The Government are more committed than anyone to community pharmacy services. The hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman)—the vice-chairman of the Conservative party—is taking a legal action on the issue. That is typical of the Conservatives. They are in favour of big business and do not defend small business.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): Given the Government's rhetoric during the passage of the Competition Bill about the importance of community pharmacies, will the Minister undertake that the Government will give evidence to the restrictive trade practices court during the forthcoming hearings on the importance of community pharmacies in maintaining a service on competition grounds, and will put forward the health evidence and the primary care benefits of community pharmacies?

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Gentleman knows that the issue is before the court. The Government have no power to say anything because the issue is sub judice.

Manufacturing Investment

9. Mr. Alan W. Williams (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): If he will make a statement on the latest figures for investment in manufacturing (a) in cash terms and (b) as a percentage of GDP; and what the comparable figures are for the United Kingdom's main competitors. [61301]

The Minister for Energy and Industry (Mr. John Battle): In 1996, the latest year for which internationally comparable figures are available, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development estimates that the value of manufacturing investment in the UK was £15.4 billion, or 2.1 per cent. of GDP. Manufacturing investment accounted for 3.1 per cent. of GDP in Germany, 2.3 per cent. in France and 2 per cent. in the United States.

Mr. Williams: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those figures, which show once again that manufacturing investment in Britain lags behind that in our competitor countries. Why have we consistently invested less in manufacturing industry over the decades? What have the Government done to tackle the problem and what further action does the Department of Trade and Industry intend to take to boost manufacturing investment?

Mr. Battle: Since the general election, manufacturing investment has been greater as a share of manufacturing output than at any time since 1985. The Government are taking key action to support manufacturing. We are investing in the science base to benefit engineering and technology. The DTI is a catalyst driving forward innovation, supporting the smart and link programmes that link government together in practical working partnerships focused on the future. We have taken action to strengthen supply chains, such as the industry forum masterclass that the DTI has set up. We are working on a detailed action plan with the textile industries to get designers nearer to manufacturers. I shall address the shipbuilding forum on 16 December. The forthcoming competitiveness White Paper will provide a framework within which we can all work to support manufacturing and the regeneration of some of the older industries.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Investment is under threat from the Government's policies of high taxes, high exchange rates and high interest rates. I am sure that the Minister agrees that a competitive exchange rate is crucial to future manufacturing investment and success. Given that the Secretary of State—who once again does not want to answer on manufacturing—thinks that it is a question of "when" rather than "if" we join a single currency, again showing his normal disregard for public opinion and Parliament, will the Minister answer these three questions? One: will he confirm that all 11 states entering the single currency are doing so at their exchange rate mechanism mid rates? Two: will he also confirm that our exchange rate mechanism mid-rate is DM2.95? Three: does he accept that entry at such a rate would be a hammer blow to manufacturing and manufacturing investment? Are he and his boss the Secretary of State proposing that we go cap in hand to seek a devaluation of our ERM mid-rate or are they saying that we should go in at that rate and that manufacturing can go hang?

Mr. Battle: We have made it absolutely plain that we will join at the appropriate rate. The right hon. Gentleman's questions come way down the course, but it is interesting that he asks them now. I am tempted to ask him whether he has cleared them with the leader of his party, who at least seems to be rather tougher than his previous leader, with whom the right hon. Gentleman fell out.

European Aerospace Industry

11. Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): What support his Department has given towards strengthening the performance of the European aerospace industry. [61304]

The Minister for Energy and Industry (Mr. John Battle): Since the general election, the Government have agreed to invest in the United Kingdom aerospace industry through launch investment. We have also strongly encouraged the sector to play a leading role in international restructuring in Europe and we are involved in partnership with the industry in a range of measures aimed at improving its global competitiveness.

Mr. Jack: I am disappointed that the Minister did not mention the civil aviation research and demonstration programme, which has played a leading role in enabling the United Kingdom's aerospace industry to contribute to the strength of the industry in Europe through developments such as the Airbus wing and the RB211. There is disquiet in the industry about whether the Government are considering cancelling the programme and cutting the remaining £20 million of help that is given through that mechanism. Will he give the industry the reassurance that it needs and say that the Government will continue to support technical development through the research programme, and that resources will not be cut?

Mr. Battle: The Government are investing up to £323 million, with a return over the next 17 years, which is a heck of a lot more than the previous Government invested in the industry. We have worked hard to ensure that the Airbus project comes together. Last December, the Prime Minister, with the Germans and the French, drew up a trilateral statement saying that the industry in Europe needs restructuring to face international challenges. We accepted the need for investment; indeed, we are investing more than the previous Government did, as companies acknowledge and welcome rather more than Conservative Members do.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): The regulatory and competition issues in the aerospace industry are so important that the Secretary of State has had four meetings with British Aerospace in the past few weeks—indeed, I am surprised that he is not answering this question. He also in the past few weeks announced major BAe sponsorship of the dome. Does the Minister accept that the only way in which the Secretary of State will ever be seen to be an impartial regulator is if he gives up his sponsorship of the dome?

Mr. Battle: The hon. Gentleman isn't half trying hard. He can try his luck during questions on the dome if he waits seven minutes. [HON. MEMBERS: "Two."] There is no question of my right hon. Friend's integrity and impartiality. If the hon. Gentleman is seriously interested in the aerospace industry, he should be celebrating the fact that Airbus announced at Farnborough this year a record £7 billion in orders, which is more than the Americans ever had—there are orders for 135 aircraft. We have worked hard with the industry to ensure that it will win orders and have a successful future.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): We cannot let the carping and criticism of the right hon. Member for Fylde

(Mr. Jack) go unchallenged. Have not companies such as Rolls-Royce in my constituency benefited hugely from the Government through launch aid for the Trent engine? Launch aid has also been given for the development for the Airbus.

We have been reading in the newspapers about the large number of redundancies—48,000—that Boeing is planning to make in the United States. Will my hon. Friend say what the ripple effect will be? What are the implications for the European aerospace industry?

Mr. Battle: My hon. Friend raises a serious issue. The industry is undergoing a mega restructuring and we are watching carefully to see what the ripple effect will be on the supply chain in this country. We need to work hard to ensure restructuring in Europe so that the industry can withstand the changes and work towards a positive future. I sometimes have the impression that Conservative Members talk down manufacturing and the economy at every opportunity. Just because their party is sinking, they do not have to drag the economy down with them.

MILLENNIUM EXPERIENCE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Opening and Closing Ceremonies

30. Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): What progress has been made with plans for the opening and closing ceremonies at the millennium dome. [61327]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Mandelson): The beginning of the year 2000 will be celebrated right across the country. The New Millennium Experience Company's plans for the opening ceremony are progressing well. The company is liaising with the relevant London authorities, Government Departments and broadcasters to ensure that there is a co-ordinated approach to the new year's celebrations at the beginning and end of 2000. Plans for the closing ceremony are, understandably, still at a slightly early stage.

Mr. Chaytor: Will my right hon. Friend make every effort to ensure that the opening ceremony truly reflects the diversity of life in this nation, which some of our national ceremonies—I am thinking of the state opening of Parliament, for example—do not always do? Everybody in the United Kingdom would agree that we want a ceremony that reflects north and south, young and old, black and white—the whole nation together.

Mr. Mandelson: My hon. Friend's points are at the heart of the millennium experience and the year-long millennium festival that will take place during the year 2000, and at the heart of the national programme, the millennium challenge, that will take place next year in the run-up to the opening of the dome and the millennium experience itself. The opening and closing ceremonies will reflect the Christian significance of the celebration and the diversity and creativity of the UK as a whole. Both ceremonies will be fitting occasions, uniting the entire country and giving everyone something to be proud of in a unique marking of the millennium by Britain which will bring together the best of British—pride in our past and, I foresee, considerable confidence in our future.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey): With so much still left to achieve—but as we begin to look towards the opening ceremony—may I ask the Secretary of State to join me in congratulating the on-site contractors, the team of the New Millennium Experience Company and, in particular, Jenny Page, on their heroic efforts so far—in circumstances not entirely helped by the involvement of the Secretary of State—to ensure that there will be something worth while opening on 31 December next year? Given that the project suffers almost daily from a round of unhelpful and unwelcome rumours and press comment, will the right hon. Gentleman accept—as he has not hitherto done—the vital importance of clarity, frankness and openness in all future statements relating to the dome as the best way to instil public confidence in this project in the 393 days which remain until the opening ceremony?

Mr. Mandelson: I shall try to make my answer slightly shorter than the question. I take enormous pleasure and pride in joining the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to the New Millennium Experience Company and the scores of people who are working round the clock to make the dome—and the millennium experience—the success that it deserves to be. I am pleased to hear the hon. Gentleman at long last saying something remotely positive about the millennium experience. I only hope that that becomes contagious among his right hon. and hon. Friends.

Sponsorship

31. Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South): What is his latest assessment of the private sector's financial input to the millennium dome. [61328]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Mandelson): As announced on 26 November, the New Millennium Experience Company has confirmed private sponsorship support of £120 million: 80 per cent. of the £150 million target. That is a remarkable achievement and already represents more than double the amount raised previously for any single event in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Chapman: Those are indeed remarkable figures. Do they not confirm that the Labour party is working in dynamic partnership with the private sector; that the pessimism of the Conservative party has again proved unfounded; and that the Conservatives' determination to talk down Britain on this and on other matters is misguided?

Mr. Mandelson: My hon. Friend makes a good point. In this, as in so many other aspects of our national life, the Conservative Opposition are desperate for us to fail, and we do not intend to give them that pleasure. I applaud those in the private sector who have shown their commitment to the millennium experience, which will be a great and unique British event. They recognise that their commercial interest coincides with the national interest.

I am pleased to say that, in addition to the information on sponsorship that I have already given to the House, I expect a further £15 million to be announced shortly, and an additional £25 million is subject to detailed negotiation. That is a great achievement by the New Millennium Experience Company, which organises, procures and negotiates the sponsorship, and it deserves our hearty congratulations.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Are the contracts with the sponsors already binding and irrevocable? If not, when precisely will they become so?

Mr. Mandelson: I am pleased to tell the House that all the sponsorship agreements that I have announced have received full boardroom approval.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Has my right hon. Friend considered the fact that, to improve the financial input, we need a history section in the dome? It could have a prehistoric zone, in which we could have 750 hereditary peers lined up. They could be photographed with young children and others outside McDonald's, dressed in their ermine, and they could be led by Baby Dome, the Leader of the Opposition. The result would be a magnificent financial success. We could call it the millennium new deal experience.

Mr. Mandelson: As ever, my hon. Friend is most persuasive. I have decided to consider introducing a Cranborne memorial zone, to commemorate a unique contribution to the future of Britain.

32. Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): How many companies have been approached with requests to sponsor elements of the millennium experience. [61329]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Mandelson): The New Millennium Experience Company has approached 50 companies with requests to sponsor elements of the millennium experience.

Mr. Brady: I thank the Secretary of State for that remarkably and uncharacteristically brief answer. Given the number of major British companies that have been approached by him and his colleagues, touting for sponsorship for the dome, there will clearly be concern about apparent conflicts of interest for as long as he is in control of the project's sponsorship. That is thrown into sharp relief by reports in the press this weekend suggesting that he has been personally involved in seeking sponsorship from the Hinduja brothers, in stark contrast with the assurance that he gave the House on 9 November, saying that he would never be involved in procuring or negotiating. Will he apologise for apparently misleading the House, inadvertently or otherwise, and make it clear that he will no longer be involved in touting for sponsorship for the dome?

Mr. Mandelson: I am pleased to say that the Hinduja Foundation is indeed considering making a contribution to the sponsorship of the spirit level zone. That is a much better use of its money than its long-standing financial contributions to the Conservative party.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston): In the various consultations that my right hon. Friend has mentioned, including those on sponsorship, will he remember the important role for the British tourist industry? Does he recall that the Prime Minister has said that Greenwich should be the gateway to the whole of Britain and, in that spirit and in the spirit of a festival of Britain, does he accept that a great industry such as tourism, our fifth biggest, should be given due regard?

Mr. Mandelson: I am pleased to say that the tourism industry throughout the United Kingdom has been heavily involved in all the planning and organisation of the millennium experience. Everyone who works in that industry or stands to benefit from it will enjoy huge financial benefits and an economic dividend from our organisation of the millennium experience. I predict a halo effect of some £1 billion for the British economy as a result of the decision to organise the millennium experience.

Teachers

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): With permission, Madam Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the Government's consultation on the reform of the teaching profession. This statement relates to England: my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales will report separately in the new year.

Over the past eighteen months, the Government have shown their determination to raise standards. Children are learning to read effectively in the new literacy hour. Infant class sizes are falling for the first time in a decade. We are rapidly expanding specialist schools and developing education action zones. We have tackled failure whenever and wherever it exists and we are providing £19 billion of investment to improve education across the United Kingdom over the next three years. That money for reform and modernisation is to give our children opportunities denied for far too long.

Teaching is at the heart of our drive to raise standards. Good teachers are our most precious asset in raising aspirations and achievement. That is why today I am proposing a fundamental step forward for the profession. Our first objective is to develop a new career structure that will recruit, retain and reward the teachers we need.

Under the present system, after seven years, a good classroom teacher earns around £22,500. Further reward is paid only for responsibility, rarely for performance. The Government believe that must change; that is why we are proposing two new pay scales for teachers, separated by a new performance threshold. There will be a tough new appraisal system. Up to the threshold, teachers would progress as now. To cross the threshold, teachers will need to demonstrate high and sustained levels of achievement and commitment. Heads will appraise and review teachers' progress, underpinned by external assessment. That will ensure credibility and consistency.

Success in crossing the threshold would mean an initial salary increase of up to 10 per cent., or around £2,000 a year, and access to further pay steps on the higher scale, based on appraisal of performance. Teachers could then either take on more leadership responsibilities or concentrate on high performance in classroom teaching. Over time, we would expect a majority of teachers to be of a standard to cross the threshold.

Our second objective is to strengthen school leadership. Good heads are the key to success. We need to develop strong leaders, reward them well and give them the freedom to manage. Successful heads who have turned around the most challenging schools could earn up to £70,000 a year, with strengthened appraisal and the option of fixed-term contracts. We also propose to set up a national college for school leadership, drawing on the best that education and business have to offer.

We also want to reward staff for teamwork in raising standards. Our new annual school performance bonus would provide a significant number of schools with a financial reward—payable as a bonus available to all staff—for improved performance achieved year on year and for sustained good results.

Our third objective is to have a well trained profession. We are establishing the General Teaching Council, and have introduced a curriculum for initial teacher training—with Ofsted inspection—and the induction year for newly qualified teachers. I can announce that we intend to go further by introducing a new national test for all trainee teachers in numeracy, literacy and information technology. Additional help in achieving the standard will be available for mature entrants.

It is vital that we attract the best graduates into teaching to ensure that our most outstanding teachers can move quickly up the profession. Industry and the civil service have fast tracks. We plan to introduce a fast track for teaching to enable good new teachers to make rapid progress. All teachers should keep their expertise up to date. To help them to do so, we are investing in better training in literacy, numeracy and information technology, and in improving the quality and availability of teachers' professional development. A pilot scheme of individual learning accounts will encourage all school staff to invest in their skills over and above Government funding. We will enable more training to take place out of school hours, to minimise disruption to pupils' education through over-reliance on supply cover.

Our final objective is to provide better support for teachers in the classroom. From the investment in repair and renewal through to the learning grid, we are committed to creating the classroom of the future. Today I propose a new targeted fund to improve the working environment for all staff, giving teachers access to the equipment that they need.

The teacher of the future will also make better use of the talent of support staff in schools. Many teachers already use teaching assistants to help with literacy and numeracy, or to support children with special needs. Over the next three years, we will fund at least 20,000 additional qualified teaching assistants with improved training, qualifications and opportunities. We are also keen to see the use of undergraduate and postgraduate students earning while learning, together with those from the wider community.

We also want to support small schools in sharing facilities, technicians or bursary support. I can announce today that a new small school support fund will pilot new ways of working together. It will benefit many rural schools.

The Green Paper contains radical and modernising proposals that will help to transform the standards and status of teaching in this country. It is about something for something. For the first time in years, a commitment has been made to invest and reward teachers in return for a new professionalism. That will mean greater individual accountability, more flexibility and higher standards.

We intend to consult widely with teachers, parents, local authorities and governors, for whom we will provide support and expert guidance to help them implement our proposals.

The vision of a world-class service for our children in the next century is one I believe we all share. Good teachers and support staff are the key to achieving that vision. It is to prepare for that new century, to celebrate the value and worth of our teachers, and for the sake of our children, that I commend these proposals to the House today.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): May I begin by putting it on record that the Opposition believe in proper rewards for good teachers, and that we agree with the Secretary of State that we are not recruiting and retaining enough good teachers? It is a problem that needs to be tackled, but it is also a problem that has got significantly worse during the right hon. Gentleman's stewardship. Does he recognise that many teachers attribute that fact to the bureaucratic burdens that he has imposed on them?

How does the right hon. Gentleman expect to recruit more people to the teaching profession if he does not treat them like professionals, instead denouncing them as "sneering cynics"? Now, he wants to test them for basic literacy and numeracy. Will he estimate how many of the teachers who are currently being recruited would fail his new test? What has happened to the advanced skills teachers scheme, which only this morning the Prime Minister put at the heart of the Government's proposals? Perhaps even the Secretary of State could not face relaunching it yet again. On 30 March, he claimed that there would be 5,000 so-called super-teachers. Will he confirm that, so far, only 50 have been recruited?

The Secretary of State talks about paying teachers properly. Teachers would regard it as hypocritical of the Government to launch this exercise today and then fail to implement the recommendations of the pay review body, which are due next year. Will the right hon. Gentleman assure teachers that he will accept its recommendations in full? Can he confirm that his Department wrote recently to that body to urge it to hold down teachers' pay; and will he place in the Library a copy of his correspondence with it?

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned a new threshold for a new structure of teachers' pay, but how quickly will a teacher reach it? How long will it take for the majority of teachers to cross it? He says that he wants to strengthen school leadership, but he well knows that there has been a disastrous decline in the number of teachers applying for the national professional qualification for headship. Does he agree that the reason is that they are all too busy responding to his instructions and initiatives?

We need better ways to encourage top-quality graduates into the profession, but the right hon. Gentleman's fast-track scheme is a vague plan, which gets five paragraphs in a 72-page document. Will he confirm that his fast-track scheme applies only to a small percentage of the 450,000 members of the teaching profession? As the Prime Minister might say, these are policies for the few, not the many.

Once more, the Secretary of State puts his trust in plans and targets, rather than the professionalism of teachers and the judgments of parents. Does he know what is already happening to his grand plans in practice? Only yesterday, I came across a school that has set targets in its educational development plan which are lower than its current level of attainment. Is the Secretary of State proposing a crude tick-in-the-box school performance awards scheme, with every incentive to set soft targets without any fear of being challenged; or will he rely on outside consultants—and how much will that cost?

Will the Secretary of State also confirm that the initiatives are to be paid for out of central funds, bypassing local education authorities? Will he confirm that the proportion of school funding from standard spending assessments is steadily falling as, instead, head teachers have to spend all their time applying for individual packets of money, under his personal control? The Secretary of State is exasperating teachers with his ceaseless flow of initiatives. At the last count, schools and LEAs were having to submit 17 plans to him. Now he even has a working party to cut the paperwork produced by all the other working parties.

We are told that education action zones are the most radical initiative of the lot. Indeed, the main appeal of joining such zones is that the initiative enables schools to opt out from all the other schemes that the Secretary of State has imposed on them. Will he therefore confirm that schools in education action zones will not be bound to implement whatever changes he introduces to teachers' pay and conditions?

The statement is warm words and ambitious claims, but as always with the Secretary of State, there is little about the practicalities. We want practical, flexible measures to recruit, retain and reward good teachers—measures which rest on local flexibility and local discretion. Instead, the Secretary of State has produced another cumbersome scheme, based above all on his belief that the man in Whitehall knows best. We very much doubt whether it can be made to work. Teachers, parents and children deserve better.

Mr. Blunkett: I think the House deserves better than that. A party that presided over the largest exit of teachers in memory owing to its inept messing about with the pension scheme and severance pay is ill prepared to come here this afternoon and talk about difficulties with recruitment. We are facing up to those problems in a way that the Conservatives failed to do in their 18 years in office. The whole programme is geared to recruiting, retaining and rewarding. We know that there is a serious problem: 35 per cent. of those who train do not go into teaching within two years, which is a tragic waste of resources. Let us work together to attract people and keep teachers in the profession.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about basic literacy and numeracy. The fact that many of those who were educated in the past 18 years do not have basic literacy and numeracy skills is not down to the Labour party, but is a result of the Conservatives' failure to provide the necessary phonics, grammar and spelling, which the hon. Gentleman attacks every time he rises to speak.

I tried to ensure that Opposition parties had the Green Paper long enough to allow them to take a look at it this afternoon, instead of giving them only the usual half hour. I had hoped that the hon. Gentleman would at least see that the advanced skills teacher posts form part of the new leadership tier—they are in there. We are pleased that 1,100 people have already applied in time for the target date for the 1 April roll-out; and 80 per cent. of local authorities have put in schools for the advanced skills teacher posts.

What about the pay review body? Who was it kept holding back teachers' pay and did not implement awards in full? I love the way in which the Conservatives, whose instructions to the pay review body to hold down pay and not to implement awards resulted in the catastrophe that occurred in the teaching profession a year or two ago, come here and have the cheek to tell us what the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) has said today. No, I did not tell the review body to hold down teachers' pay; I told it to take account of the circumstances of inflation and, above all, to take account of the fact that we did not want to stage the review from next April. We are clear about that.

[Mr. Blunkett]

How quickly will teachers reach the threshold? We have instigated the fast track for new entrants and the figure will be about 1,000 people a year, which, given the numbers coming into teaching, is a substantial figure. Others who are already in the teaching profession—new teachers in years one and two—will be able to multiply the number of increments through which they can move as part of the new system of appraisal. Fast track linked to appraisal will enable people quickly to reach the point which currently takes them seven years to reach. The whole system is based on appraisal and external assessment—a light touch that enables heads to do their job, but with assessment being carried out from outside to secure fairness and consistency, which is what I described in my statement.

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of getting money to schools. It would be grossly unfair if we used a system that resulted in schools that did not have a large number of teachers passing through the threshold getting the money, while those that legitimately had a large number of high-performing teachers could not afford to pay them. That is why, in the early stages, we shall ring-fence the money and consult on ensuring that the money reaches the schools where teachers require the pay. The teaching profession has for years asked us to make sure that there is no block on the ability to pay good teachers well, just because they happen to be in the wrong authority or the wrong school, based on the distribution system.

Education action zones will pioneer our programme. They will be one step ahead of it and they will be able to reward good teachers extremely well. That is why we set them up and why I am sure that the whole House will support the new programmes.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Rothwell): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, which appears to be one that must give the teaching profession new life and expectations of a far better time in the future under a Labour Government.

I regret the fact that the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) made such poor use of the advance sight of the document that the Secretary of State gave him. He clearly approached the Green Paper in the wrong way: he looked to see how he could carp and criticise instead of offering constructive suggestions about education in the future. I regret the fact that the hon. Gentleman missed the opportunity to show support for our teachers and instead concentrated simply on the mess that he knows his Government made of the same programmes— [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I must correct hon. Members. This is a time for questions, not speeches. Is the hon. Member for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Gunnell) coming to his question?

Mr. Gunnell: I am coming—

Madam Speaker: Good. The hon. Gentleman is providing a good example of how not to put a question to the Secretary of State. It is the first Back-Bench question, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not mind my using it as an example of how not to question the Secretary of State.

Mr. Gunnell: I welcome particularly the fact that teamwork is rewarded, because there is no profession where it is more important. If I may give a specific example—

Madam Speaker: No, I am sorry. A joke is a joke—I have a sense of humour the same as anyone's, but I cannot allow speeches. There will be no examples. Just ask a question, please.

Mr. Gunnell: In order to exploit his skills, a science teacher often relies on a laboratory assistant who does the preparation work. Under such circumstances, how will a school recognise both the excellence of that teacher and the role of the laboratory assistant in preparing his work?

Mr. Blunkett: I thank my hon. Friend, and I agree entirely with the preamble to his question.

Those who assist and support teachers will benefit from the school bonus programme, from the development of the individual learning account and from new training and support. Many of them will want to progress in their professions and some will want to begin teacher training. We will encourage them to do so on a modular basis so that they may continue to earn their living while preparing to enter the teaching profession.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): Will the Secretary of State confirm that, under the approach adopted by the previous Administration, nearly 20,000 experienced but demoralised and disillusioned teachers left the profession in just one year? We need to do better. Does the Secretary of State accept that the Liberal Democrats welcome the broad thrust of the proposals? Will he confirm that performance-related pay will not be paid according to results? It should be based on the skills, experience and competence of teachers, not the performance of their pupils.

Will the Secretary of State further confirm that the opportunities for higher rewards will be available to all teachers and that he expects the majority of teachers to benefit from them? However, will he also acknowledge that he is relying a great deal on the assessment procedure, and that there will be complications if that procedure is used simultaneously to judge teachers' salaries and an appropriate amount of continuing professional development?

Finally, does the Secretary of State accept that, although his proposals will assist in the longer term, there is an immediate crisis? May I therefore welcome his clear and unequivocal statement today that the teachers pay award will not be phased? Can he confirm that, at a minimum, it will be sufficient to meet the real inflation costs hitting teachers' pockets?

Mr. Blunkett: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's opening comments. We can work constructively to get the proposals agreed. On the final point, the recommendation is entirely in the hands of the review body and must be independent. I will respect that.

I shall deal with the essential points that the hon. Gentleman raised. Teachers will move to and will be appraised for moving through the threshold on their performance and their commitment, not on the quantum of past exam results of students whom they may well not have had a hand in teaching. That aspect falls into the teamwork approach and will be dealt with separately through sophisticated arrangements for the school bonus. There is nothing crude about that which would punish teachers for working in challenging schools in difficult areas.

Sufficient resources will be available over the initial period to ensure that a majority of teachers can access the programme, bearing in mind that many teachers will be entering the profession and will be in the early stages. About £1 billion will be available in 2000–01 and 2001–02 to put the proposals into place. It is the best promise that teachers have ever had.

Miss Melanie Johnson (Welwyn Hatfield): Unlike the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), I believe that the national professional qualification for headship offers great scope for the development of head teachers. I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's comments about how valuable and important heads are in the lives of schools and the quality of education. How does my right hon. Friend see the NPQH developing through the new structures that he outlined this afternoon?

Mr. Blunkett: The development of the college that I described will play a signal role in helping us to extend the NPQH. As hon. Members know, great enthusiasm for it has been expressed by heads. In the initial period we, together with the Teacher Training Agency, have been appraising how we can improve it and build on the experiences of head teachers.

We want to be able to fast-track those willing to undertake leadership, in order to allow them to do so on a modular basis and to accelerate their professional development. We want to put in place as heads those enthusiastic young men and women who see their role in education in the future and have the natural skills to lead the profession in the new century.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): Does the Secretary of State recall that the 1995 Conservative Government's Blue Paper on teacher training began with the words

"In education the role of the teacher is central"?

Any aspects of his proposals that stimulate higher standards in the teaching profession, if fulfilled, will be welcome to us.

Nevertheless, may I raise two points with the right hon. Gentleman? The first is a technical one, relating to the basic skills requirements for teachers. Is it not high time that those were built into the standard suite of qualifications—the GCSE, A-level and degree level performance of teachers—so that they do not need re-examination? If anything, existing teachers may need some strengthening in that respect.

Secondly, does the Secretary of State accept that there is likely to be a severe strain on resources, both in assessment and in paying for this substantial pattern of incentives? If so, is there not a danger, while the proposals are being worked through, of a two-tier profession? They can in no sense be a substitute for the adequate remuneration of ordinary classroom teachers who are doing their best and largely succeeding in doing a proper job for their pupils.

Mr. Blunkett: I accept the hon. Gentleman's sensible questions in the spirit in which they were delivered. The lag between now and the underpinning of A-level and advanced year NVQ in respect of key skills must be addressed—hence the development of the literacy, numeracy and IT programme that I described. We must help mature entrants to catch up without feeling at a disadvantage.

The question of how we implement that is important. We will have performance management systems in place, which will be monitored by Ofsted and the Audit Commission. The performance management systems will be crucial to ensure that the appraisal and review are non-bureaucratic. The outside assessors will give consistency and fairness to the system, so that people cannot claim that there has been discrimination or the blocking of a teacher's application for movement through the threshold. It is important that we get that right in the early stages. If we can move quickly after the consultation period, I should like to start the appraisal and begin the assessment process before implementation in 2000 so that we can move people on to the new scales as quickly as possible.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): Is my right hon. Friend aware of how welcome his promise to improve the environments in which teachers work will be? As a teacher who spent at least two years in an asbestos-riddled hut, I know how many of my colleagues would have been pleased to benefit from that.

I invite my right hon. Friend to use the opportunity that the proposals present to reconsider the requirements that university institutions put on entrants to the primary postgraduate certificate of education. I am concerned that such entrants are required to have degrees in national curriculum subjects. That requirement was introduced in advice by the previous Government.

There are, therefore, people with excellent degrees—in subjects such as modern languages, which do not apply in primary years but develop skills that are relevant to literacy teaching—who are not eligible for the primary PGCE. If we have ways of testing literacy and numeracy skills, as well as information and communications technology skills, there is a strong case for changing that requirement. Will my right hon. Friend consider doing so?

Mr. Blunkett: I am very happy to tell my hon. Friend that we were concerned about the way in which that previous advice was being interpreted. My hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards has sent out a letter clarifying that, so that there will be no future misunderstandings. I hope very much that it will help to alleviate the problem.

My hon. Friend's question gives me the opportunity to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards. She and my advisers and officials have worked incredibly hard with me on the Green Paper, and I appreciate that greatly.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): The Secretary of State will be well aware that the results achieved by the secondary modern and grammar schools in the borough of Trafford are once again among the best in the country. That is largely because we have a great number of excellent teachers in those schools.

Will the Secretary of State make it clear—I think that he gave such an assurance and I welcome it, if he did—that there is no upper limit on the number of teachers who can qualify, and that there will be consistent interpretation according to the quality of their performance and nothing else?

Will the Secretary of State also make it clear that schools or the local education authority will not have to fund the programme; and—this is important, given the large numbers involved—how quickly does he envisage all teachers who may qualify being able to go through the qualification period? What are the implications in terms of cost and the number of external assessors who need to be part of that programme?

Mr. Blunkett: There were a large number of questions rolled into one there, so I shall be brief. I have made it clear previously and this afternoon that money in the initial stages would have to be ring-fenced and directed so that schools could afford to implement the programme. Obviously that will need to be consolidated; otherwise schools would accelerate every teacher whom the head thought was appropriate as quickly as possible, without any constraint whatever.

The hon. Gentleman should not presume that teachers in schools with high performance would automatically go through the threshold. Teachers who are doing a first-rate job in challenging areas with schools that have enormously challenging intakes may find themselves equally able to access the threshold and the progress that needs to be made. I hope that they do.

As I told the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), we have to get as many teachers as possible moving towards and through the threshold, to accord them the status that they deserve and to reward them for the work that they are doing.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South): I welcome my right hon. Friend's comprehensive statement. It is important to emphasise that it is comprehensive and not only about pay levels. Will he outline further the measures in the Green Paper for encouraging the collaboration of teachers to raise standards?

Mr. Blunkett: The bonus system will encourage all staff to perform and work together, and the collaborative fund for small schools will complement the work that is already taking place. In education action zones, schools are beginning to collaborate and work co-operatively to develop ways of supporting and helping each other. They are establishing intranet systems, so that they can share information and advice. The more schools work together to lift standards for children rather than compete with each other in a marketplace, the better it will be for our students.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): When will the Secretary of State realise that my postbag is filled with complaints from head teachers and governing bodies as a consequence of his initiatives? Perhaps the most talented primary head in Hampshire is to be lost to the private sector as a consequence of the Secretary of State's initiatives. He is contributing to this problem, and it is time that he addressed it.

Mr. Blunkett: I am always slightly amused, if not mystified, by Conservative Members who say that good state heads and teachers are moving into the private sector and then criticise the measures that we are taking, which aim to match the standard and the methodology that the private sector claims to be using. Our proposals are aimed at providing good leadership, clear discipline, a decent environment, good equipment, low class sizes, and literacy and numeracy strategies that place emphasis on phonics, grammar and spelling—but they are opposed by Conservative Members.

Jacqui Smith (Redditch): May I reassure my right hon. Friend that the reason I left the teaching profession in May 1997 was not that I was demoralised, but that the country was demoralised by the Conservative Government? Conservative Members have provided good evidence of that this afternoon. One of the most frustrating features of my 11 years in teaching was the reduction in the funding and opportunities for professional development and training, so I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement on individual learning accounts for teachers. Will he outline how those accounts will be administered, when we can expect them and when teachers can begin to benefit from the effects they will have on professional development and improving standards?

Mr. Blunkett: We are establishing a pilot programme—initially with £5 million—to test the commitment of teachers and non-teaching staff who want to develop their skills and professionalism. That is on top of the resources that we are already allocating to continuing professional development through the standards fund—£60 million this year for literacy and £60 million next year for numeracy—and the additional £230 million for the training of all teachers on information and communication technology. This is a small pilot programme on top of the enormous investment currently going into the system.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Would it help or hinder a head's leadership role if he were given more freedom of manoeuvre in the hiring and firing of staff?

Mr. Blunkett: No, I am sure it would not.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North): May I welcome the Secretary of State's statement, which goes a long way towards keeping good teachers in the classroom? Will he explain how the system of appraisal will be balanced and fair as between schools and between teachers teaching different types of classes in the same school? One teacher may have a lot of A-level teaching and another may teach slow learners. Will he give the House a few more details on how the outside assessors will work in conjunction with the heads, and how teachers will be able to appeal against their assessment if they are dissatisfied with it?

Mr. Blunkett: The appraisal will be personal to the teacher, so it will appraise the worth, commitment and performance of teachers in the circumstances with which they are faced and according to the work they are doing.

The management performance system, which will itself be monitored, will be crucial to ensuring that appraisal works, is rigorous and is seen to be fair. The assessor's job will be to sample the way in which appraisal is working, and to test the claims of teachers who consider themselves to have been badly treated against an assessment of those teachers' performance.

Ultimately, however, the success of the system will depend on the right management and leadership, so that appraisal is not second-guessed by the assessors, but reviewed and monitored. The system must be transparent, and there must be no discrimination.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley): I welcome the proposals, which will enable good classroom teachers to progress. Many teachers are currently being blocked: they cannot progress without taking on extra responsibility.

What rewards or incentives will be available to schools where teachers are shown to have made progress as a team—where all staff members have made a contribution? We should not only reward individuals for their ability to show the quality of their own teaching.

Mr. Blunkett: I have already stressed the need for us to view schools as consisting of a range of men and women who are contributing to an improvement in standards. It is crucial for the future that the professional teacher should be a learning manager, able to direct and use paid staff, volunteers and parents imaginatively, and to bring out the best in the school.

I am hoping that some two thirds of schools will have access to the bonus system, to which we are allocating £60 million each year. Not only will staff be rewarded; we shall give new opportunities to non-teaching staff to display their talent and to develop professionally, which will, I think, be widely welcomed in the profession.

Caroline Flint (Don Valley): I welcome all the measures that my right hon. Friend has announced, which will benefit teachers in terms not just of pay, but of the school environment and the whole school community—teachers and non-teachers.

What will be the structure of the consultation? One of the criticisms made of the last Government was that not enough time was allowed for consultation on important measures. As we are now discussing the need for modern teachers for a new century, and a new professional status for teachers, I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend gave us some idea of how much time will be allowed, so that we can do our job as Members of Parliament and ensure that we hear comments from the grass roots.

Mr. Blunkett: Four months will be allowed for consultation, which can take place until 31 March 1999. The consultation will be open to everyone who wants to contribute to getting the system right. In a week or two, a technical paper will be published to back up the Green Paper. We want to ensure that the details of implementation can be discussed not just with the profession but more widely—with, for instance, governors' representatives and local education authorities—and that everyone with something constructive to say is heard and responded to.

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands): I, too, welcome the statement. I particularly welcome the long consultation period, which will enable teachers in the classroom to respond to the proposals.

How does my right hon. Friend intend to recognise, and boost, the vital role of the classroom assistants who help teachers to raise educational standards?

Mr. Blunkett: I have mentioned the 20,000 additional assistants who will be provided over the next three years. I consider that a major contribution to changing the way in which we use the talent that is at our disposal, so that teachers can undertake the key professional tasks for which they have been trained, and can develop constructively over the years.

The use of assistants should be seen as part of the development of their own future, and their own talents. Many are making a substantial contribution, not just to literacy and—in the years to come—numeracy, but to special needs education. Many special needs children would be in a much more difficult position if it were not for the talent of the non-teaching staff who help them so much.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement, which I am sure will do much to improve the quality of education in our schools. However, I wonder whether he could say a bit more about how he envisages school governors working with head teachers on staffing structures and the skills mix for the school, and, in particular, how he sees governors going about the appraisal of head teachers, which I imagine will be a difficult task.

Mr. Blunkett: I want to make it absolutely clear that governors play a crucial role. Often, many of them feel overwhelmed with what they are being asked to do, without the necessary advice and support, so putting in place new guidance and support systems for governing bodies, providing a new role for education authorities where schools are local education authority community schools, and making available the resources to Church and foundation schools will all be crucial. We must ensure that, this time, governors are in a position to be able to do the job and to benchmark what is taking place in other schools, so as to learn about the way in which other governing bodies and schools have worked. In that way, governors can both hold the head to account and support the head in the key management job of raising standards.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): For clarification of a point raised earlier, will the Secretary of State place it on record unequivocally that he will accept in full and implement the recommendations of the school teachers' review body next year?

Mr. Blunkett: Just to be helpful, the answer to that is: no, I will not, for the very reason that I spelled out earlier. It is an independent review. We recommended that the award should take into account our desire—our will—to carry out the recommendation in full; but—so that we all talk in a sensible, mature fashion—should for some reason the review body come up with an award that was simply unaffordable next year in all circumstances, no one in his right mind would expect us to have committed ourselves on 3 December, before the review body had reported, to implementing that award. And I do know that the hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) is in her right mind.

NHS (Wales)

4.18 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Alun Michael): With permission, Madam Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the future of the health service in Wales.

The national health service is one of Labour's proudest creations, especially in Wales. It is a tribute to the people who work in the NHS that it continues to give such a high standard of care and retains such public confidence. People want the NHS to be modernised and strengthened, rather than undermined or replaced.

I will not labour the point, but the NHS in Wales has not been given a fair chance in recent years and 18 years of damage cannot be repaired in 18 months. Lack of coherence in the long-term planning of the health service in Wales has frequently left clinicians, managers and officials trying to make the best of a bad job.

I saw that in my area, where the failure to develop an adequate 10-year plan in the early 1980s was compounded by a lunatic scheme to build a third district general hospital in the Cardiff area. The abandonment of that plan and subsequent piecemeal decisions have been bad for morale and for the aim of providing high-quality health care. I hope that today's statement will lay the foundations for a new partnership approach which strengthens the health service to create one NHS to serve the people of each community in Wales, replacing the two, three or four divided services in some areas.

Standing still is not an option for acute services. The Royal College of Surgeons generally wants specialist services to be centralised in fewer units. Instead of being forced to respond to clinical advice in a piecemeal and expensive way, trusts will be able to organise safe specialist services across different sites cost-effectively. A new, coherent pattern of trusts is needed to replace a situation in which many act as if they are mediaeval city states each competing with the other, rather than organisations which need to be partners with each other in providing health care.

Before we came to power, the then shadow Minister with responsibility for health in Wales pledged that we would cut the number of NHS trusts in order to direct resources away from administration and into patient care. The new configuration of trusts, which I am announcing today, follows 18 months of widespread consultation. May I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) and the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) who played such a leading part in those consultations and discussions? Configuration is not an end in itself so I wish to spell out clearly the new shape and direction of the NHS in Wales and the way in which I expect board members and managers to carry out their work in future.

Unproductive competition and piecemeal changes in recent years have led many people to worry about the future of a specific hospital in their area. People rightly identify with "their" hospital and that is to be encouraged by the trusts, not seen as old-fashioned or irrelevant. I can reassure people in every part of Wales that the approach they want, reinforcing the hospitals and institutions they respect and depend upon, will be the way forward for the future.

Wherever possible, we have followed three principles. First, we want to bring together neighbouring trusts which provide acute services in order to eliminate competition, promote collaboration, reduce unnecessary duplication, tackle financial problems and attack waiting lists. Secondly, we want to combine community health and acute services to create a single health service for each area. That will allow clinicians in both sectors to collaborate in providing a seamless service to each patient. I expect that to be of particular benefit to the elderly. Thirdly, wherever possible, the new trust will share the same boundaries as unitary authorities to simplify relations with social services and within the new local health groups we are establishing.

Those principles will better provide for the co-ordination of care for each individual patient, whether on an acute ward or in a community hospital, a nursing home or at home. The changes will remove the problem of bed blocking and release resources for more urgent cases.

Those principles have won general support in Wales, but applying them can be difficult. The distribution of the population, the distribution of hospital services and the geography of Wales are all against us—otherwise it is straightforward! As a result, several themes came up consistently from the consultations. I wish to be absolutely clear on our response to these for the benefit of the public and for the benefit of planners and managers in the health service.

First, reconfiguration in itself must not stop anyone going to a local hospital. As at present, general practitioners will be able to refer patients where they believe it is in their clinical interests to do so. Secondly, mergers will not be takeovers, but the creation of a new partnership. Key services must not be moved to the larger hospital. Community and mental health services must not be ravaged for the benefit of acute services. No hospitals will close as a result of reconfiguration. If health services should change or a hospital should close, such events must occur for objective reasons, not as a result of reconfiguration.

Some people have asked for reconfiguration to be put off for a year or more. That is not an option. We have to keep the pre-election promise of cutting bureaucracy, and create health service structures that will enable the new Assembly to undertake its work of accountability. Reconfiguration is essential if trusts are to plan their services effectively, to deal with the mounting pressures upon them and to make real inroads into waiting lists and cope with current financial pressures.

Reconfiguration must not be just a question of merging organisations or drawing lines on a map. I am prepared to take time to explain the reasons behind each decision and to demonstrate that I have listened to people's concerns. For that reason, I have prepared a much fuller statement explaining my decisions which will be sent to trusts, health authorities, community health councils, local authorities, trade unions and the press. I am placing a copy on the Board this afternoon for every hon. Member with a Welsh constituency and for representatives of the Conservative party. I will also send a letter to trust chairs to pass on to staff to allay concerns.

I have approved the establishment of eight new trusts on 1 April 1999, but I wish first to refer to two areas where I am not going ahead with the proposals on the basis on which consultation took place. I do not intend to agree to a merger of the Powys Health Care NHS trust with Ceredigion and Mid Wales NHS trust. On each of the visits I made to Powys during my period as a shadow Health Minister for Wales, I was impressed by the degree of local unity, which was reinforced by GPs and nurses during my recent visit to Newtown hospital and by views expressed by local MPs, Labour party members, trade unions, and local councillors as well as the trust itself.

The decision leaves challenges for the Powys trust, and I shall insist that it delivers on the assurances given to the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central, that the benefits and savings of reconfiguration can be delivered without the need for a merger. I hope that local Members and others will support the board in delivering on those commitments.

I am very much aware of the isolation of Ceredigion's acute services, but those problems would be hidden in a combined trust. I therefore expect the development of close collaboration between Ceredigion and acute services in other trusts. I shall in the near future discuss those issues personally with representatives of the Ceredigion trust and other local representatives.

In Cardiff and the Vale of Glamorgan, the proposal to split the Llandough hospital from community services now managed by Llandough NHS trust is entirely opposed to the principle of creating a single health service for each area. The way forward for Cardiff and the Vale of Glamorgan is the creation of a single integrated trust for the area—excluding Velindre, because of its specialist nature. However, immediately to create one trust would involve an operation of far greater complexity than any of the other mergers.

I have, therefore, reluctantly accepted that a two-stage process is necessary. It is important to give certainty to staff and management by setting a clear time scale for both stages. I intend to merge the University Hospital trust with the Llandough trust—including the community element—and to combine Cardiff Community trust with the University dental hospital. There will be speedy consultation on the proposal, but I am confident that it meets most of the objections to the previous proposal. My intention is that the merger will proceed on 1 April 1999. As soon as possible, I shall make a further announcement on the second stage.

The new NHS trusts to which I am giving the go-ahead are: North West Wales NHS trust; Conwy and Denbighshire NHS trust; North East Wales NHS trust; Carmarthenshire NHS trust; Swansea NHS trust; Bro Morgannwg NHS trust; Pontypridd and Rhondda NHS trust; and Gwent Healthcare NHS trust.

I intend to take a personal interest in the way in which the changes are made, and I will strengthen the role of community health councils which, with local authorities and local health groups, will help to create an effective and inclusive structure for the NHS in Wales.

Major benefits are available, for example, by bringing the Gwent health authority's three trusts together. Moreover, the merger in Gwent—unlike the merger in Cardiff—can be achieved immediately, as it is a far less complex operation. I am convinced that the future of Nevill Hall hospital is secure because of its key strategic position, but appreciate the fears that have been expressed in north Gwent.

I am requiring the new trust to state clearly how the pattern of services will be developed across hospitals in Gwent. Local authorities, hon. Members, and community health councils and the new local health groups will have a chance to comment, and I hope that that transparency will ensure that the reconfiguration is seen as a new partnership in Gwent and not as a takeover of one hospital by another.

The same principles will be emphasised with every one of the new trusts. We are interested not only in the pattern of services, but in the nature of management and the way in which services are delivered. For example, I have more reason than most people to understand the local importance of Llandudno hospital, which is where, after an operation in 1950, I left my tonsils. Community links and expectations might suggest that Llandudno hospital should be linked to Ysbyty Gwynedd, but doing so would fail to provide the critical mass of acute services in north-west Wales that are essential to effective local care.

Llandudno will stay with Ysbyty Gwynedd, but the way in which it provides its services must respect local expectations in Llandudno and the surrounding area. I am therefore requiring Gwynedd Hospital NHS trust to consult Glan Clwyd District General Hospital NHS trust and other local partners, including the local authority and local health group, and report back to me on how those matters can be reconciled.

Mechanisms such as the one that I have proposed are the way in which we can ensure that there is proper co-operation in the best interests of local areas, in which the principles I have stated are inevitably in conflict with each other.

Similarly, the merger of the Llanelli Dinefwr and Carmarthen trusts is intended to improve patient care across the county. However, I understand also the fears in the Llanelli area and the strength of support for a hospital that local people have supported enormously strongly over many years.

I am determined that reconfiguration will not lead to the closure or downgrading of Prince Philip hospital. The hospital will not lose its accident and emergency unit or its magnetic resonance imaging scanner. I am requiring the new trust to state how it will meet those requirements, and the views of local hon. Members and other local partners will be sought to ensure that our intention becomes a reality.

Finally, I am aware of the concern that changes in patient flows as a result of creating a single new trust could damage services in Swansea. I shall hold Iechyd Morgannwg health authority to its pledge not to allow patient flows to change because of reconfiguration. My officials will have the clear task of working with health authorities and the new trusts in as transparent a way as possible towards an improved style and quality of management in the new structures directed entirely at providing better patient care and respecting the needs of local communities.

It is central to the role of the new trusts that they should make themselves accessible to their communities and engage them in their decision making and planning, as our NHS White Paper requires. That is the only way in which to reassure communities about the impact of reconfiguration and to reap the benefit of better patient care that the changes are intended to achieve.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I welcome the right hon. Gentleman to his post. I believe that this is his first statement as Secretary of State for Wales. I am grateful to him for giving me a copy of his statement earlier this afternoon so that I had an opportunity to read it. He may have other matters to divert his attention these days, particularly the battle with the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), and his hopes to be parachuted into a position in the Welsh Assembly, but I hope that he will be able to get his head out of the clouds for long enough to give sufficient attention to those issues that need it, including the national health service.

We fully appreciate the fact that the health service in Wales needs special extra attention. The consultation document "Better Health, Better Wales" mentions on page 5 that health service provision and the health of people in Wales is poorer than in England and the rest of the European Community. There is no reason why that should be allowed to continue.

I applaud the work of the nurses, doctors and support services in the hospitals in Wales. They do a superb job and deserve our recognition, not just today but every day.

The people of Wales will want to know how the reconfiguration of trusts will improve services. Will it reduce waiting lists and waiting times? I am sure that the Secretary of State saw the Western Mail on 12 November, which said that more people were waiting 12 months and 18 months for operations in Wales. That is unacceptable and we need to ensure great improvements. Many people believe that there is more fiddling with waiting list figures than Stephane Grappelli has ever seen. The Western Mail article features the comments of Jan Williams, the chairman of the confederation, who welcomes extra money to tackle waiting lists, but believes that sustained improvements will need increased funding on a recurring basis. Can we have assurances that we shall get such continued extra money for the health service?

I am concerned about the comments of Dr. Dewi Evans of Singleton and Morriston hospitals on the scandal of youngsters having to wait for operations in certain specialties in Wales. Will the reconfiguration of the trusts ensure an improvement in the health service, particularly for our young people?

The Government have talked about the reconfiguration resulting in savings. Initially a figure of £10 million was mentioned, although that has changed to £7 million recently. Those who work in the NHS have grave suspicions that the savings cannot come simply from the reconfiguration and that the extra money will come from front-line services. We are concerned that if the savings cannot be made as the Secretary of State has outlined, he will have to turn his attention elsewhere in the NHS to secure them. We want to ensure that the front-line services are improved, not damaged, by the changes.

The Secretary of State has also said that he has not acted on all the recommendations initially, with particular reference to Powys and Ceredigion, which I applaud. When I was in Powys, I too listened to the concerns of many members of the public—the people who are on the receiving end of the health service in Wales. People were worried that the acute service would completely swamp the community-based treatment that they received. I am delighted that the right hon. Gentleman has listened to their concerns.

Yesterday, a statement was made on the millennium bug problem. The right hon. Gentleman did not mention it today, but as the changes in the health service will take place in 1999—exactly when the millennium bug might affect hospitals that have not taken proper action—will he assure us that the problem will continue to be treated as a priority? The Audit Commission reported earlier this year that the treatment of the problem in the NHS was extremely patchy.

Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that people who live in rural areas will continue to receive the community services on which they have come to rely? He will appreciate that those people do not have adequate public transport to go to larger hospitals many miles away.

Will the Secretary of State reassure us that, in the reconfiguration, waiting list lengths will be tackled? I understand what he says about the geographical problem in Wales, but we must not allow those hospitals that he says will not be closed to be generally downgraded; the reconfiguration must not be used as an excuse to downgrade services. Will he assure us that there will be no downgrading of provision in, for example, the Nevill Hall hospital, which he mentioned?

The right hon. Gentleman referred to Swansea. That is where I grew up and where my family live, so I have particular reason to attend to what happens to the hospitals there. I remember that, when the emergency service in Singleton hospital was threatened with closure, there was an almighty outcry, even though extra provision was being made elsewhere. Will he guarantee that, even with the flows of patients between various hospitals in the area, that service will not be damaged?

If the Government paid as much attention to the real doctors in Wales as they do to their spin doctors—on whom they spend twice as much money as the Conservative Government did—the services would be much better in Wales. The right hon. Gentleman knows that there will be elections in Wales next year. Many people will wonder why, as it is only a few months until the Assembly takes responsibility for the health service in Wales, he did not delay his decisions on the reconfiguration and let the Assembly take them. The Assembly may want to look again at what he has announced today and make further changes, and that could be extremely expensive. He should remember that, in the elections to the Assembly, the Government will be judged not on their words, but on their deeds.

Mr. Michael: There was a good deal of knockabout in that contribution. The hon. Gentleman has a cheek to talk about parachutes. I have represented a Welsh constituency for 11 years and, before I took up other responsibilities, I spent four years as shadow Health Minister for Wales. I have been immersed in the politics of the Labour party and Wales for more than 30 years, but he had to go to Ribble Valley to win a seat in the House. I take it that he left his parachute outside the Chamber before he came in and had the cheek, as someone who represents an English constituency, to talk about the health service in Wales.

I suppose that we should take his contribution as a belated apology for the damage that the Conservative party did over 18 years to the health service in Wales. His recognition of the importance of nurses is also belated. I speak for all Labour Members in saying that we value the nurses, doctors and the other health service staff who have a variety of functions; they all contribute enormously to the quality of health care.

It is important that we do not become frozen in immobility because of the Assembly. I believe that the leader of Plaid Cymru, the right hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), agrees with that. We must lay down foundations and make sure that structures are in place so that the Assembly will be able to call the health service to account, to examine the management of the health service and to look at the outcomes and the outputs that are important to the people whom we represent.

The proposals will help to reduce waiting lists and waiting times, and the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) should recognise that waiting lists dropped by 1,700 last month. The Under-Secretary of State for Wales, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central, will have more to say next week to embarrass the hon. Gentleman further. The separation of elective and emergency work within the new trusts will help to tackle waiting lists.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley was worried about the extent of savings, but the Pembroke-Derwen merger made continuing savings of £750,000 per annum—well above the estimates given of resultant savings. We can have some confidence in the estimates. I will talk to people who have concerns about achieving the savings and about the way in which they are fed back into health care. The hon. Gentleman seems to get most of his information from the Western Mail, and I can tell him that I will listen to those who work in the health service, including the representatives of Unison. They have genuine concerns about these matters—they do not want to score points in this Chamber.

The hon. Member wanted to know about the millennium bug. He must have been scraping the bottom of the barrel for something to say at that point. Yes, the changes will take place on 1 April 1999, and we are making sure that the millennium bug will not damage the emergency services and health services generally in Wales. We give priority to that matter. I have been a member of the Cabinet Committee that is emphasising the need for every organisation to be aware of the issue. If new IT systems are needed as part of the reconfiguration, they will be millennium compliant.

The hon. Member asked about rural areas, and I have recognised the need for flexibility. That is precisely the reason for the decision in Powys, and why I have recognised that the situation in Ceredigion is difficult, but must be addressed. Problems of rurality, sparsity, mountains and other matters cause problems in the provision of services in virtually every part of Wales. That is one of the issues that we are trying to address through the flexibility provided by the reconfiguration. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman noticed the geographical problems of Wales. I am not sure how long it took him to come to that conclusion.

I emphasised in the statement the answers to a number of questions that the hon. Member for Ribble Valley asked, such as the future of Nevill Hall, which I said should not be downgraded. I made it clear that in each of the trusts, there should be no asset-stripping of one hospital by another or any undermining of confidence, so that services are available where people need them. The ability to maintain those local services and different centres of provision will be strengthened, not weakened, by the way in which we have undertaken the reconfiguration. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that it is all good news and that he can leave the Chamber cheering at the news that he has been given.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): First, I pay tribute to the civil servants in the Welsh Office, and to the managers, medical staff and others at all levels in the health service in Wales for the immense efforts that they have put into the reconfiguration process, which has been incredibly important. It is estimated that it will save between £7 million and £10 million by the end of this Parliament. Given the small adjustments that have been made in individual proposals, will there be any effect on those savings? My trust was confident that it could do better in savings terms than the figures in the proposals.

It is very important that we get the message across that permanent savings from administration will go directly to patient care. Will my right hon. Friend confirm and underline that the future of hospital and community services in the health service in Wales will, in the near future, lie in the hands of local health groups, doctors, nurses, midwives and local authority representatives, who will have the job of seeing how hospital services fit into the new health service in Wales?

Mr. Michael: I join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to those people who are going through a difficult process, and who worked closely with him during his period as the Minister with responsibility for health in Wales. I repeat my tribute to my hon. Friend for the hard work that he undertook in difficult circumstances. It is always more difficult to start when one is clearing up a mess than if one is starting from a strong position. Frankly, the former is where we found ourselves 18 months ago.

I am confident that the adjustments will not cause a problem in relation to savings. In Powys, the health authority has given the assurance that the necessary savings can be effected in ways that it is happy to achieve itself. I am certain that the dismemberment of the Llandough trust in order to put it back together again in a couple of years as part of stage 2 would have been an expensive way of doing a job badly. I am confident that the savings will not be any lower as a result of the decisions on Cardiff and the Vale of Glamorgan.

We will look specifically at Ceredigion in light of our decision, but I hope that my intention can be carried through and that we can strengthen partnership and co-operation between Ceredigion and other trusts to make sure that difficulties are not caused. I underline the point that savings are to be diverted back into health care, and I am sure that all my hon. Friends want to see that happen.

Finally, I can give my hon. Friend the answer he is looking for in relation to community services. It is very important that there is a proper balance between hospital and community services, which must be integrated and complementary. My hon. Friend is right to stress that the future is in the hands of local health groups, which will bring a new degree of accountability at the most local level. That matches the developments that will take place in the coming year, when the overall strategic accountability will be in the hands of the new elected Assembly for Wales.

Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): May I offer the Secretary of State and his Minister my profound gratitude and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey) and the people of Powys at today's decision? The people of Powys have worked so hard to protect the continued existence of Powys health trust, and have won a common-sense victory today. Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that this will be regarded as an indication that, for once at least, Ministers have been willing to listen to the concerns of the public and to act accordingly—something that is extremely welcome? That will bring great cause for celebration to the professionals working in health trusts in Powys.

Does the Secretary of State agree that while this decision may not please everyone in Wales, few in Powys will be disappointed? Does he agree that it was somewhat mean-spirited of the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) to seek the negatives and to make irrelevant party political points at a time when it is important for us to recognise that the decisions have been altered according to the consultation process that involved effort on both sides? That process has led ultimately to a pleasing result in terms of the modification of the plans.

The Secretary of State mentioned the need for Powys to achieve savings, and that has been mentioned on a number of occasions. Will he accept my assurance that I and my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire will honour the commitment to work with Powys health trust to ensure that those savings are found—recognising, none the less, that the process presents us with a further challenge that we must not avoid?

More broadly, there will be debates and concerns in other parts of Wales, especially about the financial savings that must be found. Does the Secretary of State agree none the less that the Powys decision should be regarded as an example of what can be done when parties listen and work together—[Interruption.]—when the public are genuinely consulted and, perhaps most importantly, when the public interest is put above party political concerns, in this case leading to the maintenance of a health service that is loved by the people of Powys and highly respected by all those who have cause to use it?

Mr. Michael: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's remarks. To those Conservative Members who mocked some of his points, let me say that I welcome his reasonable approach. This is the new politics: to disagree when there are things to disagree about, but to agree when we can agree. In particular, I would stress the importance of one thing that he said: it is a matter of integrity that he acknowledged the fact that there are difficult decisions for Powys Health Care trust to take in order to make the savings that will be necessary for it to deliver on its promises.

I have heard Labour party and trade union voices arguing in the same direction as the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Livsey). I look to Members of Parliament, local authorities, trade union representatives and others to help to deliver on the promises that have been made. I am convinced that, with a reasonable and co-operative approach, we can achieve an outcome that is satisfactory for everybody.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I have given some leeway to Front Benchers and to the former Health Minister in Wales, but I now appeal for shorter questions and answers, as we have other important business to cover.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I accept entirely the logic of the proposals for Swansea, which reflect the consultation that was held in the area. Is my right hon. Friend aware that the new trust will start with an enormous problem, with the overhanging shadow of the £8 million debt that Morriston will bring? If the new trust is not to start in an atmosphere of cutting and holding back on developments, we must deal with the debt. Recognising that it should not have been built up in the first place, will he consider writing it off?

Mr. Michael: There are proposals to deal with the problem to some extent. A recovery programme is being set up, and my right hon. Friend makes a reasonable point when he says that the debt should not have been built up in the first place. The reconfiguration will help the process, but I recognise that the problem to which he alludes is extremely difficult. We will be conscious of it when we consider how the new trust is to develop its work.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): There is widespread cynicism in Wales about the reconfiguration exercise. People think that it has more to do with a pre-election undertaking than with actual need and the provision of a more efficient health care system. There will be widespread dismay at the failure to take the opportunities for improvements in health care delivery in mid-Wales—especially in relation to the integration of services—that were carefully described in the consultation process.

Will the Secretary of State guarantee that the development of services and of clinical excellence that has taken place in Ceredigion, and particularly in Bronglais general hospital, will be able to continue? Does he accept that accessibility is also vital, and that the royal colleges need to—and are in fact beginning to—understand that? May I warn him that any diminution in the status of Bronglais hospital in Aberystwyth or reduction in its range of services and specialties would evoke a furious public reaction in the area, compared with which what we have witnessed in Powys would pale into insignificance?

Mr. Michael: I agree that there is widespread cynicism in Wales. That is precisely why, when I took up my post, I delayed the announcement of the reconfiguration in order to examine the proposals and ensure that I would not be announcing something that I could not put my hand on my heart and say would improve patient care. That is my objective in today's announcement. That is precisely why the announcement is about not only lines on the map, but the way in which the new arrangements will be put into practice.

I would have hoped that the way in which I made the announcement would have set some of the hon. Gentleman's doubts to rest. He asks whether I can guarantee that the development of clinical excellence in Bronglais will continue. The whole point of the way in which I referred to Bronglais and services in Ceredigion is that I recognise that there is a specific problem there. That problem would not have been helped at all by simply merging it with another set of problems at Powys Health Care trust: that would have been running away from the problem.

I fully intend to address the problem, and I will be quite happy to talk to the hon. Gentleman and to listen to any constructive suggestions about the future of the health service in his area. The reference to co-operation and partnership with other adjoining trusts is precisely about trying to find a formula that will protect the future of Bronglais.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's point about accessibility. It is not an easy situation to protect, but I am determined to do so, and I look forward to working with him, with those who work in the trusts and with other interested parties in the area. It is not my intention that there should be any diminution in the standard of care available.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there will be considerable anger in Llanelli at the decision to abolish the Llanelli Dinefwr hospital trust and that the anger will be compounded by the fact that the decision was taken by a Labour Secretary of State? Is he further aware that there will be widespread cynicism about the consultation process, because all groups in my constituency—health professionals and others—were totally opposed to the Welsh Office plans? Is he finally aware that all his fine words about not downgrading hospitals will carry little credibility because there is real concern, as a result of the decision that he has taken, that Prince Philip hospital in Llanelli will be downgraded and we will lose our medical services?

Mr. Michael: I know and understand my right hon. Friend's passion for the health services in his area. I hope that he will help to ensure that nobody pursues the approach of either cynicism or promoting the belief that there is any threat to Prince Philip hospital. I have made it clear that that is not the basis on which the reconfiguration is proceeding. I have been absolutely explicit—I hope that he will pass my words on to those of his constituents who have expressed concerns—about the requirement on the trust, the board and officials at the Welsh Office to ensure that none of the dangers that he fears will come about.

I understand the fears and cynicism that have arisen from the way in which health service decisions have been taken over the past 20 years. Many of us have had worries about our local services. The whole point of making my statement in a clear and considered way, measuring each word, is to ensure that the changes that I have to accept as necessary to concentrate on health care are implemented in such a way that high-quality care is provided, but with a proper regard for factors such as the affection of people in Llanelli for their own hospital. I hope that that offers the reassurance that my right hon. Friend seeks.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I agree with 80 per cent. of the statement, but I want to ask my right hon. Friend about the two-stage reorganisation of the trusts in Cardiff and the Vale of Glamorgan. We heard enough about two-stage reorganisation yesterday to last us a lifetime, although I understand that today's announcement does not involve any grouse moors or the resignation of any Tory Front-Bench spokesmen, however popular that might be in Wales.

How long does my right hon. Friend expect the period to be between the completion of stage one reform, with the two mergers that he has announced today, and the ultimate merger of the two newly merged trusts into one mega-trust covering the whole of Cardiff and the Vale of Glamorgan? How high will morale be among the top management, the clinicians and everybody working in the health service in the Cardiff and Vale of Glamorgan area when they work for two organisations with such a limited shelf life?

Mr. Michael: I accept that a two-stage reform is not ideal, but nothing else was on the cards from the beginning of the consultation, as my hon. Friend knows. I hope that not only will we have no grouse moors, but no grouses at the end of the process. I have made our direction clear, following much uncertainty in the health service in Cardiff and the Vale of Glamorgan. People suspected that we would have stage one and that stage two would never happen. I am determined that we shall have a short first phase, leading to the completion of the job as soon as possible. I will consult further on how quickly that can be done, so that a time scale can be produced that gives some certainty to clinicians and staff in the area.

It is only fair to point out that the complexities in the area, of which my hon. Friend is aware, include the moving of the accident and emergency unit from Cardiff Royal infirmary to the University hospital of Wales and a variety of other movements in the acute services in the area. We do not intend to dismember the Llandough hospital from community services, thus producing a mish-mash and pretending that that is a second stage towards a single trust. Instead, we will merge existing arrangements in a manageable first stage, which will quickly lead to a sensible second stage and the degree of certainty that my hon. Friend rightly suggests should be achieved.

Mr. Don Touhig (Islwyn): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement as far as Gwent is concerned, because I believe that the single trust is the proper solution. However, I know that my hon. Friends have some concerns about that and I am sure that they will express them to him. Will he confirm that his decision will provide us with an opportunity in Gwent to shift resources from bureaucracy to patient care and how does he intend to ensure that that happens?

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend is right: the purpose is to shift resources from bureaucracy into patient care by having only one level of bureaucracy and ensuring that services are available to people in appropriate and convenient locations. We wish to strengthen services in the northern half of Gwent, about which there has been some concern, and we want to ensure the safety and long-term security of Nevill Hall hospital. I am certain that the reconfiguration can achieve the improvement in patient care in Gwent for which my hon. Friend hopes.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): I thank my right hon. Friend for his statement and I agree that the best solution is to concentrate the strengths of the services into a single trust. All the alternatives would have meant that administrators would have been appointed unnecessarily, and bureaucracy would have been doubled or even trebled at the expense of patient care by doctors and nurses. Given what my right hon. Friend said about the problems in the north of the county, may I remind him that the area of Wales with the worst health record is a ward in Newport? The solution will help all parts of Gwent to save money and enjoy a stronger health service.

Mr. Michael: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those remarks. He is right to suggest that we should focus on seeking to improve health care where it is worst, including wards in his constituency and areas in north Gwent. The purpose of the reforms is to ensure that everyone, wherever they live, has access to high-quality health care from acute and community services and from the complementary services of local authorities.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): I wish to express my disappointment with the statement as it affects my constituency. The policy of forced mergers of trusts that my right hon. Friend has inherited from his predecessor and my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) is mistaken, because mergers should be voluntary. What reassurance can my right hon. Friend provide for my constituents and people in Llanelli that services will be available in both areas and will not be affected by rationalisation?

Mr. Michael: I can understand my hon. Friend's disappointment, but I am not sure about the concept of voluntary mergers because that might mean leaving the management of trusts that may have been established on an unsatisfactory basis to choose whether to merge. The overriding consideration must be the need to provide the best quality of patient care, as I know my hon. Friend agrees. I am happy to give the reassurance he seeks that the quality and choice of care in his part of the new county area will not be downgraded, and I shall remind those who will run the trusts of the need to ensure that there is no asset stripping of one hospital for another. That applies equally to both sides of the combined trust.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): While I welcome my right hon. Friend's commitment to Nevill Hall hospital, people in Blaenau Gwent will still be angry about the statement. My right hon. Friend quoted the Royal College of Surgeons, but if he had quoted the local authorities, such as Blaenau Gwent, Monmouthshire and, even, Newport he would have found opposition to a single trust for the county of Gwent. The vast majority of general practitioners in Gwent are also opposed. The community of Blaenau Gwent has some of the worst health problems in the United Kingdom, including heart and respiratory disease and cancers, and the people are terrified that they will again have an authority that will be unable to relate to and respond to their health problems.

Mr. Michael: I understand the concerns that my hon. Friend presents on behalf of his constituents. I accept that different voices have different views, but I mentioned the Royal College of Surgeons because it has argued for larger concentrations of acute services, which can cause problems for more localised services, unless they are a part of a combination. I have proceeded with the interests of his constituents and the services at Nevill Hall hospital in mind. I accept my hon. Friend's concerns for his local area, but I believe that the creation of the local health groups and a stronger voice for community health councils will be a way in which to achieve our intentions. I am happy to discuss with my hon. Friend and his colleagues the changes to community health councils, because they will be important to our scheme.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): I remind my right hon. Friend that, when the previous Government introduced the trust system, they included no consultation whatever. The Government should take some credit for having a consultation process on this occasion. My right hon. Friend will know that I campaigned with my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) for a separate trust for north Gwent and I must express the disappointment of campaigners that my right hon. Friend has decided not to implement that. Will he give us an assurance that Nevill Hall hospital will be maintained as a district general hospital, that there will be no drift of resources to south Gwent and that the Government's commitment to combat social inequalities in health will work specifically in the interests of the people of north Gwent?

Mr. Michael: I am happy to give those assurances. Nevill Hall will continue as a district general hospital. As I indicated earlier, there must not be an exercise in asset stripping. My hon. Friend is right to point out that there was no consultation when the previous group of trusts was created, but we have listened, and I would be more likely to share the concerns expressed by some of his constituents if the trusts were to be of the type set up by the previous Government. We have made it clear that the trusts must be totally different, and must involve partnership and co-operation. They must provide an integrated health service in which there is no question of hospitals or acute services winning over community services, but, instead, complementing each other. I shall be happy to work through those issues with my hon. Friend and his colleagues as time goes by.

Business of the House

5.10 pm

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): With permission, Madam Speaker, I shall make a statement on the business of the House. The business for next week is as follows:

MONDAY 7 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Water Industry Bill.

TUESDAY 8 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Road Traffic (NHS Charges) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 9 DECEMBER—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Opposition Day [1st Allotted Day].

Until about 7 o'clock there will be a debate on decommissioning and the release of prisoners, followed by a debate on tax. Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

Motion on section 155 of the Finance Act 1998.

THURSDAY 10 DECEMBER—Estimates Day [1st Allotted Day].

There will be a debate on prison sentences and alternatives to prison sentences, followed by a debate on new deal pathfinders and pathways into work for lone parents. Details will be given in the Official Report.

At 10 o'clock the House will be asked to agree the winter supplementary estimates, the votes on account and supplementary defence votes A.

FRIDAY 11 DECEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be as follows:

MONDAY 14 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Greater London Authority Bill.

TUESDAY 15 DECEMBER—Until 7 o'clock, conclusion of Second Reading of the Greater London Authority Bill,

Debate on the Common Fisheries Policy on a Government motion

Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund Bill.

WEDNESDAY 16 DECEMBER—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House, which will include the usual three-hour pre-recess debate.

Debate on the modernisation of the House of Commons.

THURSDAY 17 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Scottish Enterprise Bill.

FRIDAY 18 DECEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

Subject to the progress of business, it will be proposed that the House will rise for the Christmas recess from Thursday 17 December until Monday 11 January 1999.

[Thursday 10 December:

Estimates Day [1st Allotted Day]—Class IV, Votes 1 and 2: Home Office administration, police, probation, immigration and other services, England and Wales, and prisons, England and Wales, in so far as they relate to prison sentences and alternatives to prison sentences. Relevant reports: the Third Report from the Home Affairs Committee, Session 1997-98, on Alternatives to Prison Sentences (HC 486).

The Department for Education and Employment and Office for Standards in Education Departmental Report: The Government's Expenditure Plans 1998–99 (Cm 3910).

The Home Office Annual Report 1998 (Cm 3908).

Class 1, Votes 1 and 3: Department for Education and Employment: programmes and central services and Employment Service and Class X11: Department of Social Security, in so far as they relate to New Deal Pathfinders and Pathways into Work for Lone Parents. Relevant Reports: the Seventh Report from the Education and Employment Committee, Session 1997–98, Pathways into Work for Lone Parents (HC 646); and the Government's response thereto (HC 1122); the Eighth Report from the Education and Employment Committee, Session 1997-98, New Deal Pathfinders (HC 1059)and the Government's response thereto (HC 1123)

Sir George Young (North–West Hampshire): The House is grateful for the business and for the dates of the Christmas recess, which are a sensible response to our suggestion that there was no point in bringing the House back after a non-sitting Friday for one or two days during Christmas week when we want to be busy in our constituencies.

On the Greater London Authority Bill, I am grateful for the right hon. Lady's response to my suggestion of allowing extra time for debate. Will the House be able to sit until midnight on that day so that debate is not duly constrained? May I repeat my request for sections of the Bill to be taken on the Floor of the House as they affect the constitution?

The right hon. Lady trailed a debate on modernisation of the House, not on a Thursday, but on a Wednesday. Can she confirm that the report on how we manage Thursdays will be published in good time for that debate? Does she recognise that Members have strong and conflicting views on that matter? Can she confirm that Members will be able to vote for a range of options, including the status quo, on a free vote?

On Monday, will the Prime Minister be making a statement on the Anglo-French summit, and will he be able to explain his increasingly isolationist language on European matters? When we debate tax on Wednesday, will the Chancellor try to make good his disappointing performance on the "Today" programme on tax harmonisation? Will he be able to tell us which United Kingdom businesses are being targeted by the working group on harmful competition, which is chaired by the Financial Secretary? Will the Chancellor explain what he meant when he signed a code to tackle harmful tax competition? Will he give the same messages in the UK that he gives when he is in Europe?

Mrs. Beckett: First, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that we intend to suspend the rule and to allow debate until midnight on the first day of consideration on the Greater London Authority Bill. We hope that debate on the second day will conclude at around 7 o'clock.

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman asked whether we would take sections of that Bill on the Floor of the House. We can discuss that through the usual channels, and I understand both the concerns of the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends, and their anxiety to scrutinise the Bill thoroughly.

[Mrs. Beckett]

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether I expected the report on modernisation of the House of Commons to be published in time for the debate. I expect it to be published on Monday, leaving many days in which Members may consider it. He also asked about voting. It would be wrong of me to attempt to comment on how we might handle decisions when the report is not yet before the House. I am sure that the matter can be discussed through the usual channels, although if hon. Members wish to vote for the status quo, all that is required is that they reject any proposal for change. There will certainly be a free vote.

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister would make a statement on the summit. I expect that my right hon. Friend will do so. As we have made clear, informal councils or meetings might not be followed by a statement, but we certainly expect the Prime Minister to make a statement after the summit. With regard to the observations of the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) on the Prime Minister's stand, I feel that the right hon. Gentleman is drifting back in time. The Government are not isolationist; on the contrary, we seek, successfully, to put together alliances across the European Union, which is one reason why we—unlike the previous Government—were successful in lifting the beef ban, a lifting long promised by the Conservatives, but never delivered.

Finally, the right hon. Gentleman referred to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the finance debate. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will speak about some of the issues that the right hon. Gentleman has raised. As for the targeting of UK businesses in any proposal under discussion, the right hon. Gentleman entirely misunderstands that matter. We have had many complaints—I am sure that the previous Government had many such complaints in their day—about unfair taxes and concessions elsewhere. United Kingdom businesses have complained to us, and my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is addressing those complaints.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Have the Government given any consideration whatever to making a statement about the information that came out casually yesterday that there has been a major change in Government policy towards the second Chamber? The House has been completely bypassed. Was the matter discussed by the consultative committee on which the leader of the Liberal Democrats sits? Is Lord Cranborne now an unofficial member of that committee, as part of the patriotic alliance? Will the hereditary peers who are elected be elected by proportional representation on a closed-list system, or will they be elected in the traditional hereditary manner of first past the bedpost?

Mrs. Beckett: As my right hon. Friend will be well aware, the Leader of the Opposition chose yesterday to publicise discussions that had been undertaken. If the matter was put casually before the House, that was not the doing of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Indeed, had agreement been reached in the ordinary and customary way, it would have been properly announced to the House when we discussed the way in which the Bill on the Lords would be handled. The right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) chose instead to publicise the matter before any formal announcement had been made about the handling of that Bill. That is a matter for him, but given the way that Lords are leaping off the Tory Front Bench even as we speak, I imagine that he regrets his handling of it.

My right hon. Friend also asked me about the general issue of the second Chamber and how widely the matter was discussed. I understand that it was not widely discussed because the relevant discussions were continuing. Attempts were being made to reach agreement so that the matter could be handled by consensus and on common ground, according to how the Government had said from the outset that they wished to handle it, if and where they could. That has been the Government's position from the beginning, but it was clearly not the position at least of some parts of the Opposition, and it is still not their position.

As for whether Lord Cranborne is an unofficial member of any coalition, I am not sure where he stands at present. Should the agreement be put in place, how the hereditary peers will choose who should continue in the transitional House until all hereditary peers go—the Government have said from the outset that that is the intention at the conclusion of the legislation—is, I am happy say, for another place to decide.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I have a more serious question about the events of the past 24 hours. Does the Leader of the House acknowledge that the sensible management of the business of Parliament and, in particular, of this House, depends to a considerable degree on mutual trust and confidence across parties? Does she agree that that will be especially true not only for the business that she has announced for the next few weeks, but in the new year? Has the leadership of the Conservative party assured her that that mutual trust can be restored and that, when those who appear to be speaking on behalf of the party—appropriate spokesmen—enter into an agreement in good faith, they will stand by it? Has she received assurances to the effect that the Conservative party will now agree in good faith to the assurances that it has given?

Mrs. Beckett: I share the hon. Gentleman's view that mutual trust and confidence are important in this place and that, if assurances appear to be given but the situation then changes, it shakes that confidence. However, I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman that I have received assurances of the sort that he suggests. I do not want to rub salt into any wounds, but it seems to me that such is the confusion that exists on the Opposition Benches that no one is in a position to give an assurance.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I know that my right hon. Friend is highly efficient, so will she use the extra time that she will undoubtedly find in the legislative process, as a result of those interesting and rapidly arrived at decisions, to establish a strategic rail authority? That would not only be widely welcomed by all our constituents, but would produce positive results for all the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Beckett: As my hon. Friend will appreciate and as I said a moment ago, there is such confusion that it is a little hard to know what will happen. If, as seems possible, that agreement is adhered to, in particular in another place, we may well be able to introduce the strategic rail authority Bill, which will give not only my hon. Friend but many hon. Members considerable pleasure.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): Further to the question of my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young), can the Leader of the House tell us whether, when the Chancellor speaks to the House about taxation on Wednesday, he can explain why the Financial Secretary told European Standing Committee B that she believed that our "domestic tax system is fully consistent with the principles of the code"—[Official Report, European Standing Committee B, 26 November 1997; c. 2.] that the committee that she has been chairing is studying, when it turns out that 10 of our domestic tax measures will have to be changed?

Mrs. Beckett: I am not familiar with the issue that the hon. Gentleman raises. I know that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is seeking the best possible outcome for the United Kingdom from the discussions on the tax code. No doubt, the hon. Gentleman will raise that matter in the debate next week.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for an early statement on family leave? Is she aware that a commission reported recently to the United States Congress on family and medical leave, stating that it has a good effect on families and no significant effect on competitiveness? The Government have referred to parental leave in their programme, but unless there is some arrangement for payment that will be a hollow right for many people. Will she undertake to communicate that fact to the relevant Ministers?

Mrs. Beckett: I much respect my hon. Friend's strong feelings on that matter and take the point that a sensible balance between rights and the understanding and recognition of mutual responsibilities in the workplace facilitates competitiveness and economic success. He raised two slightly different issues. The first was family and parental leave; the Government have been discussing family leave in general rather than merely parental leave. Secondly, he mentioned a pay scheme and we are certainly some distance from that, although I understand the importance of his argument.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): Will the right hon. Lady find time for a debate on early-day motion 56?

[That this House notes that from April 1999, 300,000 non-taxpaying pensioners and 330,000 other non-taxpayers will lose an average of £75 each because of the Government's decision to abolish the dividend tax credit; further notes that 80,000 of the pensioners affected will lose over £100 per year; considers that it is unacceptable that basic rate taxpayers and higher rate taxpayers are unaffected directly by this decision which only affects non-taxpayers, half of them poor pensioners, who by definition must be poorer than taxpayers; calls on the Government to act on the promise made to the House on 30th June when the Paymaster General stated 'I am aware of the growing anxiety among poorer non-taxpayers who have been hit by the measure so I know that we need to make our position utterly clear as quickly as possible', Official Report, 30th June, column 175; calls upon the Government to now honour this pledge by announcing that non-taxpayers will be able to continue to reclaim a 10 per cent. tax credit from April 1999 in the same way as taxpayers who hold PEPs or ISAs will be able to do; and further notes that this is still a 50 per cent. cut from the current 20 per cent. dividend tax credit.]

It has been signed by Members representing all three main political parties and concerns the plight of more than 300,000 pensioners, who will lose on average £75 a year because of the Government's decision to end the repayment of dividend tax credits.

Mrs. Beckett: I am not in a position to allow an early debate on that matter, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have heard me say in the business statement that there will be a debate on tax matters. He will be able to raise it then.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will my right hon. Friend confirm if there is to be a statement or a debate on the proceedings with which we have been deluged in the past 24 hours, that is, the demise of the hereditary peers? Although I, for one, want to see the end of the House of Lords, there is a delicious irony in seeing 750 hereditary peers sign their own death warrant-to-be, like the dead parrot, defunct and caput. In those circumstances, would it not be advantageous to introduce in the time that would be made available a strategic rail authority Bill, a food standards agency Bill and one or two other measures? The net result would be a benefit to the House and to the Labour party in particular.

Mrs. Beckett: I certainly accept my hon. Friend's strictures on the general handling of the issue. It is noteworthy that a most respected former Speaker of the House and other peers on the Cross Benches have put forward a proposal that commands support in another place. As my hon. Friend observes, that would mean that the Government could achieve a clear aim, namely, the removal of the right to sit and vote in another place on the basis of heredity. Indeed, we may well succeed in that aim faster than would otherwise have been the case. If the agreement can be implemented, we may well be able to introduce not only the strategic rail authority Bill but, one hopes, legislation on the food standards agency. Since the Conservative party has made so much of that latter measure, saying how important it is, I am sure that that would please Conservatives, too.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): Will the right hon. Lady find Government time for a debate on early-day motion 69?

[That this House believes that the statement of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 9th November, Official Report, column 14, that he has never been, and does not intend to be, involved in procuring or negotiating sponsorship deals for the New Millennium Experience Company is totally inconsistent with newspaper reports that he entered into discussions with S. P. and G. P. Hinduja in January with a view to persuading them to abandon support for a millennium project in the Midlands in favour of the dome at

[Mr. Christopher Chope]

Greenwich and met the Hinduja brothers on 6th October at the Department of Trade and Industry to discuss the dome and other trade and industry matters; and is of the opinion that the Secretary of State should now apologise for having misled the House and should give up his position with the NMEC immediately.]

It draws attention to the fact that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry misled the House when he said on 9 November that he had never been and never would be involved in securing sponsorship for the New Millennium Experience Company. This afternoon, the right hon. Gentleman had the opportunity to explain and apologise for his actions on that day. In an answer to a very reasonable question from my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), he did not deny the facts or that he had misled the House. He sought, however, not to apologise, but to ridicule my hon. Friend and, in so doing, he made a fresh and totally false allegation against Mr. Hinduja.

Madam Speaker: Order. It is perfectly in order for the hon. Gentleman to call the House's attention to early-day motion 69, but he should not use the colourful language that he is using, or introduce new charges. He has done perfectly well in putting down that early-day motion, but he should stick closely to its wording, of which I am well aware.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful for your guidance, Madam Speaker. You were here this afternoon when the issue was put to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and you heard his response. Will the Leader of the House demand that he comes to the House to explain his conduct? At the moment, he appears to be above the law.

Mrs. Beckett: I certainly cannot undertake to give the hon. Gentleman or his hon. Friends an opportunity to raise afresh a matter that has clearly been raised once already today. From the hon. Gentleman's remarks, it seems to me not that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State did not deal with the matters raised, but that the hon. Gentleman does not like the answer that my right hon. Friend gave. I fear that that is not unknown in this place. It remains the position that my right hon. Friend does not procure or negotiate sponsorship deals. I understand that, in early October, he had a meeting with the Hinduja brothers to discuss several issues relating to the Department of Trade and Industry, but there is no record of any discussion of the millennium experience at that meeting.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, if there was a statement on the hereditary peers next week, it would provide the Government with an opportunity to respond fully to the quite extraordinary—there is no other way to describe them—antics of the Leader of the Opposition? One would like to see the right hon. Gentleman respond accordingly. Is my right hon. Friend aware that, as far as one can ascertain, there is widespread Labour support for any compromise and practical solution that would deal with most of the hereditary peers? I welcome what appears to be an arrangement that would help the Government and provide an excellent opportunity for both Houses of Parliament to move forward. It will certainly be appreciated in the country.

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and to all my hon. Friends who share the view that he expresses. I fear that I cannot undertake to find time in the near future to debate the developments of the past few days, although I agree that that might be an entertaining debate. Unfortunately, we are not here to enjoy ourselves, but to get on with legislative work.

One most noteworthy aspect of the events of the past few days is that the hypocrisy of the Conservative party has been completely exposed. Conservative Members have repeatedly claimed that the measure on Lords reform should not even be in the Gracious Speech, because it would take time from matters that are of far greater concern to the British people. On the other hand, we have made it quite plain that our chief interests in the Queen's Speech were indeed those other issues, such as health care, which are of far greater importance, but that we felt that Lords reform was a matter that had to be dealt with in its proper place. It is we who have been trying to find a way of not taking up excessive time to discuss the matter, although the proper time will, of course, be made available. Therefore, it is now crystal clear that it is Conservative Members who want to spend all their time discussing a matter which they say should not be a high priority.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): May I join my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) in calling for a debate in Government time on funding for the millennium dome? I ask that not least because it struck me that the original answer at Question Time was that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry had not sought extra funding for the millennium dome from other sources. I would have asked the right hon. Gentleman directly whether the matter had been put to the Hinduja brothers at their last meeting, but I failed to catch your eye, Madam Speaker. The Secretary of State is a fairly slippery customer, and 10 minutes is a short time—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman will withdraw that remark.

Mr. Blunt: I am sorry, Madam Speaker. I withdraw that remark. The right hon. Gentleman is capable of evading a point for 10 minutes of questions in the House, and he has shown his ability to do so. However, a full debate on the dome would not only allow that question to be properly addressed. but would enable us to ask the right hon. Gentleman to explain the extraordinary claim he made this afternoon, that the millennium dome would somehow create £1 billion-worth of economic growth for the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman has raised the same issue as his hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and he will get the same answer. All I can add is that, as Conservative Members have of late spent so much time arguing that the House should devote itself to high-priority issues, the notion that we should spend a day debating the Conservatives' ridiculous accusations about my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is quite ludicrous.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): May we have a debate on the banking industry, especially the role played by Lombard banking and National Westminster bank in inducing customers to invest in The Tanning Shop franchisee business, when the bank knew, because that business was one of its major customers, that it was collapsing? If it is possible to have that debate, will my right hon. Friend ask Ministers at the DTI to ask inspectors to interview Mr. Peter Stern, who is the NatWest franchise manager? He knows the whole truth and he should tell the whole truth, so that the bank learns the whole truth. It is his failure to tell the bank the whole truth that is costing franchisees all over the country millions of pounds.

Mrs. Beckett: I am sorry to hear of the concerns that my hon. Friend has raised and of the losses he has identified as being made. I understand that DTI officials are looking at those issues and that the matter may have been referred to the banking ombudsman. I believe that my hon. Friend may have secured a meeting with the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells). He is the relevant DTI Minister and I know that he will share my hon. Friend's concern and be anxious to ensure that anything that can be resolved is resolved. However, I fear that I cannot promise my hon. Friend that I shall be able to arrange a debate in the House on the matter in the near future.

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): In the light of the right hon. Lady's remarks about faith and confidence in the House and given the comments that have been made today about the business yesterday, does she think it appropriate for an urgent debate to take place in which this House can discuss and debate the conduct of the Prime Minister? In the Queen's Speech debate, the right hon. Gentleman led the House to believe that he was keen to scrap hereditary peers at an early stage and made it a point of principle; yet, at the same time, through his offices and others in his party, he was making secret deals and negotiating how many hereditary peers could, through a Dutch auction, be retained in order to expedite the Government's business.

Mrs. Beckett: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has been paying attention to what has been going on. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made it plain that it is a point of principle in the Labour party that an hereditary position should not be a qualification for sitting and voting in the other place and that we want to see that change at an early stage. It is clear that part of the purpose behind the discussions that have been held is indeed to make sure that that eventuality does occur earlier than might otherwise have been the case—in fact, I am beginning to wonder whether that is the Conservatives' real objection.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Has my right hon. Friend had a moment to glance at the amazing, bewildering, breathtaking, fascinating and mind-boggling second report of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs on "The Operation of Multi-Layer Democracy"? Not since Rip van Winkle, or at least since St. Paul was struck on the road to Damascus, has there been anything quite like it. Has she read paragraph 32, which states:

"Two aspects of the way in which the constitutional reform is being implemented give us particular cause for concern. One is the belated addressing of the English dimension."?

Well, better late than never, but where on earth have our colleagues been all this time? Is it not about time that the House of Commons addressed itself seriously to what is actually happening to the constitution of this country and in Scotland?

Mrs. Beckett: I must confess that I have not committed to memory every word of the report to which my hon. Friend refers. I have a further confession to make: the connection he makes with Rip van Winkle escapes me for the moment, although I am sure that if I think about it afterwards, I shall realise what it is—I shall work on that. I can say only that I know and understand my hon. Friend's strong views about devolution, which he has held for many years. However, regardless of the evidence given to the Select Committee, the remarks made or opinions quoted, I understand that the report welcomes the Government's proposals overall.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): I am sure that the right hon. Lady is aware that I asked her predecessor many times whether we could have a debate on the inordinate amount of time that Ministers take to reply to letters from Members of Parliament. She will probably also know that I put a series of questions to Ministers asking how long they took to reply to such letters. My questions were referred to a report that was published just before the summer recess. However, the report told us what had happened in 1997, not 1998—which is not satisfactory.

I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to a letter that I received from the Department of Social Security in response to a question about why pensioners in my constituency had been told that they would receive a guaranteed minimum income of £75 a week. After three and a half months, the reply eventually came that there is no guaranteed minimum income of £75 a week because people must have less than £3,000 in savings in order to qualify. Why must we wait three and a half months to discover that our constituents have been misled in that way?

Mrs. Beckett: I do not intend to sound as though I am treating the hon. Gentleman's concerns about answers to letters trivially. That is an important matter, and I know that all my colleagues do their utmost to answer correspondence as speedily as possible. However, as to the specific issue to which he referred, I take it that he was asking a rhetorical question as I am quite sure that the hon. Gentleman is much too intelligent not to have known the answer before he wrote the letter.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): Has my right hon. Friend noticed the rather strident language that has been used today? Lord Pilkington described Lord Cranborne's deal as his "crowning glory", while the Daily Mail described the actions of the Leader of the Opposition as "treason". In light of those comments, will my right hon. Friend provide time for a debate about constitutional reform? Finally, in light of Baroness Strange's departure to the Cross Benches and the changing balance of power in the other place, can my right hon. Friend give an assurance that the Government will not lose their resolve to reform the hereditary peerage system?

Mrs. Beckett: I am aware of the remarks to which my hon. Friend referred. Every time one turns on the television one learns that a fresh member of the Conservative Front Bench in the House of Lords has departed—no doubt as a vote of confidence in the party's overall leadership. Although I sympathise with my hon. Friend's request to have an enjoyable and amusing debate in what is normally a festive season, I fear that I cannot undertake to find time for it.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I thank the Leader of the House for her courtesy in responding to questions put to her by the Northern Ireland Select Committee about the powers of Select Committees in the devolved territories and remind her that we corresponded about that issue in July and November. Is the Leader of the House aware that the deadline for settling those matters is 1 February? Although we are making progress, I hope that that deadline is firmly in the Government's mind.

Mrs. Beckett: I am extremely grateful to the right hon. Gentleman both for his kind remarks and for the manner in which he has raised the issue. If by any chance the matter was not strongly in people's minds, I assure him that it will be from now on.

Mr. John Cryer (Hornchurch): The Leader of the House will be aware that the chief fire officer for London proposes to cut five fire pumps across Greater London. That proposal comes on top of the removal of 14 fire pumps in the three years since the docklands bombing. It is also proposed to cut one of two pumps in my constituency—a move that will be resisted every inch of the way. The legislation governing the fire service, the Fire Services Act 1947, is woefully out of date and in need of review. Could we have a debate or at least a statement about that matter?

Mrs. Beckett: As my hon. Friend has correctly identified, that legislation has been on the statute book for some time. Responsibility for provision of the fire service rests locally with the fire authority, but my hon. Friend will be aware that the approval of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is required if such an authority wishes to reduce the number of stations, appliances or fire-fighting posts. I understand that no application has been received to date from the London fire and civil defence authority in respect of Hornchurch fire station.

As a result of the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister yesterday, the fire service standard spending assessment for London should increase by almost £10 million—or 3.8 per cent. That may assist to some degree with the difficulties identified by my hon. Friend. I take his point about the concern regarding those issues, but I fear that I cannot offer to provide a debate or a statement before Christmas.

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas (Harrow, West): Bearing in mind the current confusion in the ranks of the Conservative party to which my right hon. Friend correctly referred, can she confirm whether the progress of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill—which was supported by a majority of hon. Members many times last night—will continue to be impeded by hereditary peers in the other place?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend asks a very interesting and pertinent question. I am grateful for the opportunity to put on record Labour Front Benchers' appreciation of the devotion to duty shown by many of our hon. Friends on the Back Benches who toiled through the Division Lobby on many occasions last night. I share my hon. Friend's hope that we are well on the way to disposing of the Bill. It is not yet entirely clear what attitude will be adopted in another place—whether as a consequence of the potential agreement or otherwise—but it is not impossible that we may finally be able to dispose of the matter in a manner that allows the efficient conduct of elections. That seems to me to be common sense.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): The right hon. Lady's answer to the question from the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) was no less extraordinary for the fact that I drew her attention to the report at business questions last week. On that occasion, she replied that she did not read The Herald of Glasgow. So that we may be ready for next week's business—particularly Wednesday's business—will the Leader of the House ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be prepared to explain why he is now so ready to use the veto on tax harmonisation measures when he signed up to that agenda by acquiescing in "The European Way"?

Mrs. Beckett: I remind the hon. Gentleman that last week he asked me to comment on a leak reported in The Herald, not a Select Committee report that was published only today. I am sure that he has been in the House long enough to know that it would have been wrong for me to pre-empt the publication of a Select Committee report.

As for his remarks on tax harmonisation and the views of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is a constant source of astonishment to me that Opposition Members forget that the only taxation powers given up were those surrendered by the Conservative Government under the Maastricht treaty and on other occasions. For example, we could not reduce value added tax on fuel any further than 5 per cent. because of an agreement made by the Conservatives in government. Opposition Members also complain frequently about the use of the qualified majority vote. I remind the hon. Gentleman that no Labour Government ever gave up the veto: that was the Conservatives' doing.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State for Defence to make a statement about the Gulf war veterans who claim that they may have been affected by depleted uranium while on active service in the Gulf? Will she draw the Secretary of State's attention to the particular importance of that matter, bearing in mind that Ministry of Defence police have raided the homes of some veterans in the past 24 hours, apparently in an attempt to recover evidence and stop that claim proceeding?

Mrs. Beckett: I am not familiar with the hon. Gentleman's allegations, but I have no doubt that they will be drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. I am aware that there has long been discussion about the difficult issue of illnesses suffered by many Gulf war veterans. The Minister of Transport, my right hon. Friend for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid), devoted much time and sympathetic attention to the matter in his previous post as Minister for the Armed Forces. I am not familiar with the immediate issues raised by the hon. Gentleman, but I shall draw his concerns to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): First, may I thank my right hon. Friend for announcing the dates of the Second Reading of the Greater London Authority Bill, and welcome the publication of the Bill today? Will she resist as far as is practicable any scrutiny of the Bill on the Floor of the House, rather than Upstairs? It needs detailed scrutiny, which is far better done elsewhere.

Secondly, will my right hon. Friend resist the fatuous trivialisation of the issue dealt with at Prime Minister's questions yesterday in terms of patriotic alliances? Will she be assured that, whether it takes one year or two years, as long as the end result is that we get rid of all hereditary peers, this party, which has waited 90 years to do it, will wait a little longer?

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The clear wish of the Government, and of the people who elected us, is to make a long, long-awaited reform in another place. Anything that brings that about will be welcome. If it brings it about more quickly, all the better.

I hear what my hon. Friend says about the Greater London Authority Bill. We will consider the issues with care. I can assure him that the Government will discuss through the usual channels the best way of handling the Bill, because we all want it to be properly scrutinised. We shall attempt to get agreement about how that can best be done, in whatever way those discussions take place.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): When can we debate early-day motion 1?

[That this House enthusiastically supports the Government's proposal for a £75 guaranteed minimum income for pensioners; notes that about a million pensioners entitled to income support do not receive it; and urges that the guaranteed minimum should be implemented for all by raising the basic pension to £75 per week in 1999 without a means test.]

The amendment to it reads:

[Line 3, leave out from 'it' to end and add 'congratulates the Government for honouring its commitment to uprate the state pension at least in line with prices; applauds the extra help given to all pensioners through the new winter fuel payments, reductions in VAT on fuel and the restoration of free eye tests; believes that the Government is right to give the highest priority to the poorest pensioners; further congratulates the Government on establishing pilot projects to encourage pensioners to claim those benefits to which they are entitled; and looks forward to the extension of this initiative, in partnership with local authorities and voluntary organisations, to the rest of the country.']

It supports enthusiastically the many beneficial measures introduced by the Government to improve the income of pensioners, but also sadly notes that, according to recent answers by the Government, up to 1 million pensioners will not receive the guaranteed minimum income of £75, principally because they regard claiming income support as claiming a handout?

Many of those pensioners have worked their entire lives without claiming any handouts or any welfare whatever, and they rightly say that if the level of the basic pension had been increased since 1980 according to the level of inflation, as the contributions that they made over 50 years increased by the level of inflation, the basic pension would now be not £66 a week, but £90 a week. Is it not right that we should say to those pensioners that they have earned the £75 on their basic pension? Would not that be the most dignified and best-value way of giving it to them?

Mrs. Beckett: I know of the huge amount of work on social security issues that my hon. Friend has done over the years, and of the great concern that he has shown. I can assure him that the Government whole-heartedly share his wish that the poorest pensioners, who in many cases are the poorest because during their working lives their earnings or their pension arrangements were such that they could not save, should receive a guaranteed minimum income.

I entirely share my hon. Friend's view—I think that I am right in my interpretation of his final remarks—that it is hugely important to encourage such pensioners to claim their entitlement and not to feel that they are discouraged from doing so. If, however, my hon. Friend was suggesting that massive increases should be made across the board to the basic pension, I understand and sympathise with the good will that lies behind that suggestion, but it is a much more difficult matter to give substantial increases on the basic pension, including to people who have—as so many now have, as a result of the scheme introduced by the last Labour Government—substantial second pensions.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am sure that the Leader of the House would not want to mislead the House, even inadvertently. I thought I heard her say, in answer to a question, that the Labour Government had not conceded the veto in any areas. She should, of course, be aware that the treaty of Amsterdam, which was taken through the House and signed by her Government, conceded qualified majority voting in no less than 14 areas. I am sure that she will want to put the record straight.

Mrs. Beckett: With your permission, Madam Speaker, I shall reply to that point of order.

I certainly did not intend any misinterpretation to be put on my words. The point that I was making, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman is well aware, was that it was a Conservative Government who breached the important principle of whether or not everyone should enjoy a veto. Now that the issue of qualified majority voting is in place, thanks to the actions of the Conservative party, of course there are occasions when it seems sensible, in the national interest, that it should be used. It remains my view that it is quite accurate to say that no Labour Government gave up the veto: it was the Conservative Government who gave up the veto, and it is about time the Conservative party stopped making such a fuss and trying to pretend that we are culpable.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Betts.]

5.55 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): This debate gives the House its traditional opportunity to debate the issues under discussion at the forthcoming European Council in Vienna. It may be of assistance to the House if I outline what those topics will be. Such is the commitment of the hon. Members who have stayed till this hour that I am anxious to be of as much assistance to them as I can.

On the first morning the Council will approve the employment guidelines for 1999 and discuss how Europe can pursue policies to boost jobs and tackle unemployment. In the afternoon, we will examine progress on the Agenda 2000 dossier, reform of the common agricultural policy, modernisation of the structural funds, and the maintenance of budget discipline.

There will also be discussion on the debate on the future of Europe that was launched during the British presidency. This discussion will examine how we can ensure that decisions within the European Union are taken as close as possible to the peoples of the European Union in line with the principle of subsidiarity.

In the evening, there will be a discussion on enlargement, which will focus on a review of the Commission's report on the preparations by each of the dozen candidate countries.

Chancellor Klima of Austria, who will chair the European Council, visited London last week when he outlined that agenda. At his press conference after his meeting with the Prime Minister, Chancellor Klima said, in answer to a question:

"We will talk maybe only one minute about tax co-ordination."

Ever since he said that—or for the past two weeks—public debate about Europe in this country has been about little else but taxation. Today therefore provides the House of Commons with an excellent opportunity to demonstrate leadership of that public debate by exploding the myths and mischief that have been peddled as facts for a fortnight.

Ghost stories about bogy men can be very entertaining for children, but the electorate are entitled to be treated as adults when we debate our relations with our closest neighbours and our most important trading partners.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) rose—

Mr. Cook: I see a bogy man.

Mr. Cash: The Foreign Secretary said that decisions, especially with regard to matters such as taxation, should be dealt with on the principle of subsidiarity, and decisions made as near to the people as possible. The Government continually say that there is no constitutional bar to economic and monetary union. Will the right hon. Gentleman explain how they can make such an assertion, given that taxation clearly lies at the heart of economic and monetary union? When all the statements made by Oskar Lafontaine and others indicate that that is on their minds, why do the Government deny that taxation is on the agenda?

Mr. Cook: Of course, fiscal policy—the degree of the Government deficit—is highly relevant to monetary union. It was the hon. Gentleman's Government who agreed at Maastricht to tight targets on fiscal policy. We see no reason why those commitments on fiscal policy, given by hon. Members on the hon. Gentleman's Front Bench, necessarily require any country in Europe to have the same rate of taxation as any other country in Europe.

The best way of helping the hon. Gentleman and others to overcome fears of bogy men is to remember that we are not alone. Not just Britain but many other member states will oppose the harmonisation of tax rates. Yesterday the Italian Finance Minister told the Financial Times that harmonisation of corporation tax would be "untimely, questionable and above all hardly feasible" and that it

"would be wrong in any event."

Yesterday the Prime Minister of Spain spoke out against what he called the "dumbing down" of tax harmonisation, and opposed a single rate of direct tax because "it would be a recipe for inefficiency".

There is no majority for the harmonisation of tax rates in Europe, never mind the unanimity that would be required for action. Nor will the need for unanimity change. That would require all members of the European Union to agree on a change to qualified majority voting on tax, and most member states will not agree.

As so much has been made of this debate over the past week, let us look at the record on tax harmonisation in Europe. The greatest harmonisation of tax rates adopted by the European Union was under the previous Conservative Government—the harmonisation of value added tax agreed by the then Conservative Chancellor Lord Lamont. It provided that, throughout the European Union, there would need to be a minimum standard rate of 15 per cent.

If the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) intends to attack tax harmonisation as wrong in principle, perhaps he would be good enough to share with the House what objections he raised in the Cabinet of which he was a member when it agreed to harmonise rates of VAT. There has been no change, and no proposals for change, in the harmonisation of VAT, since the election. Indeed, the only substantial change in VAT since the election is that the Government have cut the VAT on domestic gas and electricity bills which the last Government introduced. Those powers to vary the rates will of course continue. Only those who are out of touch with the EU would think otherwise.

So much for the past; as for the present, let me set out the Government's position. Britain will vigorously support the interests of British trade and investment throughout the single market by constructive engagement. There cannot be a Member of the House who has not been lobbied by an industry in his or her constituency about unfair tax loopholes, state aids or special tax privileges in a country with which that industry is in competition. Many of those tax breaks are now under review in a working group chaired by a British Treasury Minister. That is a good example of British leadership where we believe European co-operation on tax would benefit British industry and jobs.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way on the point about British leadership in that particular field. I refer to British leadership in another field, which he did not mention when he referred to the agenda for the Vienna Heads of Government meeting—the common foreign and security policy.

Continental Europe is alight with views about what the Government and my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence mean in respect of a new EU defence policy. I quote my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence:

"We are not talking about a standing European army. We are not talking about removing defence from the control of national governments. And we must not do anything that would undermine NATO, which will remain the cornerstone of European defence and security".

I know what we are not talking about. Perhaps—not at this moment but at some point in his speech—my right hon. Friend will tell the House and continental Europe what we are talking about.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Before the Foreign Secretary responds, may I say to hon. Members that we have had two very wordy interventions? The custom is that interventions should be brief, rather than mini-speeches.

Mr. Cook: I am glad that I have given my hon. Friend the opportunity to make his point, although I am not sure that it naturally arose from the passage on which I was addressing the House. He asked what we are exploring with our French partners, and with other partners throughout the EU. We are exploring how we can make decisions within the common foreign and security policy more effective and more rapid, and how we can ensure that there is a better transmission between the security policy decided by the Foreign Ministers of the EU and the defence policy that we implement through the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

We have been clear about the fact that we do not see that as in any way weakening NATO. On the contrary, we would hope that the initiative that we are taking on European security would strengthen the effectiveness of security policy in the EU and the European identity within NATO.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman again, but I should remind him that he should have been addressing the Chair, just as much as his hon. Friend.

Mr. Cook: I am justly rebuked, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and shall make a point of addressing the Chair. If you would allow me to return to the trend of my observations—

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) rose—

Mr. Cook: The hon. Gentleman will no doubt have an opportunity to intervene later.

I was outlining the fact that we would vigorously support the interests of British trade and investment, wherever they were served by co-operation on tax. Where there is that British interest, we will support it. Successive British Governments have tried to get a level playing field on excise duties so that British spirits have fairer competition in their export markets. I pay tribute to the previous Government, for once. They also pressed for more harmonisation of export duties, and they were right to do so.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way on the issue of harmonisation. Hans Tietmeyer has said:

"A European currency will lead to member nations transferring their sovereignty over financial and wages policy as well as in monetary affairs. It is an illusion to think that states can hold onto their autonomy over taxation policies."

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree or disagree?

Mr. Cook: I have already made it perfectly clear that I do not accept that becoming a member of the single currency—if that were something that Britain were eventually to become—would logically involve a transfer of decision making on taxes, still less on wages policy. There would need to be harmonisation of fiscal policy and budget deficit, but that would not require us to have common tax rates. It has not required common tax rates throughout the United States, which also operates within a single currency.

Not only Britain, but many other member states, still insist that direct taxation is a matter for the nation state. There is neither any proposal, nor any prospect of a proposal, for harmonisation of income tax in the EU. Neither Britain nor many other member states believe that there is any case for a European rate of corporation tax. Even the President of the Commission, which alone can initiate any proposal, has said that

"income tax, corporation tax, social security . . . are sovereign, national matters and will remain so."

We need to have a debate about tax and Europe that treats British voters as adults. Where there are limited proposals for co-ordination on tax rules which are of benefit to Britain, we should support them. Where there are proposals that would damage Britain, we will oppose them, but for the rest of my lifetime, and that of the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe—whoever manages to outlive the other—the member states of the EU will continue to have tax systems which remain distinctive, even sometimes eccentric.

Germany has a special tax on coffee. I cannot see the French, with their famous affection for coffee, swallowing that one. France has a special 30 per cent. tax allowance for journalists. I do not imagine that other countries will want to copy it, but it could be the one measure which, at a stroke, could convert the British press to enthusiastic support for tax harmonisation.

Mr. Letwin: In the light of his remarks about treating the British public as adults, will the Foreign Secretary explain why the Financial Secretary to the Treasury did not treat the members of European Standing Committee B as adults when she told us:

"We believe that our own domestic tax system is fully consistent with the principles of the code."—[Official Report, European Standing Committee B, 26 November 1997; c. 2.]

[Mr. Letwin]

The right hon. Gentleman rightly told us that the Financial Secretary chairs the group that is working on it, but 10 of the measures will involve changing our tax system.

Mr. Cook: If I may correct the hon. Gentleman, the 85 measures at the back of the report that went to the Economic and Finance Council this week are being examined by the working group. That does not imply that the working group has taken a view on any of those 85—far less on the 10 that affect Britain, and even less on the five within that 10 that concern United Kingdom, as distinct from Gibraltar, issues. We shall look carefully at those issues as the working group continues its task.

If we are serious about tackling unfair tax loopholes and tax breaks in other countries that distort the market and are to the disadvantage of our industry, we should be prepared—openly and robustly—to look at those areas where other countries may have criticisms of us and where we are confident that we can rebut those criticisms.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will my right hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mr. Cook: I will give way, then I must move on.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does not that mean that we may not always be able to maintain some rates of taxation that are radically different from those of other nations? We must occasionally assume that, as part of the negotiations, we will be required to abandon British taxation.

Mr. Cook: Perhaps I may correct my hon. Friend. The working group is not examining tax systems, tax rates or tax rules. Under examination are the special, privileged tax breaks that some countries have used unfairly to attract investment, which does not reflect the competitiveness of the general economy. We are confident that we can assert that we will not have such tax breaks in Britain.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cook: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I must make progress with my speech. I am sure that he will catch my eye later.

The real agenda for Vienna shows Britain's success in influencing European priorities. Last December at Luxembourg we secured employment guidelines that reflect Britain's strategy of getting people back into work by increasing their skills. We have successfully retained the broad thrust of that strategy in the new guidelines for 1999. We have also secured some improvements. In particular, we have secured a new stress on gender equality, which reflects our commitment to ensuring that opportunities for work are open to both men and women.

We shall continue to make progress on our objective of ensuring that the principle of subsidiarity is put into effect across all decisions of the European Union. We hope to reach agreement in Vienna that the protocol on subsidiarity of the Amsterdam treaty will be brought into effect early, even though the treaty as a whole has not yet been ratified by all member states. We shall receive at Vienna the first annual report on the implementation of subsidiarity. Both those steps take us further towards our goal of a Europe in which decisions are taken closer to the people.

Britain's objective in the discussion on Agenda 2000 will be to keep on track for its conclusion at a special European Council next March under the German presidency. We welcome the commitment that has been given by the new German Government to keep to that timetable. On Sunday, I shall join Foreign Ministers to discuss Agenda 2000 in advance of the Vienna Council. Progress so far on the three main elements of Agenda 2000 is in line with British interests.

On the common agricultural policy, we welcome the Commission's proposal for a cut of 30 per cent. in beef intervention prices; a cut of 20 per cent. in cereal prices; and a cut of 15 per cent. in milk prices. Collectively, the price cuts add up to a saving for the British consumer of £1 billion a year, which is a saving of £84 for the average household budget.

On structural funds, we support efforts to streamline the present seven objectives into three. Two thirds of all structural fund spending will remain concentrated under objective 1, and our success in securing new agreed regional boundaries should ensure that Britain continues to get good support from objective 1, with three new areas qualifying: South Yorkshire, Cornwall and west Wales.

On budget discipline, we welcome the broad consensus that there should be no increase in the ceiling of the European budget. We shall continue to impress on the Commission and the Council that the budget ceiling should remain a ceiling and should not become a target.

Mr. Nicholls: Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that one of the unfair tax breaks that attracts investment into this country is the comparatively low rate of corporation tax? In the light of what he said, how does he propose to resist moves from other countries that want our corporation tax to be at the same rate as the equivalent tax in their countries, so that the so-called unfair tax competition is eliminated?

Mr. Cook: I was unwise to give way to the hon. Gentleman, who plainly does not understand what is under review by the working group on the code of conduct. The rate of corporation tax has nothing whatever to do with that working group.

Mr. Nicholls: Yes, it does.

Mr. Cook: The code of conduct has nothing to do with the overall rate. It deals with those countries that provide specific, targeted exemptions to attract privileged industries to their country in unfair competition with other countries. For that reason, this country has nothing to fear from a rigorous examination of the problem. If Conservative Members were to acquaint themselves with the truth of what is actually under discussion in the European Union, they might not feel so threatened.

Before the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) intervened, I was referring to budget discipline. I assure the House that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and I have made it plain at successive Council meetings that there can be no question of reopening negotiations on the British rebate. In its recent financial perspective, the Commission admitted that, even after the rebate, Britain continues to make a higher net contribution per head than other member states that are in a better position to pay. In those circumstances, we see no case for reopening negotiations on the British rebate.

It will, of course, not be possible to fund the enlargement of the European Union within a fixed budget unless we can reduce spending within the existing member states. It is vital that the European Union maintains its momentum on the reforms in Agenda 2000 to match the preparations that the candidate countries are making for membership.

The Vienna Council will review the Commission's report on the preparations in each of the dozen candidate countries. The Commission identifies two or three candidates whose progress on preparation has been disappointing, but the overall picture is positive. For the first candidate countries, screening has now been completed in 17 chapters of European law, and substantive negotiations have been opened in seven. If we can maintain that momentum, by the end of the German presidency we shall have commenced negotiations in half the chapters of European law. That would be good progress, and would demonstrate the strength of the arrangements for enlargement that Britain established during our presidency.

Britain continues to be the firmest ally of the candidate countries in the debates on enlargement. I was the only Foreign Minister of any of the major member states to attend last month's accession process with the candidate countries. That strong support is warmly acknowledged whenever I visit any of the candidate countries. Their good will for Britain is in our national interest, because they will soon be full voting members of the European Union.

I do not underestimate the real difficulties in securing the biggest ever enlargement of the European Union. Nevertheless, I firmly believe that the problems of enlargement are much less important than the benefits. There could be no more valuable prize than a united, stable, democratic and prosperous Europe.

Britain has left its mark on the major issues that will be on the agenda at Vienna.

Mr. Roger Casale (Wimbledon): My right hon. Friend rightly says that we should not lose sight of the fact that the enlargement of the European Union is an historic opportunity for Europe. Does he accept that it is also an historic opportunity for Britain to show clear leadership in Europe by ensuring that countries that want to accede to the EU are ready to join, and that the EU is itself ready for accession to take place? This is the moment for British leadership to come strongly to the fore.

Mr. Cook: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I believe that Britain has shown that leadership in the past 18 months. We have pressed for the successful launch of the accession process, and at all the Council meetings we have constantly spoken in support of enlargement. We are keen to ensure that the Agenda 2000 dossier is completed by next spring, so that we can match the real efforts that are being made by many of the candidate countries. All around central and eastern Europe, there are improvements in good governance, changes to the market economy and improvements on trade. That is a direct reflection of the commitment of those countries to achieving membership of the European Union. We should respond to that action within Europe.

Britain is, of course, demonstrating leadership. Our leadership is shown in the step-change that the Government have made in our relations with our European partners. A key part of that step-change is a much greater partnership between Ministers and their opposite numbers throughout the European Union. It is now routine in European business for Britain to take the initiative along with one or more of our partners.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has just made a declaration on employment jointly with Prime Minister Aznar of Spain, and early next year we will hold the first of our new regular summits with Spain. My noble Friend Lord Simon has launched an initiative on boosting enterprise with his French opposite number. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is engaged with the Minister for the Chancellery in Gerhard Schröder's office to promote a common approach to a broad range of policy issues.

I have agreed with Joschke Fischer on a structure of regular meetings between ourselves, and between our European Ministers. We are nearing completion on a British-German initiative on human rights. Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and I travelled to Paris to meet our counterparts jointly, to explore how we can work together more closely on our ideas for the security of Europe.

In parallel with that increased partnership with Ministers in European countries, we are demonstrating the step-change in our relations with Europe by strengthening our diplomatic team throughout Europe. Last week, I announced that there would be 33 more staff at our embassies in the European Union. That will mean more commercial attachés to promote British trade, more labour attachés to promote our dialogue with social partners throughout Europe, and more desk officers to support them in the European command in the Foreign Office. That constitutes a new investment in our relations in Europe—a good investment, because this Government are determined to make those relations work.

In the past week, we have seen an example of our success in making those relations work for Britain: both the Agriculture Council and the European Commission voted to lift the ban on the export of British beef. We were, of course, able to achieve that result only because of the majority voting that the Conservative party insists on regarding as merely a threat to Britain. Nothing illustrates more effectively than that success the contrast between the present Government and their predecessor. The last Conservative Government launched a war on Europe over the beef ban; they lost that war. They surrendered without securing the sale of a single sausage.

The consequences of that war, however, were worse than mere failure. It provoked the maximum resentment of Britain, and produced the minimum respect for it. Britain is now respected as a leading partner in Europe. Even before we go to Vienna, the agenda for that summit demonstrates Britain's influence. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I will travel to Vienna confident that we shall be able to secure conclusions that are in Britain's interests.

[Mr. Cook]

In any other European country, the strength of that country's government in Europe would be a matter of national pride. An eve-of-summit debate in any other European country's Parliament would express unity in support of the nation's interest in a successful summit.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): Paradise!

Mr. Cook: The right hon. and learned Gentleman may say "Paradise", but I do not expect what I have described to happen tonight. I fear that, if this debate runs true to form, we are doomed to a succession of speeches demonstrating the maximum division over our European policy from Opposition Members who, I suspect, would secretly prefer seeing the European summit to end in disarray that was bad for Europe to seeing an agreement that was good for Britain.

I do not really expect the Government to secure agreement from the Opposition on our European policy tonight. That would be too much to hope, given that the last Conservative Government could not secure agreement either. But, as long as the Conservative party insists on regarding Europe only as a threat, it will be unable to offer Britain a Government who can seize the opportunities of membership of the European Union.

Europe is our largest market, and buys half our exports. Europe's strength means that we have more clout in trade talks than Britain could ever have on its own—and the more we are seen to have influence in the capitals of Europe, the more respect Britain has in capitals throughout the world.

This Government recognise the tremendous opportunity that Europe represents for Britain, and in Vienna we will again demonstrate that we are a Government who can take full advantage of that opportunity.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): This is a significant debate, and the Vienna summit will be a particularly significant summit.

It has become crystal clear in recent days, even to the most blinkered observer, that the European Union is at a crossroads. We now face pressure on all fronts to move towards the goal that the German Foreign Minister has declared to be his objective: a single European state. One currency, one tax policy, one employment policy, one defence policy, one legal area, one state.

There is a great march towards a single European state, and the British Government will have to respond to it. It is not something that the Government can fudge. This is the moment when the new Labour project collides with the real world. The time has come at last for the Government to stop talking about hard choices and start making some.

The omens are far from encouraging. At the recent summit in Pörtschach, the Prime Minister had an opportunity to say no; instead—in the words of an authoritative British source—he decided to go with the flow. If he continues to go with the flow in Vienna, it will be disastrous for Britain and disastrous for Europe. The decisions made in Vienna during the Germany presidency in the first half of next year will set Europe's course for the early part of the next century.

This should constitute an historic opportunity to ensure that Europe responds to the needs and wishes of its peoples. With nearly 20 million people out of work across Europe, job creation should be the number one priority. With the institutions of Europe being seen as ever more remote from the people of Europe, genuine subsidiarity should be high on the agenda. With the countries of central and eastern Europe desperate to cement their political and economic freedoms by joining the European Union, the requirements of enlargement should inform every decision that Europe now makes.

By their actions in Vienna, Europe's leaders will be able to provide answers to some fundamental questions. Are we to have a Europe of nation states, or will the process of European integration continue indefinitely? Will we be part of an outward-looking, free-trade Europe, or part of a fortress Europe? Will Europe take the route of genuine subsidiarity, or will it move yet further from its citizens? Will it be a high-tax or a low-tax Europe, a competitive or an uncompetitive Europe, a job creator or a job destroyer?

Since their election, all too many of Europe's left-wing Governments have already provided the answers to those questions. The tragedy for Britain is that, so far, the British Government have been content to go with the flow. It is now time for British Ministers to tell the British public where they stand.

Britain is, after all, in an ideal position to take a principled stance. Ministers should know what policies are best for Europe, because they have seen them work in Britain. Ministers in a country that, during the last Parliament, witnessed stronger growth than took place in any other major European Union country should know which economic policies are required to foster prosperity, because they saw them work in practice. Ministers in a country that, by 1997, had a lower unemployment rate than any other major European Union country, and a higher proportion of the working-age population in work than any such country, should know what policies are required for job creation, because they saw them work in practice. Ministers representing a country whose citizens believe in co-operation and free trade, but who are proud of their nation and do not wish it to be submerged in a single European state, should know precisely when to call a halt to further integration.

The British Government should therefore be putting a case for British principles—British Conservative principles—the free market, low taxes and less interference from Brussels. Alas, they are not doing so. Indeed, they are not arguing for any principles at all. Time and again, they are content to nod through whatever suggestions are put before them by other countries. When it comes to proposals from Europe, new Labour just goes with the flow.

That process has continued long enough. It is time for the Government to be straight with the British public. Before Ministers travel to Vienna, there are at least six key areas on which they need to explain where they stand.

First, Europe's agenda on the harmonisation of taxes is becoming increasingly plain. Finance Ministers of the countries holding this European Union presidency and the next have made it clear that tax harmonisation follows directly from the introduction of the single currency. The German Finance Minister has said that it is a primary objective of Bonn's EU presidency.

We are already aware of plans to harmonise corporate taxation. Now the Commission is preparing to publish suggestions for a common VAT regime. It has made it clear that, as an intermediate step, it wants to extend its scope and to review exemptions, which would clearly put the UK's zero rates at risk.

According to Commissioner de Silguy, that could "logically" lead to the introduction of VAT on food. The same commissioner has called for the extension of qualified majority voting on taxation issues. When asked recently whether harmonisation could include personal taxation, he replied, "Why not?"

At the very moment the Foreign Secretary was making reassuring noises to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs on Tuesday morning, there was a call from Germany and France for the abolition of the veto on taxation.

Mr. Casale: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman make clear which type of tax he is objecting to—indirect taxes such as VAT, which are part and parcel of completing the single market and on which his Government introduced harmonisation to complete the single market; or direct taxation, which is not on the negotiating table now, or for the foreseeable future? Which is he talking about—indirect or direct taxes?

Mr. Howard: If the hon. Gentleman wants to intervene, he should at least do me the courtesy of listening to the speech because, as I have said, those taxes are indeed on the agenda; Commissioner de Silguy has said so in recent days.

Mr. Robin Cook: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman is objecting to VAT being, as he puts it, on the agenda, could he clear up what he said in the Cabinet in 1993, when the then Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed to harmonise VAT rates throughout Europe?

Mr. Howard: The Foreign Secretary knows full well that it is country of origin-based VAT that is objectionable. That was effectively put off the agenda under the previous Government. It has come back on to the agenda under the present Government. That is what is objectionable and what the present Government's position is unclear about.

Mr. Cook: I am very sorry: I do not know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman was at the Cabinet the day it discussed that matter in 1993. The previous Government agreed that there would be a minimum standard rate of 15 per cent. throughout the European Union, and that there should be no more than two lower rates, of which the bottom one would be at least 5 per cent. That is the only agreement that has ever been made on harmonisation of tax rates in the history of the European Union. Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman object to it, and if he did not, would he please spare us this humbug?

Mr. Howard: The right hon. Gentleman knows full well that that agreement did not in any sense put the zero VAT rates in this country at risk. It is the country of origin-based regime on VAT that puts zero tax rates at risk, and we are entitled to know what the Government's position is on that and those other issues.

The Government claim that tax harmonisation is "not the way forward" and that "no-one is proposing any change in VAT".

but when we examine the small print in their documents, we find that their commitment to resist tax harmonisation is limited to personal tax rates. There is no commitment to resist harmonisation of the range of taxation that does not fall within that narrowly defined category.

When they are behind closed doors, the Government's actions belie their words. First, they sign a code of conduct on business taxation, under which they undertake not to engage in so-called "harmful tax competition". Then they endorse a socialist manifesto—indeed, they apparently drafted it—that calls for further efforts to avoid so-called harmful tax competition. Finally, this week, we have been told that Ministers will not be vetoing plans for a withholding tax, despite the damage that they would do to the City of London, and that they will be signing up to measures forbidding tax breaks for industries, including tax breaks that they themselves have introduced during the relatively short period that they have been in government. So Ministers say one thing in Britain and do another in Europe.

Mr. Giles Radice (North Durham): The right hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned zero rating of VAT. Has he noted that there are six member states with zero rating and that, for it to be removed, there has to be unanimous voting? It does not seem likely that there will be unanimous voting when six countries have zero rating, so the point that he is making is not really serious.

Mr. Howard: It is an extremely serious point when the Foreign Secretary assures the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs that matters are not on the agenda and, as he speaks, the Finance Ministers of France and Germany indicate that they are on the agenda. As we have seen in the past, when Germany and France agree on something within the European Union, they tend to get their way.

With such behaviour in mind, is it any wonder that the French Finance Minister confidently predicts that Britain will be that the Commission President says that Britain has already accepted the principle of co-operation on tax rates, and that European Commissioner Monti says that the UK is "fully on board" on the issue?

Let the Government answer clearly: why have they already signed up to the principle of tax harmonisation? Precisely which "non-personal" taxes are they prepared to see harmonised? Is it true that they intend to refuse to veto measures on withholding taxes; and will they propose new measures to outlaw tax breaks for particular industries?

The second issue is no less crucial to Britain's future. It was raised by the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall). The Foreign Secretary indicated that he was going to deal with it in his speech. We are still waiting for a comprehensive reply.

[Mr. Howard]

The House was not given the courtesy of a statement on the outcome of the informal summit at Pörtschach, but following the usual off-the-record briefings, the press reported that, to prove their Euro-credentials, the Government were planning to table new proposals on the future of Europe's defences.

The German Foreign Minister has made his view on that issue clear. He thinks that "one day, foreign and defence policy will . . . have to become community tasks", so he thinks that the European Commission should decide whether and when British forces should be committed to combat.

The Conservative party has an equally clear view. We believe that the British Government should continue to decide whether and when British forces are committed to combat. We believe that NATO should remain the bedrock of our security and that any European defence identity should operate within NATO.

What is the Government's view? When addressing a British audience through their mission statement, they promised to base Britain's security on NATO, but when abroad, they sing a different tune. The Prime Minister told the New York Times that the European Union needed to be able to act militarily "on its own" when the United States was not so engaged, and he told the North Atlantic Assembly that Europe needed "genuine military operational capability".

When the issue was raised with the Secretary of State for Defence last week, he refused to clarify it, so Ministers have a second chance today. Do they support the idea of a European Union military capability—yes or no? Would they support the abolition of the Western European Union, or its merging into the EU—yes or no? If the WEU is to be abolished and a European military capability is to be based on the European Union, where does that leave Norway, Turkey and Iceland, which are members of NATO but not of the European Union? Where does it leave the new members of NATO, who will become members in April, but who are not yet members of the European Union—Hungary, Poland and the Czech Republic?

Ms Claire Ward (Watford): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman explain how the views that he has just mentioned can sit comfortably with the views he expressed some time ago in the 40th anniversary special supplement of Crossbow. In that magazine, when he was a practising barrister rather than a Member of the House, he said:

"Eventually, indeed, the aim might be a European air force and joint units could be a first step towards that objective."

Does he agree with that statement now?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Lady has gone back a long way. I am delighted that she is such an assiduous reader of Crossbow. The previous Government made it clear that we had no objection to a European defence identity within NATO, but that is what the Western European Union is there to provide. It is the future of the WEU which is at the heart of this debate.

Ministers are playing an extraordinary game. After Pörtschach one senior civil servant remarked that it was "refreshing but a bit unnerving" to have a Prime Minister launching a major policy debate

"without knowing where it's going to end up."

When that debate concerns Britain's future security, such an approach might be considered rather more unnerving than refreshing. The North Atlantic Treaty Organisation has been extremely effective in keeping the peace over the past 50 years. It is disgraceful that Ministers are now prepared to put that at risk, not because they think that there is anything wrong with it but simply because they want to curry favour with some of our European partners.

Thirdly, we now learn that the European Commission is working on proposals for a unified criminal system with a European public prosecutor to whom each state's prosecution chiefs would ultimately be answerable. Initially, the proposals have been concerned with the fight against fraud in the European Union. The Conservative party has been at the forefront of calls for Europe to deal with such misuse of taxpayers' money. However, we would not support any extension of that work in the direction of a unified criminal system across the EU.

Ministers claim that such proposals are merely part of a discussion paper. They used to make similar claims about tax harmonisation until we discovered that they had apparently already signed up to the idea. The Conservative party can today give a categoric assurance that we will not support further moves towards a unified criminal system in Europe. Can the Government give that assurance too?

Fourthly, both France and Germany have made it clear that they support much higher public spending in Europe. What is the view of the British Government? When addressing British audiences they claim to support fiscal control in Europe. Once again, there is a yawning gap between their rhetoric at home and the reality of what they endorse while abroad. At Pörtschach, the Prime Minister was reported to have signed up in principle to a multi-million pound spending package. The Euro-socialist manifesto that Labour endorsed, and indeed claims to have drafted, contained similar plans and called for a "new culture of regulation".

Is it any wonder that many observers are claiming that the differences between the German SPD—the Social Democratic party—and the Labour party are far smaller than is often assumed in public debate.

Fifthly, Europe is facing vital decisions on the extent of future integration. The German Foreign Minister believes that the creation of a single European state is the "decisive task of our time."

He wants to turn the European Union into one entity under international law with a common constitution. The Conservative party believes that Britain should be in Europe, but not run by Europe. What is the Government's view? When giving interviews to the New Statesman the Foreign Secretary informs us that

"Maastricht was a high water mark of integrationism".

When seated round the discussion tables of Europe at Amsterdam, his party signed up to an extension of majority voting in 15 areas and a year later it endorsed a Euro-socialist manifesto calling for "increased international integration". Which of the Government's two contrasting faces—for domestic consumption or for presenting to our European partners—is the real face of the British Government?

Mrs. Dunwoody: I understand the right hon. and learned Gentleman's worries. As someone who negotiated the Labour party's involvement in the Euro-socialist manifesto over four different European parliamentary elections, I can assure him that such was the magnificent and careful use of language that all those documents contained no commitment to anything of any kind.

Mr. Howard: I am sure that the hon. Lady is absolutely right. In the days when she drafted the documents for European parliamentary elections, what they contained mattered very little because there were few left-wing Governments in the European Union. The trouble now is that the document matters greatly because 13 of the 15 Governments are left wing. That is why we have to take the document seriously and that is why its content is so alarming.

Ms Ward: Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman should take some lessons from the statistic that he has just quoted. The fact that 13 members of the European Union have what might be described as left or left-of-centre Governments might suggest that that is the right way forward.

Mr. Howard: The trouble is that in the past this country has seen the effect of the policies that those Governments are now pursuing so actively and vigorously. Those are the very policies with which the present British Government are prepared to go along, moving with the flow.

I want to talk about the extent to which the moves to a deeper Europe put a brake on enlargement. On 10 November substantive negotiations were opened at ministerial level through the accession conferences, involving the six first-wave applicants. We now learn that European Commission officials are stating "in private" that the target date for the first wave of EU enlargement is slipping to "after 2005". Hungary and Poland in particular have expressed concern at the continuing delays. The Polish President is reported to have strongly criticised the European Union for spreading myths and stereotypes about candidate countries as an excuse to delay their entry into the EU.

What is the Government's view? Publicly, the Government have given their support to the enlargement of the EU—we heard that from the Foreign Secretary a few minutes ago. In Europe, they continue to support further integration which will set back the process of enlargement still further.

The Government have not been open with the British public on any of those issues, but nowhere has Labour's unprincipled stance been as stark as on the single currency. Almost alone in Europe, the Labour Government have simply refused to explain exactly what the single currency will entail. The other countries of Europe do not share those inhibitions. The German Chancellor refers to the euro as "an important step on the way to European integration."

The Austrian Foreign Minister says that it represents a

"major step in the political process of European integration."

Commissioner de Silguy says that the single currency should be the "driving force of closer political union."

In Britain, the Government make no such claims. With the vast majority of British people opposed to such integration it is not hard to see why.

As on tax harmonisation, on steps towards a European Union army and on the proposals for further integration, the Government are simply unwilling to tell the British people the truth. Instead, they seek to divorce the constitutional impact of the single currency from its effect on the economy. They refuse to admit that the two are inextricably linked and that a policy of abandoning our control of economic and monetary policy has significant and constitutional implications. They are scarcely prepared to admit that the EMU project is about economic and monetary union, not simply about a single currency, momentous a question though that is.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman feel the slightest bit uneasy at having sat for all those years in the same Cabinet as the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)?

Mr. Howard: Not at all. My right hon. and learned Friend and I go back a very long way. We have been friends for a very long time and we agreed on far more things than we disagreed about.

Nations control their economic and monetary policy because it is in the interest of their citizens that those decisions be taken according to national needs. By saying that it is a question of when, not whether, we join economic and monetary union, the Government are intent on signing away in perpetuity our right to decide those vital matters for ourselves. Ministers claim that the constitutional implications are irrelevant. How will they explain that to British workers thrown out of work because European interest rates, set with the needs of all of Europe in mind, are too high for Britain; or to households facing an inflationary boom if interest rates are too low? How will they explain to British voters that their votes will be powerless to change those policies because the decisions will no longer be made in Britain?

It is, of course, easy to understand why the Government, given their record, are tempted entirely to remove matters of economic management from the domestic political arena. After 19 months in office, they have already generated the headlines produced by every previous Labour Government: interest rates up; taxes up; unemployment up. It is therefore easy to understand why they no longer want such questions to feature in our general elections. But what would be the point of having general elections if the parties were unable to stand on differing economic programmes?

Mr. John Cryer (Hornchurch): If, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman seems to think, EMU is wrong in principle, why does not the Conservative party rule it out for ever?

Mr. Howard: I am saying that those are relevant questions to be taken into account. They are not matters completely to be put to one side, as the Government pretend, by uttering the mantra that there is "no constitutional bar", as though that were enough to make any further discussion totally irrelevant.

[Mr. Howard]

The truth is that the management of our economy is not some side issue for Ministers to ponder in their spare time, but the primary function of a modern Government. How can removal of control of economic decision making from the House not be a weighty matter to consider in the context of economic and monetary union?

The fact is that—on the single currency, on tax harmonisation, on defence matters, on European economic policy, on judicial co-operation, on European integration and on enlargement—new Labour is trying to be all things to all men. It tells the British people what it thinks the British people want to hear, and then signs what the other countries of Europe want it to sign.

As Europe lurches to the left, Labour's only goal is not to be left out. Instead of standing up for Britain's interests, it goes with the flow. Labour is unwilling to express clear views on the matters because its views are not fixed. It is unwilling to explain its principles because it has no principles to explain. Instead, for the sake of a quiet life, it intends to avoid debate in Britain, while being carried on the left-wing tide in Europe.

There is an alternative agenda. We could have a Government who fought for the Europe in which we believe—who fought for free trade, low taxes, deregulation, job creation and a Europe that truly works in the interests of its citizens. Alas, all the signs are that the Government are not prepared to do any of those things. Instead they will go with the flow. Britain and Europe will be the poorer in consequence.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): When I listen to debates on Europe in the House, I sometimes feel that one should call down Chinese curses on both Front Benches. The reason is terribly simple: I believe that the United Kingdom electorate really do have the right to know exactly what is happening within the European institutions.

Unfortunately, our debates on Europe have now become almost set pieces, in which one side is prepared to say, "Your Government did everything wrong" in response to the other side, which is busily saying, "Our side intends to do everything right." I have been an hon. Member long enough to understand that such an approach to an important subject is not unusual. However, we have now reached such a stage in discussions on development, particularly of a monetary control system which will determine the United Kingdom's future for many generations to come, that we might be able to put before our constituents a rather clearer picture of what is involved.

I have just returned from Brussels where—following the dictates of my Ministers, who assured me that I would have a completely different attitude once I had gone—I returned to the haunts of my youth. I should say that, occasionally, I did actually live and work in Holland, in Belgium and in France. I am one of those strange people who do occasionally speak foreign languages. I also do not find that my physical presence in Brussels affects my political view one small iota. Perhaps it makes my view even worse, but it certainly does not change my attitude.

I think that we should now be saying that we have sufficient evidence to put before the British people about the implications of what is being proposed. We should say to them, "Talk about the report of the Court of Auditors", which, for the third time, has been unable to approve the accounts. The report describes in considerable detail straightforward fraud, although we have enough crooks in this country to understand the implications of that. People will be attracted where there are large sums, and it is not really surprising to discover that large institutions are unable adequately to control the amounts of money flowing through them.

We should, however, at least be saying openly now what we think of as subsidiarity and what we accept as central control. Ultimately, those are the only things that really matter. If we do not have a clear view of what policies are to be moved from the House and dealt with in European legislation, we shall never explain the political implications of doing so. The move towards a common currency must inevitably take with it a very clear commitment to a common taxation policy. I do not understand how anyone can pretend that that is not so. Some people would say that that consequence is not only sensible, but normal and, indeed, desirable. At least let us be reasonably outspoken about it. Let us say very clearly what the implications will be.

If we agree to measures, as we have done in the past, that bring with them a very considerable transfer of resources, let us say, "Fine; but that does not mean that we accept that there must be a common tax base or a common attitude towards taxation of particular industries. There will also be instances in which, for one reason or another, we wish to retain total freedom of action." The debate is not being framed in those terms. Too many people are already being given the idea that the debate can be thought of in highly superficial terms: "It would be nice if we had a common currency, because you won't have any difficulty changing your money when you want to go on holiday." I see some artificiality in that argument.

Do we really want a situation in which decisions are taken about major industries in a way that we cannot control? Let us take a small instance, involving an industry that I happen to know about, although it is certainly not one of the most important. If the British authorities decide to give specific taxation advantages to the film industry to encourage a local industry—to attract to Britain those who write and who act in British film productions that normally would have been made elsewhere, sometimes in Ireland but most usually in the United States—are they to be told in future that doing so is unfair discrimination because it is an industry that must have an absolutely flat taxation base right across the European Union? If so, fine; let us argue it out. However, let us not pretend that that is not the ultimate aim of many of the proposed changes.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Has not the hon. Lady received an equal number of representations from United Kingdom industries concerned that there should be a "level playing field" with other member states, but complaining about the ways in which other member states subsidise their industries? Does it not logically follow that, if one has a single market, one has to ensure that there are rules of fairness that apply throughout that market, which otherwise will become distorted, often to the disadvantage of UK companies?

Mrs. Dunwoody: That is exactly the theory on which many people have operated for many years. That was why we were told that there had to be the changes that we have already accepted. My experience of business, unlike the hon. Gentleman's, is that it will come and moan when it thinks that it can get some taxpayers' money, and will proceed in the manner that it thinks will benefit shareholders when it can operate without any constraints on its behaviour. I am, therefore, not entirely surprised when people complain to me about alternative industries and alternative countries.

I am saying something different—that the United Kingdom Parliament has a duty to tell the electors that when we talk about Euro money, we are also talking about Euro taxation and the ultimate aim of common bases. It does not matter whether it is taxation, industry aid or a long-term commitment to specific budgets; we are talking about common aims. I hope on some occasion to raise the inequities, absurdities and hypocrisies of the transport policies that we have been discussing this week in Brussels, because it is clear that there is a dichotomy in many institutions. The European Commission claims to be concerned about CO_2 emissions, yet it pushes hard for ever larger lorries to be allowed free access throughout the European Community. We should not allow that to go unobserved.

Both Front-Bench teams are failing to serve the populace well. They should tell the people in simple terms that within the next year and a half, there will be a concentrated campaign, funded largely by European Community money—of which we pay a large part—to try to persuade us that our future inevitably lies in a Euro monetary system that will have its final decisions made in another country and another system, which is not answerable, does not respond to its own monetary controls and does not meet with the agreement of its auditors.

That will have considerable implications for the British people. The major car firm in my constituency is owned by a large German company that has not only failed to give my constituents undertakings that there will be jobs well into the new century, but has said that it intends to move those jobs elsewhere. One of my rail freight firms has considerable difficulties. It wants to use freight paths across Europe and before long, it will face large national monopolies that are anxious to keep out competition.

I know what the problems are. I want a counter—I do not think that it will happen in the next two years—to the sophisticated, expensive and one-sided debate that we shall have about monetary control. I am sad that the House of Commons does not appear to be leading that.

7.3 pm

Mr. David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden): This is the first time that I have spoken in the House about Europe since I stood down as Front Bencher on the subject. I am a great admirer of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). I suppose that I was taking her advice early about trying to bring a cool, analytical approach to examining the Government's policies and strategies of the past year. I suspect that I ought to take that advice more than most, because I was probably a recipient of one of her Chinese curses when I was on the Front Bench.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Not just one.

Mr. Davis: Many Chinese curses.

Having watched the Government at work for 18 months, I am reminded of the old adage that the easiest way to create a Euro-sceptic is to find a Europhile and send him to the Council of Ministers. That is what happens to Governments during their time in office. In 1979, the incoming Conservative Government were broadly more tolerant towards Europe than the outgoing Labour Government. Something similar happened in 1997. The situation did not last in 1979; I doubt that it will last in 1999.

The Foreign Secretary has told us that Labour's strategy in the past 18 months has been to distinguish itself from the openly tough-minded approach of the previous Conservative Government by adopting an overtly Europhile approach. The present Government's strategy appears to be to demonstrate a willingness to make concessions up front in the hope of gaining more in return. I do not think that that is a misrepresentation.

During my three years as a European Minister, I attended 100 or more negotiating meetings, from small meetings of junior Ministers up to European Councils. I watched the other European countries play against each other as well as against us. My comments relate not just to our relationship with Europe. I saw a fierce competition of national interests wrapped up in communautaire language. I also watched the institutions continually promote a rising tide of European federalism, supported by a shifting alliance of the various member states. I never saw a concession given with no attempt to get something in return.

I started by doubting the strategy of volunteering concessions in the hope of eventual reward, but I waited to see whether I was wrong. I am afraid that I was not. Since the election, we have seen the ineffectiveness of the strategy, with concession after concession on our part, but gains that were non-existent, long overdue or trivial.

At Amsterdam, there were concessions on the social chapter, the giving up of our veto in 15 areas, the Schengen agreement, and new powers to the European Parliament and to Strasbourg. There was nothing new in return.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): My right hon. Friend should be aware that at Amsterdam, a new protocol on subsidiarity was secured, but a careful reading of it shows that it means only that subsidiarity applies in those areas in which we have ceded no control to the European Union. When I pointed that out to the Minister, he did not demur, but merely replied that we should enjoy it while we still have it.

Mr. Davis: My hon. Friend makes my point more dramatically than perhaps I would.

I continued to wait after Amsterdam in the hope that perhaps there would be later concessions—in vain. We did not even get a seat on Euro X, despite the Chancellor's legendary commitment to the euro.

I obviously disagree with the Government's policy aims, but I am as disappointed as many others that their negotiating strategy, which was different from ours, has failed. I did not expect anything more, but I was disappointed, because that failure affects the national interest.

This week, we have heard more about monetary union and threats of tax harmonisation. We have already heard some robust exchanges between Front-Bench Members today. It is not so long since Labour was claiming that monetary union did not imply any tax harmonisation or even pressure for it. Now we see proposals not just for tax harmonisation, but to remove our veto on tax law at the next intergovernmental conference.

Arguments about economic and monetary union as a solely economic project in Britain were always somewhat Alice in Wonderland. At meetings that I attended, nobody on the continent talked about monetary union except as a political project. The strongest debate was not about whether it was a political project, but about which should come first—political union or monetary union. All the exponents accepted that one implied the other. None of the Foreign Ministers or Prime Ministers I spoke to was in any doubt that monetary union was an integral component of political union.

It is no surprise that monetary union has brought with it the other trappings of centralisation of economic management. As the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich said, the corollary is a requirement for a large central budget to deal with the consequences. I should be surprised if we did not see that from our European colleagues in the near future. Anatole Kaletsky writes about that in The Times today.

The Chancellor would respond that he has a veto. That is correct and it is an important strength in his argument. Under no circumstances should he give it up. However, to imagine that the problems created by the start of monetary union can be resolved simply by the muscular use of the veto is at best simplistic.

Without the veto, Britain will face a catastrophic loss of sovereignty. Even with the veto, it will face serious difficulties; it will face many assaults and many pressures. Let us imagine that the United Kingdom Government manage to resist what will undoubtedly be increasing demands for tax harmonisation and other centralising economic changes, which are designed to eliminate what others regard as unfair tax competition that is destroying their jobs—we should remember that one man's tax competition is another man's unfair tax advantage. If that happens, the perception of unfair competition will go wider than tax issues; the Government's strategy will give rise to a more immediate threat to Britain's national interest.

The Foreign Secretary talked about European Union employment strategy. I fear that the Government may have created, without realising it, an economic doomsday machine that will do serious damage to the British economy in the medium to long term. For three reasons, monetary union will undoubtedly cause localised unemployment hot spots throughout Europe, even if it is successful.

First, the one-size-fits-all interest rate policy will cause unemployment in countries whose economies are on the down cycle when the rest of Europe is on the up. Secondly, countries that suffer badly from external shocks, such as collapsing markets in Russia or commodity price rises, will not have at their beck and call the fastest and most responsive economic mechanisms—exchange rates and interest rates—to prevent localised unemployment. Thirdly, the principal benefit of monetary union—the transparency of pricing across the Union—will mean stronger competitive pressures, which will lead more transnational companies to move production from the least efficient to the most efficient areas of Europe, taking jobs with them. The result of that will be high unemployment in some countries, irrespective of whether monetary union succeeds.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend paints a picture of Britain being locked into permanent conflict with the rest of the European Union and reaping no benefit from its membership. If that is the reality as he and others see it, a time may come when we should debate whether our continuing membership is in our interests or even Europe's interests. It may be difficult for us to continue to be part of the European Union if we constantly attack our own membership.

Mr. Davis: My hon. Friend takes the wrong end of what I am saying, which may be my fault. I was arguing that Europe, at its best and at its worse, is a marketplace of argument. There is clash and sometimes co-operation between the interests of member states. We should not be in any way blinkered about that.

We should determine what the mechanism that we are creating produces as a result of that interaction of nation states' interests.Over the past 50 years, the mechanism has encouraged growth in trade and enabled us to have half our trade with Europe. It has helped us to avoid military conflict between the various countries and has, no doubt, given us a range of advantages in other policy areas, such as home affairs.

Mr. Nicholls: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Davis: Let me answer one intervention at a time, especially when I have been taken completely off the line of my speech. I am arguing that we should debate the structures that are to be built into the European Union with open eyes. We should see what we are creating and what the consequences will be.

Mr. Nicholls: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way. He seems to have come to the crux of the matter. If one reads the treaty of Rome—which I did rather late in the day—it becomes obvious that it is in the business of setting up a common market not as an end in itself, but as one of a series of steps in the creation a new nation state. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) asks whether we shall ultimately have to ask ourselves whether we can go on like this. Whatever conclusion we draw, that is a fair question.

Mr. Davis: Of course it is a fair question. I am not sure whether it is an advantage, but I have read all the relevant treaties, including the Amsterdam treaty, more than once—three times in most cases. Almost all of them contain a multiplicity of objectives, which should be no surprise—they amount to the wills of 15 countries now, not to mention institutions such as the Commission, which operates virtually as a 16th nation state.

All member states must have asked themselves that question. I put the question to myself and discussed it during my three years in the Foreign Office, as my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) probably remembers. I always concluded that Britain's membership of the Union was not only to our advantage, but to the Union's advantage. We fill an important ecological niche—if there is such a thing—in the Union.

There were occasions in the run-up to the Amsterdam negotiations—I am being tempted to talk for much longer than I had intended—when Ministers from other countries told me, as Minister of State with responsibility for Europe, to veto the flexibility clause, for example. I said to them, not unnaturally, "You've got a veto. Veto it yourself." The response would be, "No, you must understand that some of us can't stand up to Franco-German pressure. Britain is the only country that can."

Regardless of whether that is true, the other countries collapsed on that issue and that was not the only time when Britain brought to bear in European negotiations a point of view that was unique, but very important to the European Union and its continued traditions of democracy. I shall now attempt to get back to the argument that I was making.

Mr. Blunt: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Davis: This will have to be the last time.

Mr. Blunt: My right hon. Friend is on a most interesting tack, so it would be a pity to leave it immediately. Surely a point comes at which the British national interest must be considered in the light of the role that we are being invited to play in Europe. The Government are already in that position. After 18 months, they are now almost completely isolated on tax harmonisation and have to look to the Spanish Conservatives for assistance. It will not be long before they are absolutely on their own—a traditional British position. The question that must be answered is whether that will always be worth it for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Davis: The issue must always be in front of anyone who is representing our country or making these decisions for it. I am perhaps a little kinder to the Government than my hon. Friend is; I take the view that they are still learning.

The history of the European Union shows that, on almost every contentious issue, there is first an argument about a matter on which the veto applies. Then, if it is at all possible, the European majority tries to make that subject a qualified majority voting article, as happened with the working time directive, the pregnancy directive and a number of other directives. If that does not work, the matter ends up in the European Court. Most recently, we have lost zero ratings on industrial construction for commercial purposes, which I suppose is understandable, and, rather disgracefully, on spectacles and contact lenses—I cannot imagine on what basis the court found against us in that matter, but it did. If that process does not work, there is a Schengen outcome—the 13, 14 or 15 go another way, set up a caucus and organise things to their own advantage so that one finds oneself at a disadvantage.

In the next decade, we shall have to face such problems over tax harmonisation. There will be the perennial attempt to remove the veto at the IGC—I predict that that will be on every IGC agenda until the attempt is successful or until the nature of the Union changes. None the less, our membership is worth while, as we continue to benefit from it. However, we must always ask the question, as my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury said.

Before that minor diversion, I was making the point that the system that monetary union creates will lead to localised hot-spots of unemployment throughout Europe. What will be the reaction of the countries that face those hot-spots? Will they decide suddenly to pursue Thatcherite policies? Will they deregulate their labour markets, cut on-costs and create employment, as the previous Conservative Government did? Is that the probable future of the new socialist Europe? I hardly think so.

We do not need to guess. We already have an example—we can read the book. About two years ago, Renault closed its factory in Vervoerde in Belgium—near the constituency of Jean-Luc Dehaene, the Belgian Prime Minister—and moved the production to France. What did Jean-Luc Dehaene do? Did he say that Belgian workers should cut their costs; that Belgian managers should become more efficient; that his Government would cut the burden of regulation and taxation on industry?

Certainly not—of course not. That is ridiculous. He called for an end to social dumping. He called for more regulation and harmonisation, and for more rules to stop the free operation of markets within and between the nations of Europe. That happened last time, and it will happen more and more often under the pressure of monetary union-created hot-spots of unemployment.

The difference this time is that there will be a mechanism for that call for more regulation to be turned into action. That mechanism, I am afraid, is the social chapter—not just the social chapter, but most specifically. The social chapter was created to allow harmonisation of labour law, and the Government have explicitly signed up to legislation under the chapter.

The harmonisation that we face that is most immediate is not tax harmonisation, but labour law harmonisation. We know from our history that that can cripple flexibility and growth, and can destroy jobs. It is not just the Opposition who know that—the Government commissioned the McKinsey report on the determinants of growth and the restraints on growth in this country. What was among the top three? Education and investment were not there, but competition and deregulation were. We know that the harmonisation of regulation will be very dangerous to our ability to create jobs. I want the Minister to say how the employment strategy of Europe will deal with this very real threat to British well-being and to British people's jobs.

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): I agree with the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis) that there is an advantage for Britain to remain as a member of the EU. When the right hon. Gentleman was a Minister, the Select Committee on European Legislation—of which I was a member—always appreciated his detailed knowledge of the issues on which we questioned him.

In common with my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), I want an open and informed debate on all the issues of concern to us in Europe. However, the speech by the shadow Foreign Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), and some of the interventions from Opposition Back Benchers have demonstrated how difficult it is in this so-called mother of Parliaments to have informed and balanced debate on such issues of importance.

[Ms Rachel Squire]

Many Conservative Members and the tabloid press consider it incompatible for someone to be both pro-British and pro-Europe. The reaction of some of the media to anything to do with Europe—not least this week—seems at times to verge on encouraging xenophobia. The reaction is one-sided—they see Europe as the enemy, bent on invading our glorious island. They ignore some of the advantages and benefits that our membership of the EU has given to us and to our constituents.

The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden mentioned some of those benefits, and my constituents certainly appreciate the ease of travel, the access to goods and markets of the EU, and European funding. Many constituencies, such as mine, have seen their traditional industries and areas of employment destroyed, and European funding has assisted in their efforts to create new jobs and economic regeneration.

If we are to deal effectively with many of the issues of concern, we must recognise that that can most effectively be done on a European and an international basis. One example of that—on which the majority of Britons would agree—is that tackling effectively the drugs industry and international crime must be done internationally.

I recognise that a number of hon. Members want to speak, and that the EU is a large subject to try to cover. I have decided to focus my remarks on two areas, both of which provide big challenges for the EU—first, the common foreign and security policy, and secondly, the challenge of making Europe seem more relevant and accountable to the lives of the people whom we represent.

Britain's relationship with Europe has been one of constant development and change, as those who are familiar with our history will know. It may help to remind ourselves that the very concept of the nation state is a fairly recent development in terms of European history. We must disentangle ourselves from the views of those hon. Members who still seem to cling and hark back to the days of the glorious British empire.

By virtue of our history and geography, Europe is where we are now, and it is where we must have a leadership presence in the 21st century. I am keen for us to have more debates on a common foreign and security policy for Europe, and what that would entail. Because of our geography, history and international reputation—and our high standing among nation states in many parts of the world—we in Britain are in a key place to take a lead. The process of European enlargement means that we must engage in a constructive dialogue on foreign and security policy.

If we are to succeed on the social and economic fronts, we need a stable and peaceful Europe—one where there is a good understanding of the different perspectives, of which there are many, due to the different locations of current member states and those states seeking to join. It is only by communication that we can try to break down some of the years of hostility, distrust and suspicion that have existed between some of those countries, develop a dialogue of trust and share a common agenda.

The "Partnership for Peace" process has demonstrated the success of that communication and joint working. It has brought together nations which, not so long ago, were clear enemies, and it has helped to break down quickly some old attitudes and prejudices.

The European Union has a role to play in that, and it cannot be left entirely to NATO, although I fully agree that NATO is the bedrock of our defence in Europe. Only through a close and constructive relationship with our European partners on common foreign and security interests can we seek to make an even greater positive contribution on the world stage.

I want more debate on the common foreign and security policy. We have a real mix and match of categories of countries in Europe that are involved or interested in our foreign policy, security and defence. There are countries that are in both the EU and NATO; those that are in the EU only; those that are in NATO only, and want it to stay that way; those that want to be in both; those that have been promised membership of one or the other; those that want to join both but are feeling rebuffed; and those that want to stay outside but somehow have a special relationship with Europe.

We need to focus more on the subject. As they would say in Scotland, we have the auld alliance with France, which wants to remain semi-detached from NATO but to raise its profile in European security issues. As we have seen all too clearly, that mix and match has made it extremely difficult for us and our European partners to agree and stick with a common approach when facing an international crisis, whether in Kosovo or in Iraq. Many hon. Members are keen to have a more rapid and effective European response to such crises, which affect the peace and stability of Europe.

I welcome the way in which my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence are trying to open up the debate on the EU's defence role and the future role of the Western European Union.

We also need to consider the future of the industries that give a technological lead in the EU, many of which are strongly associated with the defence industry. Those industries have been telling me that they want the EU to be more active in helping them effectively to rationalise into a strong and effective competitor of our close and special ally, the United States.

Most of our constituents do not regard Europe as affecting their everyday lives or as being interesting or accountable to them. It is seen as remote and bureaucratic, and as providing a convenient gravy train for unaccountable officials. It is in our interests as a country to challenge that view and to promote greater openness and accountability, not only in our own system of government—as the Government have done with the creation of the Scottish Parliament and Assemblies for Wales and Northern Ireland—but in Europe.

Anyone who has been an election agent in a European election, as I have, will know how difficult it is to persuade members of the public that the matter is one of key concern to them.

Mr. Blunt: The hon. Lady is inviting us to have the proper debate for which the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) called. There is a substantial political implication behind economic and monetary union. Does she agree that we should now consider the political and democratic accountability that will have to be built around the single currency and the single economy to make the European institutions accountable to her constituents and mine?

Ms Squire: I would certainly welcome a far more open and informed debate on all issues of concern in the European Union, be they economic, social or foreign policy-based. It is depressing how difficult it seems to be to have that debate without getting a tabloid reaction from some of the media: they do not give us information on or arguments for and against the various aspects of our approach to Europe.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary suggested that we should identify clearly those areas that should come under subsidiarity and those, such as the drugs trade, on which an international or common approach can be of mutual benefit.

I welcomed the fact that, at the end of our presidency, one of the conclusions reached at Cardiff was that a sustained effort is needed to bring Europe closer to the people. That is even more important now, when countries without our long tradition of parliamentary democracy and debate are joining the European Union. I welcome the ideas coming from independent groups such as the Centre for European Reform about how we can make the Commission more accountable. I do not know whether that should happen through elections, but I would like to hear people's views on the subject.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does my hon. Friend really think that there will be any move towards electing the Commission? It is a hybrid organisation in which jobs are reserved according to nationality. Its very rigidity makes it impossible for it to become accountable, and that is what occasions the grave reservations that many people in the United Kingdom have about it.

Ms Squire: I am by no means advocating any particular approach. I entirely agree that the Commission is seen as remote and unaccountable, producing endless reams of paper that no one can understand. I would like the Commission to be introduced immediately to the Plain English Campaign so that it produces stuff that is readable. I would like the House to have more open debate on how we can make the Commission and other European institutions accountable and help our constituents to feel that there is a direct link between those institutions and the reality of their everyday lives.

There is no future or comfort in adopting a British isolationist approach. We know only too well from the history of this century what a high price Europe has paid for isolationist approaches in individual countries. They have fed territorial instincts, prejudice and ethnic conflict. The best tribute that we can pay to those who have sacrificed so much for our peace and freedom is to seek co-operation, partnership and communication with fellow member countries in the European Union.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): In my brief experience of the House, I have noticed that the only thing that stops foreign affairs debates being timetabled for Friday mornings is if the House is not sitting. In that case, they are held on Thursday evenings, but it would be a pleasure at some time in the future to attend a foreign affairs debate in parliamentary prime time. Nevertheless, we have had a valuable debate with some interesting contributions.

In many ways, we have had an interesting political week and the crisis—one might say disaster—that has befallen the Conservative party in the past day or so has been fortunate in many ways, not least because it drew the press's attention away from their unremitting campaign of questioning the direction of British European policy. The crisis even brought The Sun back from expressing itself in inadequate German to its normal practice of expressing itself in inadequate English.

When the Foreign Secretary appeared before the Foreign Affairs Select Committee earlier this week, I asked him whether he felt that there had been a change in attitude to the principle of subsidiarity in the European Union. He was more sanguine than I believe was justified in the circumstances. In the past few months, a renewed climate of indecision, even hostility, has developed around some basic tenets, which I am sure I share with the Minister, behind the development of the European Union.

Everything must have seemed very different only a few months ago when we watched the election of the new German Government, which joined other socialist Governments—at least nominally—across Europe. It must have been with some glee that the spin doctors from No. 10 and the Treasury visited continental Europe to talk to Mr. Jospin's médicins de rotation and Mr. Schröder's Drehungdoktoren. Together they would be able to form a miasma of European spin to create the new European way, as it was described, which may be a continental version of the third way. However, it seems that all that effort was in vain, because it has all gone wrong in the past week. We may draw a couple of morals from that. First, do not let the Treasury try to run foreign affairs, because it is not equipped to do so. Secondly, there is still a real debate about the direction of the European Union and the arguments have not yet been won. The difference between this Government and the previous Government is that we are all now at least engaged in the arguments and can contribute to them. I hope that is what will happen in Vienna.

Earlier in the debate, the Foreign Secretary quoted Chancellor Klima as saying that tax harmonisation would take up one minute of the time in Vienna. I sincerely hope that he is wrong, because that crucial question should be addressed by the heads of state and foreign secretaries. The controversy we have seen in the newspapers in the past week has been somewhat synthetic. Mr. Lafontaine has conveniently been portrayed as the new bogy man—the new thing of the night—to replace Jacques Delors, in his time, and Jacques Santer, although the latter never had a sufficiently exciting persona to cut the mustard as a bogy man. Mr. Lafontaine has some potential in that area. We have seen proposals from 1996 dredged up and displayed as a real and current danger of standardisation across the European Union.

It would be offensive if I were to appear patronising to a senior politician of a partner Government, but Mr. Lafontaine has not been helpful to the European debate in the past week, for a couple of reasons. One is that, after a long period in opposition, he is a member of a newly elected Government. As we have seen, that sometimes causes people to speak in haste and then repent at leisure that they were not quite as diplomatic as they should have been. Another reason is that Mr. Lafontaine is a Saarlander—that is an important factor. He looks out of the window in Saarbrücken and sees people coming across the bridge every morning from the villages around Sarreguemines on the other side of the border. In that part of Europe, harmonisation is a real factor, because people live in France and work in Germany and vice versa. The border is very porous and the effects of that are a factor in his political make-up.

In recent days, the British Government have gone some way to addressing the issue, although not as plainly as I would wish. I am disappointed that the rebuttal of the proposals for tax harmonisation has been couched in a chimeric expression of sovereignty, because there are strong arguments against harmonisation that have nothing to do with sovereignty, important though that is. First, it removes the only element of flexibility within the rigid framework of tax policy that the Maastricht treaty laid out. Secondly, tax harmonisation cannot be reconciled with subsidiarity. The two do not go together. If one is genuine about subsidiarity, national Governments must have the freedom to set tax levels. Thirdly, tax competition is a useful mechanism. Genuine tax competition—I do not mean tax evasion or the abuse of the tax system that we see in some of the tax havens dotted around Europe—helps to establish economic parity between nations. Although harmonisation of tax levels across international borders may sometimes be a good thing, compulsion is not. The argument is the same as for compulsory competitive tendering in the domestic sphere. There is nothing wrong with competitive tendering, but if it is made compulsory it is wrong because it forces distortions on local choice and on the end result. We must also point out to partner states in Europe that tax harmonisation could also prove painful to their national interests—the President of the Commission may recognise that from his national background.

My second point concerns the protocol on subsidiarity. I was pleased to hear the Foreign Secretary say that some of the mechanisms of that protocol may be put in place before the eventual ratification of the Amsterdam treaty. The tragedy is that that has not happened already. If the nations of Europe were agreed that subsidiarity had to be made a reality, why was not the European Commission required from day one to justify any proposals it made in subsidiarity terms? There is no reason to wait for ratification. It is essential to see whether the protocol produces the right results. I would go further. We should seek codification across Europe, not just of treaties, but to establish the basic principle of subsidiarity—devolution of power to the lowest available level. We simply do not have that now.

I know that it is unhelpful to talk of a constitution for Europe, because others use that phrase in different ways, and it carries implications of a superstate, which I certainly would not support. However, we need something that says that some things are best done locally, regionally or nationally. Only matters better dealt with at the European level should be dealt with at that point. Such change should be retrospective, going into the acquis communautaire. We cannot leave aside all that has been done to date, saying that it was right just because it has been agreed. Times change, and matters ought to change with time.

I hope that the Vienna council will address the management of the EU and how the Commission organises its affairs. The Court of Auditors report on the mismanagement of international aid was so damning, not just of the small element of fraud, but of the much bigger element of mismanagement and simple incompetence that it cannot be left to the scrutiny committees of the European Parliament to put matters right. The Governments of the member states must call the Commission to account, and must say that that state of affairs cannot continue. We must have better management.

The British Government have exactly the right attitude towards budgetary control, and they should work with those who take an equally well defined view of how that control can be implemented. I mention with approbation, because I have spoken to him a number of times and I like what he says, the Finnish Commissioner, Mr. Liikanen, who has done a good job in putting forward proper suggestions for control of the European budget.

The proposals on EU co-operation on justice and home affairs are an important area for further development. We have seen initiatives on combating the drug trade, or international crime. However, a degree of—dare I use the word harmonisation; probably I dare not—co-operation across Europe is important to make sure that internal security measures are compatible and effective.

The Government will have to reconsider their position on asylum and immigration to ensure that our policy is compatible. The same is true of the future of the Schengen agreement, because we shall eventually find that it is in our national interest to have a degree of association with it. We must, of course, recognise our particular position as an island state, with all that that implies, but we must, nevertheless, consider the Schengen agreement anew.

The common foreign and security policy will be crucial. I wish the Prime Minister well on his day trip today to St. Malo, as I wished him well in Pörtschach. I wish, however, that he would occasionally share with the House the thoughts that he is so willing to share everywhere else in the world about the future of the common defence and foreign policy. He is exploring new areas of crucial importance, and the House ought to be able to express an opinion. As the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) said, we received no statement after Pörtschach, despite the best endeavours of Conservative and Liberal Democrat Front-Bench spokesmen to encourage the Prime Minister to give us one. I hope that he will explain his thinking to the House in the very near future.

We must maintain a commitment to NATO, an organisation of desperate importance to us. No one argues with our maintaining the inalienable right of the British Government to be the only body that can send British troops into danger. Anyone who feels that that can be short-circuited is quite wrong. Even so, it must be good to increase co-operation, and to increase the capacity to integrate the armed forces of Europe, particularly those of Britain and France, the real players who have strong armed forces in the European theatre.

In foreign policy, it is time that a senior diplomatic representative was appointed. It has taken too long to reach that point. Many Members are simply unaware of the scale of the European Union's diplomatic corps across the world, which is enormous, but undirected. We must fix its direction, and we must, in whichever areas we can, agree a common policy. That is particularly true in continental Europe, on the fringes of central and eastern Europe and in the Mediterranean area. One of the great negatives of the past year has been our complete inability to do anything effective in Algeria, on our doorstep. That failure speaks volumes for the need for a better integrated foreign policy.

EU states have already done quite well at integrating efforts at the United Nations, but I hope that we can do more. There is a high degree of interplay between the permanent representatives of the EU states at the United Nations. However, we heard in the Gracious Speech about the Government's commitment to UN reform, an area on which Europe has something important to say. I hope that we shall not consider only Security Council reform, because that may prove to be a dead end up which it is impossible to secure the agreement of other member states. Other areas are in desperate need of reform, and of new investment that can come only if we reduce overheads in areas in which money is being mis-spent because of a lack of will to look seriously at the distribution of funds. In particular, some agencies no longer perform a useful function, and their time, frankly, is up.

As a European entity, we should put real pressure on the United States of America to pay its arrears to the UN—it is scandalous that it is $1.5 billion in arrears. The Administration's arguments about difficulties with Congress will not wash. Insufficient effort has been made to ensure payment of those arrears, and we must pressure the USA, not least because we are the main creditors. Britain, France and the other countries that contribute to peacekeeping operations are not being paid because America will not pay its bills.

On Agenda 2000, the Cardiff timetable is desperately important if we are to see proper reform of the institutions. The Germans say that they are committed to it, and I ask the Government to ensure that that commitment is made explicit at the Vienna council.

Progress has been made on enlargement, even among some countries not in the first phase, such as Latvia, Lithuania and Slovakia, with its change of Government, and I hope that they will catch up rapidly. The Government should continue to adopt the principle of inclusiveness. We must make sure that everyone who is potentially in the running is encouraged to stay in the running.

The same applies to those countries in the first wave that are not making the necessary reforms. Having visited Prague recently, I am frankly disappointed with how the Czech Republic is meeting the demands of accession. We must tell such countries that they must ensure that they do what is necessary.

I shall finish by referring to two areas of current attention that the Vienna Council will probably touch on. The first is the crisis in Russia. It is desperately important for the European Union to do something effective to ensure stability there during the present economic crisis. We must also think of the countries that are still dependent on Russia irrespective of the changes of recent years, such as Belarus, which is not an easy country to like, but which we nevertheless need to embrace and Ukraine, which we often forget. Ukraine is a country the size of France and it will be on the borders of the European Union if Hungary accedes, yet we forget about it. We cannot afford to do so.

Finally, I hope that Kosovo will still be on the agenda at the Vienna Council and that we will ensure that we make a concerted effort on humanitarian aid. A few months ago, I visited the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. I went to the border, although not to Kosovo, and could see to some extent what was happening there. One problem is the almost complete lack of building materials. It is difficult to get them in peaceful Macedonia. How much more difficult it must be in Kosovo, given its devastation and the non-co-operation of the Serbian Government. We must tackle that problem and contribute positively to the extraction force, as we have been doing, to ensure that it is integrated into the Kumanovo area and does not cause any further difficulties for the Macedonians, who have gone through a difficult period.

I hope that we will also consider the interests of other neighbouring states. We cannot afford to forget Albania and Montenegro, which is the forgotten part of the former Yugoslavia, but has the capacity for destabilisation, which is a serious matter.

In conclusion, I must simply say that there was an attempt to form an Anglo-German axis a month or so ago. I suspect that it has not succeeded. Nevertheless, we must maintain our engagement, our interest and our persuasion, if the European Union is to develop as we want and, by we, I mean not only Opposition Members but those on the Treasury Bench, who share that view, I think. If we are to make sensible developments and to achieve reform, we need friends to do that. We need to work to form a creative coalition within the EU, which recognises the dangers of carrying on as it has done and the deficiencies in the present structure. It should work hard to reform the EU, bring it closer to the people and make it answerable, responsive and democratic—all those things that, in many ways, it fails to do at present. If the Government can achieve that at the Vienna Council, I wish them well.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. Before I call the next hon. Member to speak I must remind the House that a number of hon. Members still want to catch my eye and, unless speeches are considerably shorter than they have been, some of them will be disappointed.

8.3 pm

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I am an unashamed admirer of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. When Labour came to power in May 1997, I thought that one of the greatest contributions that we could make as a Government would be the intellectual ability and clarity of mind that he would bring to the European dialogue. I continue to hold that belief, so I hope that he will not mind if tonight I expand the area of my admiration a little.

It is important to break away from some of the caricatures that have appeared in the press in the past week, which have verged on the xenophobic and which do not do justice to the contributions that two people, Oskar Lafontaine and Dominique Strauss-Kahn, are making, which we should recognise. Their contributions to the document, "The New European Way", move us into the arena that many of my colleagues have sought to occupy, which is a thoughtful discussion of the future of Europe and the practicalities of that future. I have many and various disagreements with the document that they helped to produce, but its importance—I would recommend it to the whole House—is that it forces us all to think about the practicalities of a common European future. It is not riddled with slogans and soundbites; it attempts to tackle the serious preconditions that will have to be in place if we are to provide a stable European future.

In the document, the authors recognise that fiscal stability is not the same as social stability. Europe has had fiscal stability in a single currency before—at the end of the 19th century, under the gold standard. The only problem was that it left deep scars in the social landscape of Europe. Because there were no mechanisms for social cohesion, that standard left people in deep troughs of famine and starvation. They were pushed into large-scale migration and social upheavals, which in turn caused deep disruptions in society.

In revisiting the agenda for a Europe that is united within a single currency, the architects of that paper recognised that other mechanisms must be in place to underpin a single currency and make it sustainable. I confess that I am not a believer in a single currency and do not think that it can work in the circumstances in which we are trying to construct a common European future. There are many better ways to construct that common future.

However, the authors of the paper force us to recognise what measures must be in place. The reality is that, both in the world as it is now and in the history of single currency zones, there is no record of any system that has been stable and secure without two things being in place. The first is a consensus about how to raise taxes, and the second is a credible mechanism for redistributing them to provide social cohesion.

Those who say that the single currency will not require us to harmonise income taxes, pensions and benefits and who look to the United States because of the flexibilities that exist there—different income tax rates in different states, for example—must take a step back and recognise that the underpinning of that system has a set of consequences to which we may or may not want to subscribe.

I was fortunate to obtain from the Library some of the figures to show how the US single currency zone is different from our own. At the moment, the contribution of US taxes as a proportion of gross domestic product is as follows: 12.3 per cent. go directly in federal taxes; 5.6 per cent. go in state taxation; and 3.6 per cent. in local taxes. We do not have an equivalent to US state taxes. The current position in the United Kingdom is that 27.5 per cent. of our taxation, as a proportion of gross domestic product, is national and 1.4 per cent. is local. If we wanted a system with the same income tax flexibilities as the US system, we would have to recognise that it underpins its system through that shift in the collection of tax revenues to the federal level. If we were to apply that system in Europe, it would mean the direct transfer of taxation—of some 20 per cent. of our GDP—to a European federal level.

I remind the House that the United Kingdom's contribution to European structural funds will be 1.27 per cent. of GDP at the beginning of next year. I have not heard anyone argue the case for retaining within the nation state the flexibilities of variable and differing income tax levels, by underpinning those with a 20p in the pound shift in taxation to European federal structures. I should like to be with any Member of Parliament who tried to explain that on the doorstep. I suspect that the only thing it would prove is that, under conditions of extreme pressure, all Members of Parliament can run the 100 metres in an extremely short space of time, because we would get short shrift from the electorate were we to make that case. We must be careful about saying that tax-varying flexibility can currently be found in the United States of America. It is not the same and it is dishonest to suggest that it could exist here without there being a substantial shift of direct tax contributions from member state level to European federal level.

Mr. Letwin: The hon. Gentleman is making a most interesting and thoughtful speech—indeed, the point he has just made is seminal. However, does he agree that a further point goes with it—that for all sorts of obvious cultural reasons, mobility of labour within the United States is vastly greater than can be expected within the European Union; and that, therefore, the need to adjust to those flexibilities through central funding is paradoxically less in the United States than it will be in the European Union?

Mr. Simpson: That is an important point. Most serious analyses of conditions in Europe, both positive and negative, recognise that language and culture make the people of Europe far less mobile than the population of the United States of America. In addition, the greater the levels of that forced internal mobility, the greater the social conflict that arises between local communities and those who are defined as outsiders, so I am cautious about where that would take us.

On the other hand, we could argue that it would be possible to have internal redistribution mechanisms of the sort in which Germany gave an inspirational lead. When Germany was reunified, one of the commitments that the west made to the east took the form of a solidarity tax, which recognised that huge transfers of resources were needed to end the poverty and build the basis of social inclusion in a united Germany. The equivalent of an extra 7p in the pound in taxation was voted by the German people in order to build that basis of social inclusion. I have nothing but admiration for the Germans for doing that.

Is that immediately translatable to a European Union level? Sadly, the answer is no. As was demonstrated by the Court of Auditors report—which was rightly raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) in relation to democratic accountability—the problem affecting European institutions as they stand is that there are huge weaknesses in the way in which Europe is able to manage and account for money, with £3 billion unaccounted for and up to 5 per cent. of funds lost to fraud. It is not acceptable for any of us to apportion blame for that, because we are all caught up in it. This country is no holier than any other member state in terms of the misuse of funds and the abuse of European structures in our own interests.

The problem is that, if there was a shift in funding into European structural coffers and the amount was multiplied by five, fraud would be multiplied by 50. That is the consequence of trying to put more resources into a framework that is clearly deeply and seriously flawed. Those who believe in a single currency and want it to work must acknowledge that the institutional and financial structures of Europe would have to undergo a massive sea change in order to make it possible.

The document I referred to earlier sets out the key challenges that must be addressed if social cohesion is to be built in a future European context. I shall quickly deal with the key points. The first is found where the authors, in a lovely little sentence, call for "better coordination between monetary policy and employment and wage-policies", and also

"a dialogue between the institutions responsible for economic policy, including the ECB and the European Social Partners".

That is wonderful for those accustomed to attempting to decode the contents of European documents. The authors want there to be democratic political control of the European central bank. For those of us who never really believed that Steady Eddie should have been allowed out on his own, it is welcome to hear that our social partners in Europe want democratic control of the ECB so as to deliver full employment policies and social inclusion policies, which are at the centre of their social, political and economic agenda. That would, of course, require a certain renegotiation of the Maastricht treaty, but between consenting adult member states, that strikes me as a perfectly legitimate objective because it is an essential underpinning of how to deliver social stability in Europe.

The second key point the authors make is:

"In the last decade evidence from the EU has shown a disproportionate increase in the fiscal burden on immobile factors, especially labour, coupled with a reduction in the burden on mobile factors, especially capital."

The partnership between socialists and social-democratic partners in the European Union has at last recognised that there has to be a shift in the burden of taxation on to feckless and footloose capital; that we cannot continue to ask the poor and those who are in work to carry the tax burden for an increasingly reckless and deregulated global economy that is driving us all to ruin. I welcome the fact that the authors of the document have put that point so clearly on the agenda.

The third point is to observe that

"EMU will intensify the potential for tax competition. Therefore, further efforts have to be undertaken to avoid harmful tax competition among the member states."

That is absolutely clear and absolutely right, if we are to avoid the flight to tax havens, eliminate hidden subsidies and avoid a game of beggar my neighbour in which we all try to undercut each other or to set up systems of corporate welfare, whereby we offer bigger bribes to lone-parent companies to come and live with us for a time based on an enduring love for which we are to pay good money. If we are to avoid all that, we have to find other ways of developing a sense of coherence and cohesion in the systems of taxation of corporate earnings. It is essential that we do not, whether within a single currency zone or not. The authors make the point that that effort is essential, if we are to "make further progress in tax and benefit reform."

There has to be a sense in which that inclusive Europe allows us to enjoy the security and benefits that are present in the best economic arrangements, instead of being pulled down to the levels of the worst.

In that revisiting of a common view of Europe's tax arrangements, the authors say that there has to be a greening of the tax system and a co-ordination of savings and corporate taxation, not only within Europe but at the level of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. They want that to be the basis for the introduction of new Europe-wide regulations which use Europe as a lever to compel the institutions of the global economy to re-regulate global forces.

I hope that hon. Members on this side of the House at least will address that agenda seriously. I hope that we will applaud the initiative taken by our sister parties in Germany and France and by the coalition of parties that contributed to this document. I hope that the Government will agree to take forward several practical suggestions from this debate. I think that the document has serious shortcomings, but we could substantially improve the dialogue and the direction in which it is heading.

I shall conclude by making four suggestions. First, in the discussions about how best to harness footloose capital it would be helpful to consider the devastating destruction of tidal speculation movements against countries and currencies globally. A European-wide lobby must change the international financial architecture so that we can introduce a transactions tax on speculative capital. That is commonly referred to as the Tobin tax, as Professor James Tobin of Harvard university was the first to suggest it. It involves imposing a tax rate of 0.5 per cent. on speculative capital movements. That would be sufficient to raise the reserves that could underpin and support countries that are subject to speculative ventures against them and act as a disincentive to speculative, but not serious, investment.

My second suggestion concerns our treatment of other forms of footloose capital. We are currently bombarded by reports in our daily newspapers about factories closing in order to rationalise production elsewhere. The scale of job losses is sometimes breathtaking. As I entered the Chamber tonight, I picked up a letter about my constituency, where Marconi Communications has announced that "a review of the Group's facilities has shown the potential for a reorganisation that would reduce costs and increase efficiency."

Unfortunately, the review requires the group to make 1,000 people redundant in order to continue its policy of production based on "high growth" and "high margins". That means that it will no longer operate in my constituency

America takes an interesting approach to that problem. It is already exploring the idea of "A" code taxation based on the "site here to sell here" presumption. America believes that companies cannot reserve the right to sell into the US economy goods that they are unwilling to pay to produce in that economy, or because they are unwilling to sustain wage rates in production and contribute to tax revenues that would begin to relocate or retrain those whose labour they have abandoned. The Americans are toying with the idea not of ending the notion of public subsidies for industry and essential manufacturing, but of trying to build a stakeholder component into that process. We must tell the corporate sector that there are no free handouts: we are talking about obligations that accompany entitlements. Those obligations are based on public stakeholdings rather than unconditional public subsidies.

My third suggestion is that we should expand on the document's ideas about green taxation. We have yet to have a serious debate about the different types of green taxation and the difference between progressive and regressive green taxation. I remind hon. Members of our clear slogan and principle in relation to the environment that we must pursue policies that make the polluter pay. We should also ensure that the footloose polluter pays more.

Earlier today, I referred to the Raleigh bicycle company in my constituency, which has spent about £28 million on a new production line with extremely high levels of environmental responsibility. It has reduced by a factor of 10 both in-plant pollution—the health and safety contributions—and end-of-line pollution. It has introduced wonderful through-put technology. However, the company complains that it is forced to compete on a price-only basis with Chinese or Taiwanese manufacturers who never accept any responsibility for reducing pollution in the production process.

We cannot pursue a common European policy that rewards the environmentally profligate and penalises those who operate within our domestic and European economies producing the environmental standards that we wish to see and share in. If we adopt that approach, we shall be able to take a lead in defining the economics of the 21st century and give practical form to the pledges that we made in Kyoto. If we do not have sustainable economics in the next century, we are likely not to have any economics worth talking about. We have done so much damage to our global climate and biodiversity this century that we will have to spend a large part of the next century undoing that damage and restabilising.

Finally, the document poses a clear challenge to define what a system of redistributive taxation would look like at a European level. In many ways, the closest that we have come to responding to that challenge in this country is the recent Acheson report on health. Acheson sets down a benchmark for measuring the necessary redistribution of resources and explains where we need to begin in a health and environmental context. If we were to take up those ideas and throw our responses to them into a European dialogue, I am certain that we would take a lead in Europe that many of our European partners would gladly follow.

I believe that that is the basis upon which we can define a stable, secure and inclusive Europe. It will be the case whether or not we have a single currency. I believe that the divides around the single currency issue are seriously flawed and misguided. At times, it is like trying to get our towels on to the deckchairs before our German or French competitors when the boat is the Titanic and we would be better off advising people to look for the lifeboats. That is the danger inherent in limiting the single currency debate.

"The New European Way" sets out the pillars from which socialists and social democrats across the whole of Europe should be able to find a common agenda to provide a secure common future. I hope that Ministers, especially my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, will have the courage to take that lead.

8.29 pm

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I congratulate the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) on that magnificent speech. I remember meeting him many years ago when I was a Minister and travelled to Nottingham. I think that he has worn rather better than I have—but that is the way of things. He made a masterly assessment and analysis of the lessons to be learned from the American experience in so far as it has implications for us. I should like to think that the speech will commend him to those on the Labour Front Bench, but I am not sure that it will.

This is my first opportunity since the general election to contribute to a debate about the European Union. In fact, the issue of Europe dominated my election campaign. I found that the only thing that people wanted to talk to me about when they saw me in the street was the European dimension. I attribute my somewhat thinner majority in the election to the fact that because we have not closed down the argument by answering the question that people asked—"Where do you stand on a single currency, one way or the other?"—the subjects that the vast majority of people wanted to discuss with a Conservative candidate were never raised.

The conclusion that I drew was that we should never find ourselves in that situation again. That I why I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has adopted a position on the single currency which strikes me as being right and intellectually honest, and which commands the widest support among the people who spoke to me in the election campaign.

The single currency is sometimes spoken about as an end in itself, as though it was a new phenomenon that has suddenly darkened our horizons. I came to the issue somewhat late in the day. As I recall, I voted against entry into the Common Market, but that was probably very much on the balance of probabilities. I cannot honestly say that, cheerful and young as I was at the time, I gave it a huge amount of thought. The first time I gave the matter serious thought was in 1988. I was a Minister in the Department of Employment, where I was responsible for trade union reform. One day the Minister of State who used to deal with matters European found that he had a tummy upset or some such indisposition and could not go to Europe. I was told, "Minister, you are going to Europe. The car is downstairs, the Red Box is on the seat, and you can read the papers on the way over."

On the way over I read the papers, which were straightforward. At the bottom of my Box was an extra document, a copy of the treaty of Rome. I read it for the first time, and was both appalled and shamed by it. I had always accepted that the treaty of Rome was about establishing a common market. I had believed what I had been told. In the White Paper that preceded our entry into the Common Market, we were assured that "decisions are only made if all members agree".

We were also told:

"There is no question of Britain losing essential national sovereignty."

There was no question at all—it was inevitable.

When I read the treaty of Rome, I realised that it was about establishing not a common market, but a new nation state, and that the establishment of a common market was merely a step down that road. Anyone who reads the treaty of Rome realises that the common market, the single currency and so on are deliberate stepping stones to a federal destiny. Members of my party should recognise with contrition that our European partners realised that throughout. We did not, because we accepted the assurances that we were given that federalism was not on the agenda.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) quoted Hans Tietmeyer, the president of the Bundesbank. One of his predecessors, Karl Blessing, said:

"The final goal of the Commission is a European Monetary Union. . . A common currency . . . is feasible only if, apart from a common trade policy, there is also a common finance and budgetary policy, a common social and wage policy—a common policy all round. In brief, this would only happen if there was a federal state."

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) got it right when she said that it was so plainly obvious that tax harmonisation is absolutely necessary if we are to enter a single European state that it was barely worth arguing about.

The blueprint for the single European state, which can be created only if our nation state is extinguished, was laid down long ago in the treaty of Rome. We are at the 11th hour in the setting up of that new, independent state. It already has many of the attributes of such a state: an anthem, a flag, a Parliament, its own civil service, a common citizenship, its own overseas embassies, a common passport and, within days, it will have its own common currency.

Tax harmonisation is not a big surprise and has not just come on to the scene. It is inevitable. I shall not go through the documentation, as time is short. Far from standing up fearlessly against tax harmonisation, the Government are actively promoting it. That is the reality behind the rhetoric.

In addition to all the other attributes of a single state, we have discovered in recent days that we are to have a common legal system. Anyone who doubts that and fancies some bedtime reading should try reading "Corpus Juris" and what its apologists say. Stephen Woodward, the director of the European Movement, described the notion that "Corpus Juris" could ever be adopted as "ridiculous." He said that it was a report drawn up by a "group of experts" with no official status. He said that it "goes nowhere near the creation of a system of European criminal law."

What does "Corpus Juris" do? I shall tell the House. It is a plan that envisages a European public prosecutor, the EPP—not much room for signwriters there—to whom each state's prosecution chiefs would ultimately be responsible. The Brussels-based EPP would be independent of national authorities and have a delegate in each capital city. The prosecutor would have the power to instruct a national judge to issue a European arrest warrant that would be valid across the whole European Union.

"Corpus Juris" states:

"For the purposes of investigation, prosecution, trial and execution of sentences concerning the offences set out above . . . the territory of the Member States of the Union constitutes a single legal area."

It continues:

"If an investigation conducted by a national authority reveals that an offence has been committed the dossier must be immediately submitted to the EPP."

There is to be a new judicial figure called the judge of freedoms. That should amuse anyone who has a ghost of a sense of humour. He is to give authority for suspects to be held for up to nine months under European jurisdiction and to be transferred to the country where the crime took place without extradition proceedings. "Corpus Juris" states that "courts must consist of professional judges, specialising where possible in financial and economic matters, and not simple jurors or lay magistrates".

Goodbye habeas corpus.

The document does indeed have official status. It is an official European document, produced under the aegis of Francesco De Angelis of Directorate-General XX. In the report that introduced and commended the document, the rapporteur, Mr. Rinaldo Bontempi, points out in sections IV and V that there is no need to worry about the national veto. He suggests that rather than using the third pillar,

"the basis for such action is to be found in the EC Treaty, with particular regard to Article 209a, whose provisions were strengthened by the Amsterdam Treaty".

The report goes on to say that that article

"makes cooperation between the Member States and with the Commission an obligation. . . the Amsterdam Treaty extends it to all the competent authorities including the judicial authorities."

Mr. Woodward describes such a document as having no official status. Sooner rather than later, it will simply be introduced. There are always three stages in such cases in Europe. First we are told that it does not exist. Then we are told that it will not happen. Finally, we are told that it is inevitable.

I have one of the only copies of "Corpus Juris" around. The journalist Graham Danton, who got it for me, had to telephone Brussels and Luxembourg three times each. First, officials there denied that the document existed. Finally, they asked, "Why do you want it? You don't need it." Only when he said that he had heard that it was a really super book that would take forward the course of European integration did they say, "OK, that's fine—you can have it," and send him a copy.

I make no criticism of our European partners for behaving in that way. What they want is a single European state. That has been obvious from the inception of the treaty of Rome. It is not up to us to criticise them for what they want, but it is up to us to ask ourselves whether that would be right for us. Could we feel comfortable with such a relationship in Europe?

Back in March 1995 my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) said in a debate in the House:

"The often unspoken fear of many people—we should address it honestly and clearly and examine it—is that Europe might develop into a super-state, an overarching Government with no national veto, no control over our own borders, prescriptive decisions, a single currency imposed and the nation state retreating to a wholly subordinate role. That fear exists out there . . . and we should recognise the fact that it exists."

He concluded, and it seems so long ago:

"I for one would find such a Europe wholly unacceptable for this country. I do not believe that it is remotely likely, but, if that were to be the future, it would not be a future that would be suitable for this country."—[Official Report, 1 March 1995; Vol. 255, c. 1062.]

We are there. We are in the presence of a new created state which requires our own nation state to be extinguished. We cannot go on being the bad man of Europe and standing in the way of our European partners because we do not believe that their destiny is right for us. It is not a question of coming out of Europe. Europe is there. It is our own continent. Our nationality may be British, but our culture is European. Europe will always be there, which is why it is legitimate and right to say that we must be in Europe but not ruled by Europe.

We have to ask ourselves, "Can we go on like this?" We have to say honestly that, if we cannot get our European partners to abandon a project on which they have been embarked these 30 or even 40 years, and in fairness to everyone, we must ultimately have a relationship with which we feel comfortable. There is a great deal more that I could say, and I hope that there will be occasions on which I can do so, but I am conscious that other hon. Members want to speak. We must face up to what we are about, and the Foreign Secretary did not begin to do that.

8.40 pm

Ms Claire Ward (Watford): First, I apologise to the House for being unable to remain for the winding-up speeches.

Let me take up the point made by the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) about the referendum in the 1970s. Unlike many hon. Members, I do not remember the great debate and the referendum on entry into what was then called the European Community. For me and many of my generation, Europe, and our co-operation with our European counterparts, has been very much part of our lives. We have studied European languages and adopted many aspects of European culture. We frequently travel to Europe and we have friendships with people in other European states. I stress, however, that my pro-European stance in no way suggests any less support for my own nation state and for the right of its people to determine the best future for this country.

Many hon. Members on both sides of the House have found it difficult to be both a citizen of a nation state and a European. The two have not sat comfortably together, but the advantage of being a full, proactive member of the European Union is that we maximise the benefits of our membership through co-operation. We enhance the opportunities for trade, and we increase rather than restrict competition. We agree on changes where they are in our interests. In our dealings and relationship with Europe, that fundamental principle must always remain: we agree where that is in the interests of Britain and its people. What can be wrong with that?

We have heard a lot of scare stories lately. There has been a lot of scaremongering on the euro and on tax harmonisation. I accept that fear is often the result of change or of the unknown. I can accept that many people find it difficult to believe that those who have proposed the euro, and those who will enter it next year, can be acting in the interests of more than their own nation states. Such panic and scaremongering is certainly not in the interests of Britain. A sensible, well-informed debate weighing all the pros and cons of the euro certainly would be. The euro is in the interests of Britain and of business.

Although I have the utmost respect for my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson)—and, as a colleague and fellow team player in the all-party parliamentary football group, I have no wish to offend him, because he may make sure that I end up with a few bruises in the next game—I do not completely agree with him.

Let us consider the example of the United States. My hon. Friend's arguments were clearly thought out and well constructed, but the history and culture of the United States are different from the history and culture of the European Union. What we create in the European Union, with Britain a part of it, will be unique. We will be able to look to America to consider some of the issues that my hon. Friend rightly raised, but we should do so for information and knowledge only.

Last Monday, more than 100 business leaders signed a statement in the Financial Times, saying that Britain "should aim to join the single currency as soon as the conditions for successful entry are in place".

In their view, that is likely to be soon after economic and monetary union is established. Since the publication of the business statement, a further 150 business people, from companies large and small, have rushed to sign up.

That is perfectly understandable. Those business leaders signed in personal capacities, but they include the chairmen and chief executive officers of more than 20 FTSE 100 companies, as well as many small and medium businesses and entrepreneurs from every region of Britain.

Companies such as Marks and Spencer are making the necessary changes to their business and to their tills to adapt to the euro, because they believe that the euro will be part of Britain's dealings with the EU. A company in my constituency, which supplies electronic health equipment to health services in this country and in Europe, has decided—much to my regret—to close a significant part of its operation and move to Europe. It will be dealing in euros to a much greater degree and believes that it should be based in one of the member states.

Some 63 per cent. of businesses say that it is in their best interests that we join the single currency as soon as possible or after the next general election. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor have made it clear that, although we support the principle of the single currency, such fundamental change must come only with the support of the people of this country and at a time that is appropriate for Britain. That is a clear position, which I fully support.

Business in this country needs the euro. Almost one in four firms doing business with Europe have been asked to deal in the euro from January 1999. If we do not take a serious interest in the euro, we will be left behind. Some 65 per cent. of United Kingdom exporters want a single currency in the EU, and we will continue to let them down if we do not take a clear view on movement towards the euro.

The right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) suggested that there is one all powerful person in the EU—the German Finance Minister. He also suggested that if the German Finance Minister makes a statement, the rest of us should be very concerned that it represents a development of the policy of the EU. Are we to believe that, when the German Finance Minister states a view, we should assume that it is a fait accompli? That must be absolute nonsense. We should bring some reality to our discussions.

The German Finance Minister is but one member of the German Government, and the German Government are but one member of a 15-state body. They will not get their own way; of that, I am absolutely confident. There is no sense in greater harmonisation of tax. It would not benefit Britain. As the overriding principle must be that we adopt changes only if they are in Britain's interests, there should be no great move towards the harmonisation of taxation.

It is nonsense to suggest that joining the euro will inevitably lead to tax harmonisation. For a start, we would be absolutely mad to allow harmonisation, because we know that it would result in much higher costs for all. We do not have to accept such moves. That is the great advantage and the purpose of having a national veto. Any change to EU taxation policy must be agreed unanimously by member states. Britain has the right to veto any proposals that it opposes. Furthermore, the abolition of the national veto in any area of policy requires a treaty change, which must first be agreed unanimously. Britain's right to veto any proposed EU taxation policy cannot be removed without our consent. So long as we oppose the harmonisation of taxation, we will remain without it.

Our future is in Europe. We should be a part of it and lead it, and not be led by it. We must not stand on the sidelines shouting advice, but should be on the pitch scoring the goals and winning for our team. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has made it clear that he wants to lead our nation in our discussions with Europe. The policy that we are pursuing is the right one for Britain, and I hope that we shall continue to pursue it.

8.52 pm

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Watford (Ms Ward). Soon after she and I arrived in the House, we were on a radio show together. It was a great pleasure to take part in that show with her. She has helped to illustrate some of the points that I want to make.

At the beginning of the debate, the Foreign Secretary said that the British people should be treated like adults. We have had some extremely adult and intelligent contributions to the debate, and there has been some terrific analysis. I commend the hon. Members for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) and for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) for their contributions and analysis, which I thoroughly enjoyed. I experienced the usual frustration when I listened to the Foreign Secretary, and I felt the same frustration when I heard the hon. Member for Watford loyally follow his line.

The problem is a lack of honesty in the debate about Europe. We are not treated as adults. The Foreign Secretary and the hon. Member for Watford sought to escape behind statements about the current legal position on what measures can be imposed on the United Kingdom. We heard a terrific analysis from my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis), with his experience as a former Minister for Europe, of how the United Kingdom, under a Conservative Government who were prepared to be isolated in Europe—to some extent they had to make a virtue of it after 18 years in government—was out-manoeuvred. Changes were made so that policies were decided by qualified majority voting, and we no longer had a veto. Judgments of the European Court of Justice went against the United Kingdom. The court referred to the introduction to the treaty of Rome, and said that it had made its judgment in the interests of integration.

It is frustrating to hear the Foreign Secretary hide behind the current legal position, when the tide of opinion about the future development of the European Union will overwhelm that legal position in the near or medium-term future. The logic of the Government's position on negotiation leaves them even weaker. We were dug out of our position after years of having to battle against changes to the rules. There was disappointment in the Conservative party because of the bad faith shown by the European Union when it changed the rules on which decisions were based.

The Government's problem is that they are committed to the language of constructive and positive engagement in Europe. However, 18 months after coming into office, they are already talking the language of isolation on tax harmonisation.

I object to the conduct of the European debate. This morning, I listened to the Chancellor of the Exchequer talking about the social chapter. He said, "We were told the social chapter would lose us 500,000 jobs. Well, that hasn't happened, so it is all right." That is a trite way of dealing with the issue. The social chapter is a mechanism for the introduction of social regulation in the future. We have no idea what laws, regulations and directives will be introduced through the social chapter in the years to come, because we have given away the UK's capacity to prevent their introduction.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is slugging it out in Europe and trying to find a suitable compromise, so that he can avoid using the veto to prevent the introduction of measures that we do not like. That is precisely the position that the Conservative Government were in on other areas of policy. We have a hideous sense of deja vu. We watched the Government approach Europe with enthusiasm in 1997, but 18 months later we see that their attitudes have started to change as they come face to face with the problem of defending our national interests and the natural British position, which is the same whether under a Labour or a Conservative Government. Their language is beginning to change.

The British Government put at the top of their list of priorities the timetable for enlargement. The Foreign Secretary joined the Foreign Ministers of the applicant countries. He was the only senior Foreign Minister at that meeting. He did not find time to join his colleagues in the European Union at the first Foreign Ministers' meeting under the Austrian presidency—but never mind. That shows where the British Government's priority lies. The Government have supposedly created credibility, but under the British and the Austrian presidency the date for enlargement has changed—from 2003, which Commission officials were talking about, to 2005. In private, Austrian politicians say that it will be 2015 before enlargement takes place. The Polish President has accused the European Union of bad faith and of creating myths to prevent Polish entry to the EU. In Britain, enlargement—widening the European Union—is our main interest but we are seeing it disappear over the horizon. The timetable seems to have slipped by almost exactly five years.

[Mr. Crispin Blunt]

Earlier, I asked the Foreign Secretary whether he agreed with Hans Tietmeyer about the inevitability of taxation as a method of control in Europe following the introduction of a single currency. The Foreign Secretary said that he disagreed with Hans Tietmeyer, but who are we to believe? Are we to believe a central banker who has been in the finance business throughout his career—a distinguished career—or are we to accept the judgment of a Foreign Secretary who, like his party, has flip-flopped over the issue of European Union membership throughout his own career? The Foreign Secretary, at this stage in his career, is trying to bring about a wave of Euro-enthusiasm, but I predict that the position may well change if the Government fail to engage in economic and monetary union, as its consequences become increasingly apparent.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich delivered an amusing aside about the way in which socialist European documents had been drafted. There is an example in "The European Way". We now see that the British Government are trying to interpret matters in a certain way. There is reference to further measures to be taken to "avoid harmful tax competition". The Prime Minister has told us that tax competition is terrific, because it drives taxes down, and encourages tax regimes in the European Union to compete with each other. However, I understand that Mr. Lafontaine and Mr. Strauss-Kahn think that tax competition is harmful, and that tax harmonisation is required for that reason. Let us see who will win the argument.

The Government know perfectly well in what direction the European Union is heading. They cannot and should not pretend that the legal position as provided by the treaties will not change in the years to come. We have seen the result of their attitude. Already, after 18 months, they are isolated from their main socialist partners in Europe. They are having to rely on the conservative party in Spain to be an ally, and to try to protect the British interest.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden said that it was worth paying the price for Britain to have a key role in Europe, enabling it to pull the Europeans back from the brink and to act as a control, vetoing further changes in the European Union. My right hon. Friend has an appetite for a scrap. Perhaps he envisages becoming Minister for Europe again, and having to take part in the process. That would, of course, be in the interests of the United Kingdom.

According to my observations of Britain's role in the European Union, the problem is about the price that we will pay—isolation—for trying to defend the British interest. Another price that we will pay is the reputation that we have won among our partners. We have always been seen as the "drag anchor", but that will no longer be worth the candle. We must ask whether we want to continue with the current process, or to lift the drag anchor, go full tilt into Europe and become positive contributors to Europe in an honest way, accepting the implications for the politics of the nation state. If we do that, we shall have to accept that there will be a new polity at the European level, and that we should think about building democratic European institutions around the euro. That is the choice that we face, but the Government are still not facing it.

9.3 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York): I welcome the debate. I recognise that the European Union now permeates every aspect of domestic as well as foreign policy. I have a particular interest in transport, and I note that the Amsterdam treaty will extend co-decisions to transport matters. There will be exceptions in regard to competition rules and negotiations with third countries. Can the Minister explain the Government's position on state aid? Will the Government press for the ending of any further state aid, especially for airlines—Air France, Iberia, Olympic Airways and a catalogue of other carriers that continue to enjoy state aid?

Ports also enjoy state funding in certain member countries. Horticulture even makes possible the provision of cheap energy, particularly in one member state. Pork production is currently enjoying a subsidy in France and Germany. Government intervention would be very welcome.

The highlight of 1999 will be the revision of structural funds, and the balancing of those receiving such funds with applicant countries. It is generally agreed that the population level in respect of receipt of structural funds will be lowered. The impact on the United Kingdom and, particularly, on my constituency will be substantial. The Vale of York enjoys farm subsidies on a generous scale, Konver funding to train those with defence industry skills for civilian employment, 5b funding for poor farming areas in the hills and general training funds under objective 3.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) struck a chord. Not only will his area suffer job losses through the loss in the defence industry; other areas, such as Chelmsford, will suffer heavy loss as well.

The objectives are being reduced from 7 to 3 and the Community initiatives such as Konver are set to disappear, but it is not clear what will replace them. I am a little concerned that responsibility for the negotiations is being shared between two Departments: the Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. We need to ensure a co-ordinated approach in those negotiations.

The length of the transitional period for the various programmes is not yet clear. Whether other member states will agree to set key criteria as a percentage of gross domestic product, rather than just unemployment, which would penalise us, is not yet known. Some guidance on those negotiations would be helpful.

The Department of Trade and Industry is minded to identify "pockets of rural deprivation". Again, it would be helpful to have more details. I accept that we are in the middle of a farming crisis that is unprecedented in my lifetime, affecting every sector of farming. The loss of income from subsidies will be compensated for by direct payments to farmers under common agricultural policy reform, where appropriate, and by compensation for environmentally friendly schemes.

Rural development is a theme that will loom large, bearing in mind the impact that the farming community has on the whole rural economy, including contributing to market towns and local prosperity. I hope that, in their regulations, the Government will bear in mind the impact that the reform of CAP and structural funds will have on areas such as North Yorkshire. Traditionally, farming in that area attracts low incomes, increasing the difficulty of finding homes for farm workers; they also face travelling further to work.

Agenda 2000 is a top priority for 1999. With the agreement of our European partners, the Government have set a deadline of March. I am sure that the Minister will appreciate that the European Parliament has agreed First Reading and, as the Commission refused to support a number of key amendments, the reports have been referred back to the relevant committee. The European Parliament will find it hard to meet the March 1999 deadline.

Clearly, that timetable has implications for the timetable for enlargement. I welcome moves towards enlargement, particularly for the former communist countries and Baltic states. Earlier in the week, I raised the threat of higher duties on pork with the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office. I wonder whether she has had time to examine that matter and to find out whether it is true that the Czechs, Poles and Hungarians are threatening to break the Europe agreement. That would be worrying. I hope that the Government will do everything in their power to prevent such a move.

A particular interest of mine and, I am sure, of many others is duty on wines, beers and spirits. Duty-paid goods and their import for other than private, individual use is becoming a huge embarrassment to the Government. Bootlegging not only denies the Treasury of income, but damages the trade and employment opportunities of our wine merchants, brewers and distillers. That is unacceptable.

Rather than increase the number of Customs and Excise agents to apprehend culprits, it would be far better to lower the duty that is paid in this country and to raise the level of tax earned in that way. Better still, does the Minister think that she can persuade her European partners such as France, Spain, Belgium and Greece to raise the duty charged on their home-produced wines, beers and spirits? So much for tax harmonisation.

Duty free sales are scheduled to stop on 30 June 1999. Mario Monti, the commissioner responsible, claims that duty free sales have no future in a single market. I entirely agree—if the single market were complete, there would be no place for duty free sales.

When there is no harmonised rate of tax and duty charged, nor any prospect of harmonisation, with rates varying from 3 per cent. in one country to 33 per cent. in another, there are strong grounds for a reprieve, allowing duty free sales to continue for the foreseeable future. The outlook in that regard is bleak. The Commission has announced that the present rules on duty free will apply to duty free sales after 1 July 1999, leading to the bizarre situation of a bottle of whisky attracting different prices on the same route from, say, London to Corfu, depending on which country's airspace the plane is flying in and on the duty charged in that airspace. That is nonsense and I hope that the Government will help to deal with it.

The European Union continues to hold many challenges for the Government and for our relationship with our EU partners. There is real scope for tax harmonisation, which the Foreign Secretary assured us would normally be within the national remit alone. I believe that the scope lies in social security taxation. The extremely high rate charged in some EU countries amounts to a tax on jobs. If our partners really wanted to create an employment strategy for Europe, they would amend their social security provisions. Businesses, not Governments, create jobs, but Governments do tempt businesses to create more jobs by lowering social costs. I urge them to do so.

The Vienna summit will address a number of those issues, including employment guidelines, the financial perspective and trans-European networks. I hope that the Government can rise to and meet the challenge.

9.11 pm

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): I want to make just two points in what is unremarkably—those of us who have attended many of these debates know the familiar pattern—a very thinly attended House. That is despite the fact that what we are debating is probably the most important issue to face this country, not just at present but for 300-odd years. Such is the nature of parliamentary democracy.

I want to comment on the character of the debate and the character of the Government in relation to the debate. The Government pride themselves on being modern. That is probably the single greatest thing on which they pride themselves. Yet, in an odd way, in this, the most important of all the debates facing the Government in the coming years, they are very ancient rather than very modern. They are out of date, not with the trend. That is because, unlike most hon. Members who have contributed to the debate—probably in private and unknown to the greater public—the Government have failed to recognise the fact that, as has been alluded to by many of my hon. Friends and many Labour Members who have now departed, we are on the verge of a United States of Europe.

That is not something that the Government will be able to stop. They can decide whether or not to be part of it, or rather, they can put that choice to the British people, but they cannot stop our partners moving in that direction. It would be a vain attempt and the Government will not make it. The Government are old fashioned in attempting to deny that that is the fact. It is also dishonest to attempt to deny that, but I shall dwell on it less because it is not an attack that would carry much weight. However, the fact of being old fashioned may, conceivably, strike a chord in the mind of some Ministers.

That is not my main point. I want to move the debate on a stage. I am bored with the period of prophecy. The period of prophecy is over. We know the facts and we know what is happening. We have a decision to make. The remarkable thing is that, because for so long—I regret that this has occurred within my party and firmly betwixt my party and others—we have debated the question of prophecy, we have forgotten to debate what decision we want to make. As one of my hon. Friends pointed out, the rhythm of the dialectic has been that we start by hearing that something will never happen and that it will be resisted to the ultimate, and then we hear that it is inevitable. In that rhythm of dialectic, there is no discussion of whether it is a good or bad thing. As a nation, that is what we now have to face. We have to confront the question to which we were brought face to face by my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt), which is whether we think that the United States of Europe is something to which we want to belong.

[Mr. Oliver Letwin]

I do not suppose that, in seven minutes, I can give the final answer to that question, but I hope that I might prod those few hon. Members in the Chamber, and those perhaps two or three recondite journalists who occasionally read our debates in their spare evening hours, into thinking about their response to the question. It is a poor outlook for the country if we do not have a response. It is a very poor prospect for the United Kingdom if those engaged in the debate in Parliament have not yet even begun to consider the question—which way the decision should be made—and no arguments are heard from either side of the House.

For myself, having thought about the matter a good deal—although not well enough yet—there are really two strands of argument that persuade me one way rather than the other in deciding whether we should want to join the United States of Europe, which will come about. The first is a negative type of argument, and the second is a positive one. The negative type of argument is that I think that there is something characteristically weak about the case for a United States of Europe. I do not mean there is not a case; there manifestly is a case. We have to face that fact.

There is a vision, which can best be described as a geopolitical vision of a world consisting of large players who rule the roost and of tiny players who are caught in forces that they cannot control. I hope that the Minister will forgive me if I describe that as the Chatham house or Foreign Office version. It has been the doctrine of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for, roughly speaking, 400 years, and of its predecessors.

Mr. David Heath: The Cecils.

Mr. Letwin: Indeed, of every Cecil—the vision goes back a very long way in our history. Palmerston was perhaps its greatest exponent, but it is a very long-running theme.

The theory and reality of the United States of Europe are based on the vision, and that theory and reality are meant to convey to Europe its ability to be a great power—with the United States, possibly Japan, probably China, and, militarily, Russia. The case for being part of the United States of Europe is characteristically weak for a reason—which obviously needs vastly more expansion than I can give it today, and perhaps than I am capable of giving it—that perhaps resides in the strange historical fact that there is no evidence whatsoever that the citizens inhabiting great powers have led more pleasant, more fulfilled, culturally richer or economically more prosperous lives than citizens inhabiting very tiny powers.

Today and for most of my adult life, Switzerland has had the highest per capita gross domestic product, the strongest social cohesion and the greatest stability. It is a very tiny power, and almost gave up being a power at all. It is not a unique example; on the contrary. Throughout history and around the world, there have been large powers of which it has been unpleasant to be a citizen and small powers of which it has been pleasant to be one, and vice versa. I do not think that there is any evidence that being part of a great power or a small power is material to how its citizens live.

I do not personally—others may differ—buy the thesis that the fact that there will be a great power means that it will be to the advantage of the citizens of a small power to join it. Therefore, I think that the geopolitical argument—which is meant to be the positive argument for joining the United States of Europe—is weak.I do not think that, by itself, that would be enough to decide to answer in the negative, because there is also a positive strand.

I should characterise the positive case as one of risk. The question that we have to ask ourselves as we face the choice of whether to obliterate the United Kingdom and absorb it within a United States of Europe is: what will be the character of the United States of Europe? Like other hon. Members, I do not have a crystal ball and cannot say for sure whether the United States of Europe will be a flourishing great power, beneficial to its citizens. However, there is a risk—I put it no higher than that; it is extremely important not to overstate it—and it is difficult for other people to challenge the existence of that risk. I describe it as the risk of the United States of Europe becoming an Ottoman empire.

There are three parts to that; I do not have time to elaborate them. The first is an institutional risk. Those who have the vision must admit that the United States of Europe will be created against the background of institutions that are at best immature. They will have some difficulty establishing themselves with the democratic legitimacy and universal acceptance that is required of a stable Government.

Secondly there are cultural problems. I do not rate them too highly. I am not saying that people of different cultures cannot get on in a single state. Belgium proves that they can, as do Switzerland and the United States. However, it is difficult. It is more difficult when the political, legal and other cultures are particularly rich and strong. The great glory of Europe is that the individual cultures of the nation states are stronger and richer than those in any other part of the world. That creates a particular difficulty in forging a United States of Europe.

Thirdly, there are economic and social risks, many of which have been mentioned this evening, including the creation of what one of my hon. Friends called an economic hot spot problem. I doubt that anyone can honestly deny that there is a danger that in the course of forging a United States of Europe, it would be difficult to produce sufficient economic and social homogeneity—or, in the jargon, cohesion—to avoid severe tension.

Because my argument is very weak, it seems to me the stronger. On those three grounds of institutional immaturity, real and profound cultural difference and serious economic tension, there is a risk that a United States of Europe would turn into an Ottoman empire rather than a successful parallel of the United States of America. I accept that some might think that unlikely, but I wonder whether even the Minister, who, we hear, is a great proponent, can argue that there is no risk. If there is a risk, we, the citizens of the state that beyond all other states has delivered to its citizens across hundreds of years economic, social and cultural stability and freedom under the rule of law, must ask: if the positive case for the United States of Europe from the point of view of the effect of the geopolitical argument on its citizens is weak, why take the risk? We ought to have the courage to admit that we face a question of whether to become part of a United States of Europe by sublimating and obliterating the United Kingdom. I am persuaded that we should not.

I do not mind which way people feel about the decision. I want us to stop debating as if there were a question of prophesy left to us and start the real debate, which is about that decision.

9.23 pm

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs): This country will have to face reality in the next 15 months. There is a practical issue of a common European withholding tax. Europe desperately needs that from its own perspective. People do not pay tax on some interest. There is a need for a new source of taxation for transfer payments, which will need to be increased with a single currency.

This country's interests are clear. Harold Wilson and Governor Richardson of the Bank of England spotted that the interest equalisation tax in New York was driving away international deposits, enabling them to be taken in London. That prompted the growth of the European markets and the recovery of London as an international financial centre over the past 30 years.

The issue is not just about bonds, but about deposit taking, foreign exchange dealing, derivatives and all that goes with being the world's leading international banking centre. If a withholding tax is stopped, all that business will go to New York and Hong Kong. That is not a small matter. At least 100,000 of 600,000 jobs are at risk, and 3 or 4 per cent. of gross national product and 6 per cent. of our total exports are involved.

The Prime Minister has pledged to veto the proposal, but Europe has made it clear—rightly, from its perspective—that Britain is being arrogant. Europe wants the proposal to be implemented. I believe that the issue will boil over next year. Europe will not allow us to use our veto to stop its first major tax harmonisation programme. It will, as Schröder has warned, move to end the power of veto for individual countries. The reality will hit the hypocritical nonsense of pretending that Europe will do whatever we want it to in our interests.

9.26 pm

Mr. Michael Trend (Windsor): The Foreign Secretary patronisingly urged us all to behave like adults. That was as uncalled for as it was discourteous. We have heard many excellent speeches this evening. My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) has just made a brief but cogently argued point about the withholding tax, and the various speeches from hon. Members on both sides of the House have shown a that a great deal of thought is being given to the European question.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) kept his eye on the rhythm of dialectic and the big questions that may one day be asked about the European Union. My hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), in a characteristically ebullient contribution, rightly said that if others want to create a supranational state, that is their business. At the moment, the evidence is strong that that is the direction in which many senior politicians in Europe want to go.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) also spoke on that theme. He described the overwhelming tide that is sweeping through the European argument, leading member states to ever closer integration. My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) has a different experience of the European Union from that of the rest of Conservative Members. She made an important and detailed speech, raising a number of questions that I am sure the Minister will want to follow up.

Especially welcome was the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis). He spoke from his experience in government of the difficult realities of negotiating in the European Union. The Government are now learning about those hard realities at first hand.

The contributions from Labour Members were 50:50. Of the four speeches, two were on message—one of them alarmingly so—whereas the other two expressed anxieties about the Government's position, although for different reasons: at least I think that they were different reasons. The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) was right to say that we should explain the implications of where the European Union is going. We shall soon have that opportunity; in the referendum on the single currency, we shall be able to put the case to the country, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset also said.

At the start of the debate, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) made a most telling contribution. He characterised the Government's position as one that faced in two directions at the same time—one for our European partners and the other for the domestic market. We have heard much this evening about the yawning gulf between the Government's rhetoric at home and what they endorse abroad.

We have heard how the Government are getting into difficulties on both fronts. They draw up carefully crafted positions but, especially on tax harmonisation, their proposals are being rejected both at home and abroad. Oskar Lafontaine will not put up with the British Government trying to have it both ways any more than will the Conservative party, the British press or the British public.

The Labour party hopes that the phrases in the Party of European Socialists' beloved document, "The New European Way", will also strike its different audiences—the left-of-centre Governments in Europe and the voters at home—differently. However, that did not seem to please the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson), for curious reasons entirely of his own. Many hon. Members have spoken about tax harmonisation, and it would be tedious and unnecessary to go over the issue again.

I have enjoyed one particular moment in the last few days, which makes the point, raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate, that there is a great sense of deja vu about the Government's position. I had a fantasy—I do not pretend that it is the truth—about the scene in the Foreign Office yesterday. Ministers and their civil servants were trying to decide what to do after the Chancellor had come back, having been mugged at ECOFIN. How best were they to give the impression that the Foreign Office was not trying to lie low—although, of course, that was what it was trying to do?

No. 10, meanwhile, had been rampaging around the Government system, getting the line straight for Prime Minister's questions. A false move at the Foreign Office would spell disaster for somebody's career. "Shall we send the Foreign Secretary?" "No, Minister." "Should it be a Minister of State, or another Front Bencher?" "No, Minister." "What shall we do?" "I know, Minister" said an experienced civil servant. "Let us send the Parliamentary Private Secretary." So it was that the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane)—I told him I was going to mention him—found himself on the radio yesterday, defending the Government single-handedly. No Minister was available, according to the rather sinister announcement.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Ms Joyce Quin): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Trend: May I finish my fantasy? The hon. Member for Rotherham did his job very well. He read the headlines from the German newspapers—to, I suspect, a rather bemused audience—and seemed to suggest that the whole sorry business had been got up as a scare story by the British press. Various other Labour Members have suggested that. He seemed to say that they did these things better in Germany. He has a very promising career. However, the point of sending Parliamentary Private Secretaries is that they can sink or swim on their own without damaging the Government's reputation—although they may do tremendous damage to their own. However, the hon. Gentleman acquitted himself, and I hope his career is progressing nicely.

Ms Quin: I was interested to listen to the hon. Gentleman's fantasy—but it was just fantasy. If he had listened to other interviews yesterday, he would have heard me and other Ministers being interviewed. Sadly, a lot of my weekends seem to be disrupted by interviews on tax harmonisation and other European issues.

Mr. Trend: I have no reason to doubt the Minister, but I thought it curious that, a few hours before Prime Minister's questions, no Minister was available on the BBC lunchtime news on Radio 4. I may be wrong about those things.

The hon. Member for Rotherham, in a spirited interview, suggested that they do these things better on the continent. The evidence of the past six months does not suggest that. The informal summit was billed as an opportunity to debate subsidiarity—it had been prepared for months as a chance to investigate that subject closely. Only a few months ago, it was thought that the question of how to close the ever-growing gulf between the politicians and peoples of Europe was a matter of central importance.

The Foreign Secretary—like other senior European politicians—still airs the language of subsidiarity. He told us today that he was anxious that decisions should be taken as close as possible to the citizen, and we agree. However, what does that mean in practice? When the Foreign Secretary spoke to the Select Committee, it turned out to mean, mainly, a proposal for next year's vision statement for the European Union. If one has no plans for action, I suppose a vision statement will have to do.

Despite the continued use of such language, something fundamental has changed in the past few months. The Euro-land Governments—especially after the general elections—picked up a new confidence. They could see that the euro would definitely be launched in 1999—that business was over, at least for the moment. The voices saying that it was best now to address the other side of the precarious balance between Governments and the governed were swept aside. Jacques Santer's carefully crafted—and good—paper was put back in the filing cabinet.

Governments surged ahead with their next business. There has been greatly increased pressure in the past few weeks for further and quicker integration in taxation, employment, social affairs, internal policies, foreign policy, immigration and asylum policies. In recent weeks, I have talked to lots of senior European politicians—some of whom I have known for a considerable time. Many are, for the first time, saying in public what they actually believe.

I was told that subsidiarity and accountability would have to wait, as they were yesterday's arguments. The vital principles that we believe should be the very foundation of the European Union are being passed over by the architects of a much more tightly integrated Union.

Does anyone now seriously believe that the architects of the new Europe are building their ever more ambitious edifice on the secure foundations of popular understanding and consent? No. Bigger, not better, government is the order of the day and of tomorrow.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reigate spoke very well on enlargement. Great progress was hoped for on enlargement, and of course the Minister will tell us of meetings attended and timetables agreed to, but nobody involved in the application process believes any of that. With attention now so focused on deeper integration, European Union enlargement is being seriously delayed. European Commission officials were reported in The Guardian to be stating in private that the target date for the first wave of enlargement was slipping to after 2005.

One senior politician said to me, "The European Union has been holding out a carrot to us: we begin to move towards it and get close, but then we find that it has moved it on ahead of us again. How can we ever catch up if these are the rules of the game?"

The Foreign Secretary told the House in June that the speed at which applicant countries enter the European Union now depends entirely on the urgency with which they make the necessary reforms. That is not the view that is taken in Poland, the Czech Republic or Hungary. The amount of legislation that they, and especially Poland, have passed—hundreds of laws—beggars belief, but no amount of new laws will catch up with a European Union determined to make new, far-reaching legislation of its own.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe said, the Government did not do the House the courtesy of telling us what had been discussed and agreed at the recent informal summit. A few days after it, however, I was again in continental Europe and met many people who were less retiring. They were happy enough to tell me what the Prime Minister had said. Their impression was that he meant that there had been a true reversal of the British position on defence. Some, I am afraid, cynically thought that that was because he was unable any longer to gain the limelight on economic matters, but others genuinely believed that there had been a fundamental shift in the British position.

Was that impression correct? Back at Westminster, Conservative Members asked the simple questions that we can ask in the ways that the House allows, and it soon became apparent that the Government were in a glorious muddle. The Secretary of State for Defence recently tried hard to explain at the Dispatch Box—I am charitably assuming that he had something coherent to explain—the complex theology that his officials had kindly developed to try to bring the Government's two faces on the matter back into better focus.

It is no longer possible for the Government to say one thing on the continent and another here and pretend that they can keep the House out of the process. The Government are going to Vienna in a muddle of their own making. There is a muddle on taxation, on defence, on enlargement, on reform of the European Union institutions, on internal matters, on subsidiarity and on accountability.

If the Foreign Secretary hopes that other left-of-centre European politicians will provide him with a welcome break from his problems back home, let me remind him once more of what his Euro-allies have been saying recently.

The German Chancellor expressed support for an "ever-integrated Europe". The German Foreign Minister said that turning the EU into an entity under international law, with a common constitution, was "the decisive task of our time".

Our friend Oskar Lafontaine said:

"It is necessary to harmonise tax policy" and the Austrian Finance Minister agreed. He said:

"The single currency will speed up the need for tax harmonisation."

On the veto, good old Oskar was unequivocal. He said:

"I believe the unanimity rule cannot be maintained."

The French Finance Minister said:

"Either you want fiscal harmonisation or you don't. These are all matters that should be subject to majority voting."

The German Foreign Minister said:

"If it is going to turn into a full union, then one day foreign and defence policy will also have to become community tasks."

We are told that sometimes those statesmen speak for themselves and sometimes for their Governments, but that is spin doctor nonsense. They are speaking their minds and we should note carefully what is in their minds, because their views expressed today—on the record or off the record, officially or unofficially—will surely appear on tomorrow's agenda.

The coming summit will be difficult for Britain. The Government should say more clearly where they stand on all the issues raised in the debate, because it is becoming increasingly clear that an agenda is emerging to which no British Government could subscribe. No amount of warm words about being at the heart of Europe, or boasting about playing it tough in the Councils of Europe, will work much longer. The electorate are getting wise to the Government's two faces. In the end, it is results that count.

In one way, I sympathise with the Government. Some press commentators have said that this Government's position is as bad as that of the previous Government. There is something in that, but there is also one big difference. The Conservatives tortured themselves on European policy, but they did so on matters of principle. This Government have made their muddle not on the firm rock of principle, but on the shifting sands of propaganda and presentation. The big trouble with looking both ways at once is that, sooner or later, one fails to look in either direction with a steady eye and the inevitable accident occurs.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Ms Joyce Quin): This is the first debate of this kind that I have taken part in since becoming a Minister in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. However, I count myself as a veteran—perhaps happily, perhaps unhappily—of these debates, having taken part in many while in opposition, from the Back Benches and the Front Bench. One common aspect of the debates—not surprisingly, given the many issues with a European dimension—is that they are always wide ranging.

I begin with an apology on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary who is not able to be in his place for the winding-up speeches because he has left to attend the British-French summit at St. Malo, which I shall also attend later. At that summit, many of the issues that have exercised hon. Members on both sides of the House today will be raised.

Many of the speeches in the debate contained effective calls for an informed debate on European issues and I echo those calls. Many of my hon. Friends, especially my hon. Friends the Members for Dunfermline, West (Ms Squire) and for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson), made the point about accurate information very tellingly. I join with those who have deplored the hysteria that has disfigured the debate about Europe, especially in the past few weeks, with irresponsible scare stories that alarm people unnecessarily. That does not do the people or democracy a service.

We want a debate in which people have access to information and we have a duty, which we take seriously, through our parliamentary proceedings to try to have as much discussion as possible on the issues. The speech by the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) fuelled many of the scare stories, instead of considering them realistically and damping them down. I was surprised, if not astonished, when the right hon. and learned Gentleman was revealed as an arch-federalist of yesteryear in the extraordinary quotation from the magazine Crossbow in which he called for a united European defence policy. That was fascinating, and I have now been given the article so I will be able to read it from beginning to end.

One purpose of our debate is to review developments as we prepare for the European summit in Vienna. I hope that hon. Members will find it useful if I outline some of the topics that are likely to be raised on which we hope to make progress. A principal issue is Agenda 2000, on which the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) spoke in detail and about which she asked me many detailed questions. I am happy to respond to some of those questions, but if I answered them all, I could deal only with her speech, and not with those of other hon. Members. Even then, I probably would not have enough time. I am happy to write to the hon. Lady if she feels that I have not dealt with any of her questions.

Some of the issues that the hon. Lady raised can, as she will know, be more appropriately dealt with by ministerial colleagues who attend specialist councils. One of the down sides of being Minister for Europe is that I tend to be asked about every policy under the sun from wide-ranging issues about the future of Europe to the marketing of aubergines in the French Antilles. It is sometimes something of a challenge to answer all those points.

Agenda 2000 is an important package of issues that the EU must confront if it is to move the process of enlargement forward. The issues involved include the budget, agriculture and the structural funds. Much common ground has been established, particularly on structural funds and on the problems that should be addressed by objective 1, objective 2 and so on funding. None the less, a lot of work remains to be done, both on future EU financing and on common agricultural policy reform. Many comments have been made about the new German Government, but no one has said that that Government, much more than their predecessor, share our ideas on CAP reform. We hope to make important progress on that reform through the Agenda 2000 proposals.

As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary pointed out, although the Commission's proposals on agriculture do not go as far as we would like, they would reduce support prices for a variety of products and would mean real gains for our consumers. My right hon. Friend quoted revealing figures on that. We believe that the Commission's proposals would allow us to work with like-minded Governments to increase pressure to make such reforms even better in future.

Many hon. Members have referred to the timetable of the Agenda 2000 negotiations. I agree that it is important to respect that timetable, particularly if we are to make a success of early enlargement. The hon. Member for Vale of York spoke of the European Parliament's deliberations on the timetable. There is some concern that the Parliament may not meet the deadline, as well as concern that the Council of Ministers might not. I urge the hon. Lady to try to pressure her colleagues in the European Parliament. If agreement is not reached in the present Parliament, we risk considerable delay because of the coming elections and the subsequent need for the Parliament to appoint new officers and set up new committees and procedures.

The hon. Lady expressed concern about the future of structural funds in her own part of the country, and she will know that delay to the timetable, with resulting delays in budgetary decisions, could affect structural fund allocations to areas in which many hon. Members on both sides of the House have an interest. Self interest gives us a strong reason to respect the timetable.

Many hon. Members referred to the importance of enlargement and I certainly strongly endorse those comments. However, I must point out to those on the Opposition Front Bench that, far from any weakening of our commitment, we are as firm a supporter of enlargement as ever. We were proud to support and launch the enlargement process during our presidency.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) urged us to be inclusive in our approach, and we most certainly are. We believe that the countries involved need to be treated on their merits. Some of them have made dramatic progress, as has been pointed out, and that must be fully recognised.

Mr. Letwin: In that case, will the Minister confirm—as one of her colleagues, the Financial Secretary, did not do so in the European Standing Committee—that the Government will oppose the Commission's proposal that countries should have to enter both stage 1 and stage 2 of European monetary union before they can accede?

Ms Quin: Those are issues to be discussed with the applicant countries. I will certainly not lay down rules in advance of the accession negotiations. Indeed, I know from speaking to Ministers in the applicant countries that different countries view those issues differently.

We need to ensure that the European Union is in a good position to welcome those new countries. I think that it was my hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon (Mr. Casale) who strongly argued that, although we are understandably asking applicants to accept many of the rules and arrangements that exist within the EU, at the same time we have a responsibility to organise ourselves to become more enlargement friendly.

One aspect of Agenda 2000 and the Commission's proposals that greatly concerns me and on which we are arguing against the Commission line, is that farmers in the new member countries should receive much less favourable compensation than those within existing EU countries. We have argued for compensation to existing farmers to be reduced progressively, so that we do not create such a two-tier system, which would unfairly discriminate against applicant countries.

Despite some of the claims made tonight about our rolling over and agreeing with everything that is put forward in Europe, I can assure the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) and his hon. Friends that that is simply not the case. We are putting forward strong and distinctive views on many of the issues in the Agenda 2000 timetable. In no way are we simply sitting back and accepting what others propose.

If enlargement is to be inclusive, it also means that it should not create new boundaries further east. Referring to a point made by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, the European Union has a clear responsibility to look outwards. There are debates within the EU, and there are protectionist and anti-protectionist forces. We want to ensure that the EU operates openly, so that it helps the economic reform and progress that is being made in countries further east, as well as helping developing countries in the world market, particularly in the agricultural sector.

Mr. Flight: Is there any support from our fellow members of the EU for the position that the right hon. Lady has described on Agenda 2000 and enlargement?

Ms Quin: Yes, indeed. The pattern is mixed on the issues that I described, but a variety of members support our position and we have received support from the Commission itself on many of the agricultural issues. I do not feel at all defeatist as regards the issues that we are discussing, nor do I recognise the description of Britain's position or of Ministers' meetings that has been offered by some Members, in particular those on the Opposition Benches. On most issues, we find ourselves working in partnership with our colleagues, not in isolation. There are issues on which decisions must be made by unanimity where it is theoretically possible to become isolated and end up voting against the rest. However, in practice, in the meetings that I have attended as a Foreign Office Minister acting as a Justice and Home Affairs Minister, in which almost all decisions are taken by unanimity, the pattern of agreement, support and alliances that we have been able to build up with our European Union partners is impressive.

Hon. Members referred to the importance of the European Union remaining firmly engaged with Russia, of doing what we can to support change there and of helping it in the immediate future. We have been trying to ascertain how much food aid and support is needed, although I must admit that we have been getting different versions of what those needs are. We also want to examine trading arrangements with Russia, and consider how EU programmes such as TACIS—technical aid to the Commonwealth of Independent States—can be refocused to make them more effective, especially in reshaping Russia's banking system and installing proper financial controls, the absence of which has caused many of its recent problems.

Mr. Letwin: I apologise for interrupting the Minister again—she has been exceptionally courteous. However, as one who has worked long and hard with TACIS, I have to tell her that, if she is suffering from the illusion that it will ever make the slightest difference to the Russian banking system, she really should talk to those who have worked on it, because there is not the slightest chance.

Ms Quin: I simply do not accept that, because I have been involved in discussions on how to take that work forward. However, I would not commend TACIS without reservations, because many British firms working within it have been frustrated by the slowness of procedures and the way in which payments are made. Those problems must be sorted out.

The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis), a former Minister for Europe, took the Government to task over various issues, saying that we had failed to achieve agreements with our partners. That struck me as odd coming the week after our success in the lifting of the beef ban. Some of what he presented as a complete failure, I would regard as a success, for example, our decision to sign the social chapter. It was always a matter of great regret to me that the Conservative Government refused to sign that or the social charter which preceded it, and were never prepared to make even a basic commitment to decent treatment for the people who work in the single European market.

Many hon. Members referred to tax harmonisation. I believe that the press articles of the past couple of weeks are scare stories, because nobody is proposing the harmonisation of income tax, which is one of the claims; nor is there a specific proposal to harmonise corporation tax. In the European Union, it is important not only to see what is happening within it, but to see the position of the European market within the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and in the wider world. One of my European counterparts told me of her worry that, if there were moves to harmonise tax within the European Union, we would take our eye off the ball—the position of the EU within the world market. My hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Ms Ward) referred to the need for us to be competitive in both the world market and the EU market. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made it clear that the UK will not support any action that will damage competitiveness, or our employment creation policies in the UK. That is extremely important.

The speech of the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) contained several references to "Corpus Juris". He said that he had read the treaty of Rome, but if he supplements his reading with the treaty of Amsterdam he will see that the articles—

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

ESTIMATES

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 145 (Liaison Committee),

That this House agrees with the Report [16th November] of the Liaison Committee.—[Mr. Hill.]

Question agreed to.

London, Tilbury and Southend Railway

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Hill.]

10 pm

Mr. John Cryer (Hornchurch): I thank Madam Speaker for choosing this subject for tonight's debate. The London, Tilbury and Southend line was chosen for debate before, but, along with other business, fell prior to the Queen's Speech. I also thank the Minister for her presence in the Chamber this evening.

My involvement with the London, Tilbury and Southend railway as a passenger pre-dates my election as a Member of Parliament. Although my remarks refer to the railway that runs from Fenchurch Street to Shoeburyness, I am concerned mainly with what is called the Tilbury loop, which runs through Rainham station in my constituency and through two stations, Dagenham Dock and Purfleet, in neighbouring constituencies.

Since my election—or shortly thereafter—I began to receive complaints from my Rainham constituents about service on the LTS line. People came to my surgeries and wrote to and telephoned me. I express my appreciation of the time and effort that my constituents have expended contacting me and attending meetings of the Rainham rail users group, which I helped to establish when, following an avalanche of complaints, it became clear that collective action was necessary. I expected about 20 or 30 people to attend the group's first meeting in September, but in fact there were probably 80 or 90. The mood of the meeting was so angry that, if an LTS Rail representative had been present, he or she would have had a pretty tough time.

I will give the House some idea of the feeling about LTS in my part of the country. An Essex radio station conducted a survey some time ago to discover the most unpopular man in Essex and east London. The managing director of LTS Rail, Ken Bird, finished second in that survey, pipped at the post by Saddam Hussein. That gives hon. Members some idea of how my constituents and, I suspect, people from neighbouring areas regard the LTS service.

That is hardly surprising in view of the correspondence that my constituents and I have received. In a letter last July, the managing director, Ken Bird, offered some fairly patronising comments. As part of an explanation as to why the service from Rainham is so poor, he wrote:

"We offer a walk-on, walk-off non-reservable system".

He concluded:

"It is now pleasing to be able to manage a retail venture that recognises that profit comes from giving customers what they want at a price they are willing to pay. We are not there yet, but give me another 18 months and judge us then."

People have been using LTS for three years since privatisation. It is fair to say that they have every right to judge the service now rather than waiting another 18 months. LTS has had quite enough time already. In any case, the Tilbury loop service, which runs through my constituency, has worsened since privatisation.

Many managers, including Ken Bird, ran the pre-privatisation British Rail service. They laid off many station staff before the sell-off and, after privatisation, took on low-paid security guards, whom I see regularly at Fenchurch Street checking tickets and giving directions. Just before privatisation British Rail spent £150 million on resignalling the line—an investment from which LTS clearly benefits.

A choice paragraph from one of the railway's leaflets states:

"LTS Rail has now employed a number of key staff in order to improve customer service and the station environment."

To many of my constituents, such comments are pure propaganda, especially when considered against the fact that the work force fell from 686 in 1995-96 to 657 in 1996-97. I am convinced that that has led to the cuts in the Tilbury service. There have been cancelled trains, frequent delays and the early closure of the booking office at Rainham and other stations. The company is not prepared to employ sufficient staff to run the line successfully.

I shall give the Minister an example. Two years ago there were six trains running between 8 and 9 am from Rainham to Fenchurch Street. There are now just three trains: the 8.12, the 8.27 and the 8.48. Like many trains since privatisation, the 8.48 has been reduced from eight coaches to four, leading to such overcrowding that I wrote to the Health and Safety Executive to find out whether it could do anything about the problem.

The HSE wrote back saying that overcrowding was not a danger in itself, but if there was an accident, as was the case in Clapham, an overcrowded train would be likely to result in many more injuries to the passengers than a train that was not overcrowded. Because most of the trains on the Tilbury loop are the old slam-door trains, there are no suitable handles for passengers to hang on to when they have to stand to travel to work and home again.

Last year LTS Rail failed in its obligation to run 98.5 per cent. of timetabled trains. It cancelled 1,500 trains, and 2,000 trains ran late. Nevertheless, Prism Rail, the parent company of LTS, has received a considerable amount of money from the taxpayers' pocket—not only the £150 million that went into resignalling, but £30 million from the franchising director in 1995–96, which will fall towards the end of the franchise in 2011 but is still a substantial sum. Passenger income for 1995-96 was £52 million and for 1996-97 it was £55 million. Revenue grant for the same years was £31 million and £24 million respectively. Large sums are going into LTS, but people are not seeing the benefits, and there is growing anger among my constituents.

I shall give some examples of constituents' experiences with LTS Rail. My hon. Friend is familiar with one case, about which I have corresponded with her. It involves a woman who was stranded at Barking late at night after a train broke down. Only five taxis were provided to get everyone home from a full train. The woman had to ring her mother to send a taxi to take her home at about 1 o'clock in the morning. My hon. Friend will recall that British Rail was obliged to get everybody to their destinations if a train broke down, using licensed taxis or buses. It seems from that case that LTS is not meeting its responsibilities.

Another constituent writes to me regularly about the problems on LTS. On 18 November she wrote detailing all the delays and problems that she had experienced during that month. On six days during the first half of November there were problems including late trains, cancelled trains and locked carriages, leading to ever greater overcrowding and so on.

A constituent writes regularly with the outstanding excuses used by LTS. The corker was the announcement that "the delayed 7.55 am will not stop at Rainham due to the train already being heavily overcrowded."

In fact, when the train came through the station it was almost empty and—this is the telling point—it got to Fenchurch Street on time. Perhaps that had something to do with the fact that it did not stop at Rainham station. It meant that the railway could fulfil its obligations under the regulatory framework.

There has been investment in the railway, but it has gone on the main line—most was by Railtrack—in rail renewal. There has been minimal investment on the Tilbury loop. Stations are miserable and often deserted because there are not enough staff. The railway is extremely badly run and there is no sign of investment in the pipeline.

The result is fear among my constituents that part of the Tilbury loop could be run down to the point where it might face closure. The three stations—Rainham, Dagenham Dock and Purfleet—are always cited when people come to me to express that fear. I met Ken Bird last week and he assured me that Rainham station would remain open. He pointed out that LTS was legally unable to close any stations or any section of line that it runs, because that is a matter for the franchising director.

I have written to the franchising director to ask for an assurance that those three stations and the rest of the line will remain open until the end of the current franchise, which is 2010-11. I look forward to receiving that assurance.

My view, which is not always shared by the Government, is that certain things are best run as publicly owned monopolies. The railway system is one area that should be publicly run, owned and accountable. People across the country have problems, some of which are worse than those experienced on LTS. If the enormous problems in Britain's rail network continue, my hon. Friend and other Ministers will have to think about that.

In the meantime, we must consider strengthening the regulatory framework to make sure, for instance, that LTS does not get away with the diminution in the service from Rainham to Fenchurch Street. LTS should have to provide the sort of service—or better service—than was provided before privatisation. We should return to the days when there were six trains between 8 o'clock and 9 o'clock in the morning from Rainham to Fenchurch Street, and those six trains should carry eight carriages.

The franchising director has allowed LTS to delay the introduction of new trains—despite all the money that is going from the taxpayer's pocket into LTS. The introduction of new trains to replace the old slam-door variety has been delayed by three years and they will not come into service until 2002. That is another example of the laxity of the regulatory framework, which is hardly surprising: it was introduced by the previous Government, who saw rail privatisation as a way of taking money out of the taxpayer's pocket and diverting it into the pockets of shareholders.

The great problem is that, in any privatisation—rail or any other—the people who run the railway ultimately have greater responsibility to shareholders than to anyone else. That is the crux of why there is such a system on LTS and on other railways.

The Minister for Transport in London (Ms Glenda Jackson): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Cryer) on securing the debate—twice. I also congratulate him on putting on the record so succinctly the concerns and the experiences—the bad experiences—of his constituents in respect of the service that they are receiving from the London, Tilbury and Southend railway.

The Government have made it clear that poor performance on our railways is unacceptable—it will not be tolerated. We expect train operators to run punctual and reliable services, and we expect Railtrack to meet its obligations to passengers, freight customers and taxpayers to maintain and develop the rail network in a manner that offers proper value for money.

Hon. Members—indeed the whole country—will be aware that all franchisees and Railtrack were summoned to a meeting last week with the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister of Transport and me. As a result of that meeting, an action plan has been agreed to tackle performance problems across our railway network. Measures agreed include 800 new train drivers, 500 new vehicles, a joint hit squad to examine, identify and tackle the worst 50 black spots on our network, and a national troubleshooter team to tackle punctuality problems. We shall also introduce a new national passenger survey to find out what passengers really think about their rail services, and to help measure performance across the network.

That action plan is only a first step to delivering short-term improvements for passengers. We expect to see progressive, year-on-year improvements from the industry starting over the next 12 months. Next February, there will be a wider-ranging national railway summit to examine how to tackle medium to longer-term performance problems.

My hon. Friend spoke specifically and succinctly of the difficulties on the London, Tilbury and Southend line. I hope that he will be interested in a stroll down memory lane. When I first entered the House, the LTS line was dubbed the misery line. Hon. Members from both sides related horror stories of their constituents' experiences on a service that was going not from bad to worse, but from worse to execrable. That was before rail privatisation, and shows the previous Administration's failure to invest adequately in our national railway system.

However, it would be quite wrong to pretend that performance on the LTS line has not improved since that time. Some would say that it was impossible for it to get worse, and as my hon. Friend has detailed, it is by no means perfect. Despite the fact that 96 per cent. of LTS trains have arrived within five minutes of their scheduled time—a statistic that I regret to say many other train operators cannot match—problems with the renewal of overhead line equipment has caused cancellations, and season ticket holders are receiving discounts as a result. As we all know, what passengers and season ticket holders want more than discounts is certainty that the train will be there when they arrive at the station, and that it will reach its destination at the designated time.

My hon. Friend referred to his constituent's particularly harrowing experience. He wrote to me on this issue, and I promised that I would raise it with the Association of Train Operating Companies, which I meet regularly. Last month, I reminded ATOC of the need for train operators to be mindful of their responsibility not to leave passengers stranded when services are disrupted. It is vital that train operators consider the personal security of their passengers during their whole journey, particularly at night, and, I would argue, even more particularly when the passenger is female.

Train operators are required to use all reasonable endeavours to deliver passengers to their destination station when services are disrupted. Although they are not formally obliged to do so, ATOC has assured me that train operators take passengers to their final destination when that is practicable or necessary for their personal security.

I raised this issue with the managing director of LTS, Mr. Bird, who said that he would speak directly to my hon. Friend. I trust that that is indeed what happened.

My hon. Friend expressed fears that there may be proposals to close the services that serve his constituency and what he referred to as the Tilbury loop. Services on the loop, as elsewhere on LTS, are protected by the passenger service requirement, which guarantees a minimum level of service.

I understand that, with the franchising director's agreement, LTS has rearranged the service pattern on the loop to increase frequency on the Ockendon branch, and to provide direct services to London. That has allowed LTS to run direct services to Chafford Hundred for the Lakeside shopping complex.

My hon. Friend referred to reductions in services on the line. I understand that the winter timetable has involved a cut of one train from both morning and afternoon peak times—a reduction from the summer timetable of, I believe, 12 to 11 trains in the morning and from 11 to 10 in the afternoon. I will, however, look into the specific issue that my hon. Friend raised.

Although I am pleased that more people are travelling by train, I accept that has resulted in serious overcrowding on certain London commuter services—certainly, as my hon. Friend pointed out, on LTS. All train operators have a general obligation to avoid excessive overcrowding, but more specific controls apply to London commuter services such as LTS at peak times.

Earlier this year, the franchising director required five London train operators to develop action plans to alleviate the serious overcrowding on their services. LTS has so far remained within the contractual limits set by the franchising director, but, like other operators, it has experienced an increase in passenger numbers over the last year. I expect the franchising director to ensure that, where network capacity allows, all operators of London commuter services take immediate action to reduce any severe overcrowding that may occur now or in the future.

We have made it clear that train operators' performance will be a key criterion when it comes to franchise renewal. Those who perform well will find that we are constructive partners. We are willing to renegotiate franchises, including franchise extensions, when that offers benefits to passengers and good value for money to the taxpayer; but our warning to train operators who perform poorly is simple and clear. Those who perform badly will not have a long-term future in the industry.

Last month, the franchising director announced a new package of benefits for LTS passengers. I was particularly pleased that it resulted from a voluntary renegotiation by the franchising director and Prism Rail of LTS's franchise plan commitments, rather than being recompense to passengers for poor performance. The package clearly signalled a commitment to responding to passengers' needs, and I hope that it was welcomed by them.

I accept that, as a result, some existing slam-door trains will not be replaced as soon as was originally agreed, although the majority will be replaced within a year with new trains already ordered by LTS. I know—and my hon. Friend raised the point this evening—that there is concern about the safety of older rolling stock. Slam-door rolling stock is not necessarily unsafe, but it has been criticised for its performance in certain types of accident. The Health and Safety Commission has recommended that all mark one stock should be withdrawn by 1 January 2003 unless it has been re-bodied or modified.

The new deal commits LTS to replacing its remaining slam-door stock progressively with modern sliding-door vehicles by the end of March 2002. Its fleet currently numbers 69 four-car units, of which 17 have sliding doors. By November 1999, 44 new four-car units will be in service, and by March 2002 a fleet of 72 four-car units will all have sliding doors.

The new deal offers a considerable package of additional benefits to LTS passengers to offset the delay in replacing the slam-door trains. LTS's passenger charter punctuality standard and trigger for season ticket discounts has been increased by 1 per cent., with immediate effect. Compensation for delays of 60 minutes or more has increased from 20 per cent. to 50 per cent. Contractual thresholds for cancellations and capacity have been tightened, so that enforcement action can be triggered at a lower level. Those thresholds will be further tightened in April 2000.

To help to meet the growing demand for commuter rail services into London, LTS has committed to extending its scheme for cheap early morning season tickets to more stations from May 1999, providing travel to Fenchurch Street at a discount of at least 20 per cent. A total of £2 million will be spent on service quality improvements, including real-time passenger information systems by the end of March 2000. A further £50,000 will be spent in each year until the end of the franchise on providing further staff coverage at stations. I hope that that fact affords some comfort to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch.

Other welcome benefits included improvements to facilities for disabled passengers, including disabled toilets and boarding ramps at all 11 of LTS' main stations. LTS will seek accreditation for all its stations under my Department's secure stations scheme, and similar accreditation for car parks at its stations. Improved cycle storage facilities have been promised at a further six stations.

The new deal committed LTS to improving transport integration between its services and other public transport services and commercial development, moving towards our vision of a railway that is integrated with other modes of transport and allows people to travel by public transport to the places that they want to reach. In particular, LTS has committed £700,000 to improving pedestrian access to the Lakeside shopping centre from Chafford Hundred station. It has committed to building further links with bus services in the local area. It will work with Great Eastern railway to develop season tickets between London and Southend that can be used on either train operators' services.

On our plans for the future of passenger rail services, renationalisation—not a word that my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch uttered, but it is clearly still his dream—of the railways would be very expensive and cannot be a priority given the other demands on public expenditure. Therefore, our task is to improve the railways as we find them, not as we wish them to be.

We will introduce a new strategic rail authority to provide a clear, coherent and strategic programme for the development of the railways. The SRA will provide a better means of influencing the use of the significant amounts of public funds that we provide to the industry, to the benefit of passengers and taxpayers.

The Loyal Address on 24 November has now given us the go-ahead to publish a draft Bill to introduce the necessary legislation to establish the SRA. Given the extraordinary events that are taking place down the corridor and the even more extraordinary events that are taking place in the official Opposition, legislation could come sooner, rather than later.

However soon we legislate, it will take at least 18 months to get the SRA up and running. That is why the Deputy Prime Minister announced at Blackpool the setting up of a shadow SRA. That will use existing organisations—the British Railways Board and Office of Passenger Rail Franchising—both of which will be under new leadership by next spring, when the new shadow authority will be up and running.

I acknowledge that not all the challenges that face the rail industry can be solved overnight. It is clear that, in many instances, the passenger and taxpayer are still not getting the best deal in the privatised railway; indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch gave us details of that fact. We are under no illusions about the scale of the challenge that we have set ourselves, but we are determined to work with the rail industry to achieve our goal.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Ten o'clock.

HEALTH

Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements he proposes to ensure compliance with the renegotiated Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme; and if he will make a statement. [60984]

Mr. Dobson: The Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme has existed for over 40 years, and is designed to provide reasonable prices for the National Health Service and fair rates of return for the pharmaceutical companies who supply the NHS. The Government remain committed to these objectives, and are currently renegotiating the Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme with representatives of the pharmaceutical industry.

The Government regret that there is increasing non compliance by a limited number of companies with the current voluntary agreement. This is adding to the NHS drugs bill at the expense of other NHS treatment and care. In these circumstances the Government have concluded that to ensure full compliance with a new agreement it will be necessary to take reserve powers in the forthcoming NHS Bill. These will make it possible to secure the compliance of any companies who might in future choose not to abide by the voluntary agreement.

TREASURY

Public Service Pensions

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to increase public service pensions from April 1999. [60987]

Mr. Byers: Legislation governing public service pensions requires them to be increased annually by the same percentage as State earnings-related pensions (additional pensions). My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security announced on 28 October 1998, Official Report, columns 339–42, that additional pensions will be increased by 3.2 per cent, in line with the annual increase in the Retail Prices Index up to September 1998. Public service pensions will therefore be increased by 3.2 per from 12 April 1999, except those which have been in payment for less than a year, which will receive a pro-rata increase.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Human Rights Act 1998

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to bring into force section 19 of the Human Rights Act 1998; and in what form statements under that section on compatibility with the convention rights will be published. [60985]

Mr. Straw: I have made an order under the Human Rights Act bringing section 19 into force on 24 November.

Statements under section 19 will appear as a note on the face of each Government Bill and in the explanatory notes for most Bills. This will enable anyone obtaining a copy of the Bill in paper or electronic form to see at once the statement.

There may be occasions when a Bill which has been amended at a late stage in the House into which it was first introduced cannot be accompanied by a statement when it is first printed in the second House. In these situations, a statement will be appended to the Bill by the time of Second Reading and the circumstances will be explained in a Written Answer.

The statements will be in the following form and will appear on the front page of each Bill:

European Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Secretary . . . has made the following statement under section 19(1)(a) of the Human Rights Act 1998:

In my view the provisions of the . . . Bill are compatible with the Convention rights.

or

Mr. Secretary . . . has made the following statement under section 19(1)(b) of the Human Rights Act 1998:

I am unable to make a statement that in my view the provisions of the . . . Bill are compatible with the Convention rights but the Government nevertheless wishes the House to proceed with the . . . Bill.

In the explanatory notes the statement will be referred to as follows:

European Convention on Human Rights

Section 19 of the Human Rights Act 1998 requires the Minister in charge of a Bill in either House of Parliament to make a statement about the compatibility of the provisions of the Bill with the Convention rights (as defined by section 1 of that Act). On [date] the Secretary of State for . . . made the following statement before Second Reading of this Bill in the House of [Commons] [Lords]:

In my view the provisions of the . . . Bill are compatible with the Convention rights.

or

I am unable to make a statement that in my view the provisions of the . . . Bill are compatible with the Convention rights but the Government nevertheless wishes the House to proceed with the . . . Bill.

Young People (Sexual Abuse)

Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conclusions were reached by the interdepartmental working group on preventing unsuitable people from working with children and abuse of trust on the need to protect vulnerable 16 and 17 year olds from sexual advances by those in authority over them; and if he will make a statement. [61127]

Mr. Boateng: The working group were asked to prioritise their work on abuse of trust. We have today placed a copy of their interim report on this in the Library.

The working group recommend a limited criminal offence to protect boys and girls of 16 and 17 from sexual advances by those in authority over them in specific circumstances. The circumstances would include young persons compulsorily detained; looked after by the local authority (whether in foster care, residential care, or semi-independent accommodation); receiving health and/or social care in a residential setting (including hospital); and receiving full time education. We accept this recommendation. As announced on 24 November 1998, Official Report, column 6, we will bring forward this Session proposals to implement it at the same time as we give Parliament an opportunity to vote on equalising the age of consent for boys and girls.

The working group also recommend a Government initiative to strengthen codes of conduct generally to protect young people from those in positions of authority over them. They are taking this forward as a matter of priority. The first step is a seminar involving outside organisations on 30 November, and work will continue on this throughout next year.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Leasehold Reform

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to publish proposals for leasehold reform. [60855]

Ms Armstrong: We shall be publishing a consultation paper on Thursday 26 November. Copies will be available in the Library.

Waste Disposal

Mrs. Humble: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has for the implementation of a change to a tonnage based levy for statutory joint waste disposal authorities. [60857]

Mr. Meale: After announcing the proposed change from a council tax to a tonnage based system for the apportionment of Joint Waste Disposal Authorities levies, the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), asked officials to work out methods for such a system and to discuss them with the local authority associations. A consultation document was issued on 9 July to those associations, the JWDAs and their constituent authorities with the intention of implementing the change in time for the 1999–2000 levy. This consultation prompted a large number of considered responses.

As part of the development of a waste strategy for England and Wales, we are looking at the way in which all waste management functions are funded, both in areas where there are Joint Waste Disposal Authorities (JWDAs) and more widely. The proposal to change the levy arrangements to one based on the tonnage delivered for disposal, was part of this exercise.

There are, however, obvious implications for the operation of the recycling credits scheme, a key element in the financing of local authority waste management. In response to the consultation paper "Less Waste: More Value", on the waste strategy for England and Wales, views were expressed that aspects of the recycling credits scheme needed amendment. We have therefore decided to undertake a review of the recycling credits scheme. A decision on the levy basis for JWDAs has therefore been postponed pending the outcome of this review.

Social Exclusion Action Teams

Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if she will announce the membership of the 18 policy action teams referred to in the Social Exclusion Unit report, "Bringing Britain Together: a national strategy for neighbourhood renewal", published on 15 September. [60988]

Ms Armstrong: The Social Exclusion Unit's report "Bringing Britain Together: a national strategy for neighbourhood renewal" set out proposals for an intensive programme of policy development involving 18 cross-cutting Policy Action Teams based around five themes: getting the people to work; getting the place to work; building a future for young people; access to services; and making the Government work better.

The Programme of policy development work will be completed by December 1999, when we will put together the outcome of all the reports into a coherent strategy. I am overseeing the whole process, and each Team has a champion Minister assigned to it.

I am announcing today the full membership of the Policy Action Teams. The Teams include members drawn from central and local government, the voluntary and private sectors as well as people living and working in poorer neighbourhoods. They will play an important part in achieving more joined-up Government policy and action on the ground. I have today placed the membership details in the Libraries of both Houses.

Ship Passengers (Compensation Claims)

Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action the Government are taking to ensure the availability of adequate compensation to meet claims arising from the death of, or injury to, passengers on board ships. [60989]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have signed an order today which will triple the minimum amount of compensation available for passenger claims. The order will affect ferry operators, travel agents and tour operators whose principal place of business is in the UK. The new limit of liability of 300,000 Special Drawing Rights—SDR—(about £250,000) per passenger takes effect on 1 January 1999.

As soon as a suitable legislative opportunity presents itself, we wish to extend this protection more widely to include all passengers whose journey has a link with the UK. This would require the UK withdrawing from the 1974 Athens Convention. This Convention entitles foreign carriers to an outdated limit of liability of 46,666 SDR (about £38,000) per passenger. In the meantime, the UK will continue to press within the International Maritime Organisation for swift revision of the Athens Convention to provide for even higher compensation amounts, guaranteed by compulsory insurance cover.

I accept, and applaud, the fact that insurance and shipping companies have sometimes not bound themselves by the limits following accidents involving major loss of life. However, we must not be complacent, and this is why the Government intend to work towards better legal protection for all passengers.

Ministerial Meeting

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the outcome of the meeting with Green Ministers. [61128]

Mr. Meacher: Green Ministers met on 18 November to discuss how to deliver the Greening Government Agenda. The meeting discussed action arising from the Government's response to the Environmental Audit Committee's Second Report on the Greening Government Initiative. We noted particularly that the Deputy Prime Minister had asked Green Ministers to consider and report to the Cabinet Committee on the Environment (ENV) on how far sustainable development can be incorporated into the remit of all existing Departments and their Non-Departmental Public Bodies. Each Green Minister confirmed that they were reviewing the position in their own Department, and would report back to the next Green Ministers' meeting early in 1999.

Green Ministers went on to discuss progress in integrating the environment into policies and operations. We agreed to establish a working group to consider the scope and format of future Green Ministers' reports to ENV, and the first published report on the activities of Green Ministers, to be produced in summer 1999.

Green Ministers' meetings normally consider one cross-cutting issue in some detail. On this occasion we discussed how to get the most from Green Transport Plans and the action that would be needed to meet the specific targets set out in the White Paper "A New Deal for Transport: Better for Everyone".

The meeting ended with a preliminary discussion of the consequences for the Green Ministers' network of devolution to Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. Green Ministers decided to examine in more detail the membership implications of devolution and to propose future arrangements at the next meeting in February.

Twelve Green Ministers attended the meeting on 18 November; other Departments were represented by officials.

Countryside Agency

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what decision has been made about a name for the new agency to be created by the merger of the Countryside Commission and those parts of the Rural Development Commission not being transferred to the regional development agencies. [61129]

Mr. Meacher: I have accepted a recommendation made jointly by the two Commissions that the name for the new body should be the Countryside Agency. This name will be included in the order under section 35 of the Regional Development Agencies Act 1998 which will effect the formation of the new body, and which will be laid before Parliament in the New Year.

The Commissions also propose that this name should be accompanied for day-to-day purposes by the strapline—working for people and places in rural England.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Disabled Football Supporters

Ms Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what response he has made to the Football Task Force report into improving facilities for disabled supporters. [60871]

Mr. Banks: I fully support the practical recommendations made in the Task Force's report to improve access and facilities at football grounds for supporters with disabilities. I have written today to the bodies identified in the report as having a role to play in implementing the relevant recommendations.

There are several recommendations which are for Government to progress. These relate to amending the Approved Document (AD) for Part M of the Building Regulations to require all new stadia, new stands and extensions to existing facilities to provide wheelchair spaces in accordance with the Guide to Safety at Sports Grounds; to drawing up a sliding scale for the numbers of designated seats for people who are ambulant disabled or visually/hearing impaired within new stands or stadia, and amending Part M accordingly; and to extending the future role of the Football Trust to improve disabled facilities at grounds.

Any changes to the Building Regulations require statutory consultation and will be based on the advice of the Building Regulations Advisory Committee. The British Standards Institution have begun a comprehensive review of BS 5810 Code of practice for access for the disabled to buildings, and it is the intention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions to use this standard and its supporting research, once it has been completed, as a basis for developing proposals through the Building Regulations Advisory Committee to revise the AD for Part M.

In the interim, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions have taken the opportunity to include references to the Guide to Safety at Sports Grounds in the current revision to the Approved Document to extend Part M to new housing. This will draw the guidance to the attention of interested parties.

The review of BS 5810 includes access for the ambulant disabled and when the Green Guide is next updated the standard will be taken on board.

The Football Trust is an independent discretionary trust. Any decisions on its future role is a matter for the Trustees, in accordance with the Trust Deed.

The recommendations made by the Task Force provide an excellent assessment of what has been achieved in the provision of facilities for disabled supporters and where improvements can still be made. The Government are determined to maintain the momentum of progress, by, for example, the continuing implementation of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995.

Government Indemnity Scheme

Mr. Leslie: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many indemnity undertakings were given by Departments under section 16 of the National Heritage Act 1980 for the six-month period ended 30 September; and what was the value of (a) any contingent liabilities in respect of such undertakings given at any time under that section which remain outstanding as at 30 September, (b) non-statutory Government indemnities in respect of loans handled by the Government Art Collection which remain outstanding as at 30 September and (c) non-statutory undertakings to Her Majesty in respect of loans from the Royal Collection which remain outstanding at 30 September. [60972]

Mr. Chris Smith: The provision for the Government Indemnity Scheme is made by the National Heritage Act 1980. The scheme facilitates public access to loans of works of art and other objects of public display made to museums, galleries and other such institutions by private owners and non national institutions. It does this by indemnifying lenders against loss or damage to their loan. Loans covered by the scheme must be for public benefit. The scheme also covers loans of such objects for study purposes within borrowing institutions where this would contribute materially to the public's understanding or appreciation of the loan. Examples of this are enhancing interpretation or explanation to the public of objects or bringing into the public domain, the conclusions of any study.

In the six-month period ended 30 September 1998, the following undertakings to indemnify were given under section 16 by the relevant Departments for objects on loan to national and non-national institutions:

Department	Numbers
Department for Culture, Media and Sport	516
Scottish Office Education and Industry Department	62
Welsh Office Education Department	44
Department of Education for Northern Ireland	14

The value of contingent liabilities in respect of undertakings given at any time under section 16 and which remained outstanding as at 30 September 1998 is:

Department	£
Department for Culture, Media and Sport	1,557,374,160
Scottish Office Education and Industry Department	115,648,368
Welsh Office Education Department	39,302,926
Department of Education for Northern Ireland	5,627,210

The value of non-statutory Government indemnities to cover loans handled by the Government Art Collection and which remained outstanding as at 30 September 1998 is £8,000,000.

The value of non-statutory Undertakings given to Her Majesty in respect of loans from the Royal Collection and which remained outstanding as at 30 September 1998 is £107,200,583.

EU Culture Council

Ms Christine Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Culture Council on 17 November. [61130]

Janet Anderson: EU Ministers responsible for cultural and audiovisual issues met on 17 November 1998 in Brussels.

Ministers agreed to extend the funding programmes for the arts, Kaleidoscope, and for literature, Ariane, to 1999. From January 2000, a new single framework programme for culture, entitled Culture 2000, will replace the existing programmes, such as Kaleidoscope and Ariane, as well as Raphael, which covers heritage issues, and a range of other cultural actions. Culture 2000 will enable not only co-operation within traditional sectors, but cross-sectoral co-operation to take place. Ministers agreed a Common Position, subject to final agreement by the Netherlands, which will now be considered by the European Parliament.

Ministers also adopted a Resolution highlighting the important role of public service broadcasting in the digital era, and discussed other issues, including cross-border fixed book price agreements, statistics concerning the audiovisual and related sectors, and the convergence of the telecommunications, media and information technology sectors.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agriculture Council

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Brussels on 23 and 24 November. [61131]

Mr. Nick Brown: I represented the United Kingdom at a meeting of the EU Agriculture Council in Brussels on 23 and 24 November. My noble Friend Lord Sewel, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, was also present.

The Council voted on a proposal made by the Commission for the lifting of the world-wide ban on the export of British beef in respect of meat from animals born after 1 August 1996. 10 Member States voted in favour of the measure; only one, Germany—for understandable domestic reasons—voted against. Spain, France, Austria and Luxembourg abstained. This vote represented a substantial move towards the Commission proposal by 5 Member States from the earlier vote in the Standing Veterinary Committee. Most important, the procedures under which the vote was taken in Council enable the Commission formally to adopt the Decision.

I can now announce to the House that within the last 3 hours the Commission has adopted the proposal, which permits the export from the UK of boneless beef and beef products from animals slaughtered between 6 and 30 months of age and born after 1 August 1996. That is the date on which the Commission have verified that all contaminated feed was removed from the food chain. There are further conditions which aim to prevent the offspring of BSE cases from entering the export scheme; a requirement for the slaughter of offspring of BSE cases; and strict rules on slaughtering and processing. The Government will shortly issue a consultation paper on our proposals for implementing these rules. I shall be laying before Parliament secondary legislation which will make the offspring cull, which has been operating since July on a voluntary basis, compulsory. The legislation will provide compensation at the market rate, to owners of animals slaughtered.

This is an excellent outcome which I am sure the House will welcome. It has been achieved against a background of scepticism about the seriousness with which we have tackled BSE. We have now overcome these misconceptions and had our case judged objectively on its scientific merits and supported by independent Commission inspections, taking as our over-riding principle the absolute need to safeguard public health.

Every Agriculture Minister who spoke in the Council, including those who did not vote in favour, had very positive things to say about the commitment shown by the new United Kingdom Government to tackling the problems presented by BSE. The outcome is also an affirmation of the value of this Government's close co-operation and dialogue with our partners in Europe and with the European Commission.

The lifting of the ban comes hard on the heels of the support measures for the agriculture sector which I announced to the House on 16 November 1998, Official Report, columns 624–66. Both demonstrate the Government's commitment to securing a viable long term future for the sector.

The Council also held a discussion of the Commission's proposals for CAP reform in the context of the Agenda 2000 measures. These proposals are essential for the future stability of European agriculture and in order to facilitate a successful enlargement of the Union to the east. The Council agreed a report to the Vienna European Council next month identifying the main outstanding issues and expressing its determination to reach conclusions on the package as a whole by next March. It is an important Government objective to secure an ambitious reform of the CAP which serves the national interest and I very much welcomed the commitment by the Council to take early decisions. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor made similar points in the discussion in Ecofin on 23 November on the future financing of the European Union.

This was a very important Council meeting for the United Kingdom. We have achieved a major objective of our policy towards Europe in the lifting of the beef export ban. Although it will take time for the British beef industry to win back markets which have been lost to them in the past two and a half years, I believe we have created the conditions in which they can now plan for the future, confident that their industry is operating to the highest possible standards. Our immediate task is to work with the industry to ensure that the scheme which we have successfully negotiated in Europe works effectively to help regain recognition for the quality of British beef on world markets.

Food Standards Agency

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress towards a Food Standards Agency. [61132]

Mr. Nick Brown: The Government are fully committed to the establishment of the Food Standards Agency as set out in the White Paper published in January 1998. It is a matter of regret that, because of the government's heavy legislative programme in other areas, it has not been possible to secure a space in the forthcoming Parliamentary session. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Health for Scotland, for Northern Ireland and for Wales and I are determined nevertheless to move action forward where we can, in the meantime, in ways which do not require legislation.

Since the general election, this Government have made a number of improvements to the way in which food safety and standards issues are handled. Officials from MAFF and DH are now working together in a Joint Food Standards and Safety Group, which reports directly to both the Secretary of State for Health and myself. The Group also liaises closely with the Scottish, Welsh and Northern Ireland Offices. The safety of the consumer lies at the heart of our decision making.

I am holding discussions with my right hon. Friends as to how we can, in practical terms, enhance these current joint working arrangements and lay further foundations for the Agency. As soon as we have completed these discussions, I will make a further announcement to the House. A draft Bill will be published in due course.

DEFENCE

Army Training Areas

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the support and administration of the Army's training areas and ranges. [60856]

Mr. Spellar: As part of the Government's search for efficiencies, the Commander in Chief Land Command is shortly to initiate a competition to seek a long term strategic partner from the private sector to assist in the development of a future strategy to deliver better value for money from the large number of contracts currently in existence from the support and administration of the Army's training areas and ranges. Details will be advertised in the Official Journal of the European Communities (OJEC) and MOD Contracts Bulletin.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Afghanistan

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom continues to impose an arms embargo on Afghanistan in line with the EU's Common Position of 17 December 1996. [61609]

Mr. Fatchett: We remain committed to the EU arms embargo against Afghanistan which the UK interprets as covering all goods and technology entered on Part III to Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods Order 1994, as amended.

Following consultations with this Department and the Ministry of Defence, the Department of Trade and Industry recently approved two export licences: the first for the export of mine-clearance suits for use by the United Nations Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Assistance to Afghanistan in its demining operations and the second for the export of mine clearance equipment for use by the Halo Trust to aid their demining activities also in Afghanistan. The grant of these licences are for humanitarian purposes, and are consistent with the purpose of the embargo.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Digital Radio Multiplexes

Ms Keeble: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with the Radio Authority in relation to the limits on ownership of digital radio multiplexes under the Broadcasting Acts; and if he will make a statement. [60854]

Mr. Chris Smith: I have received representations from the Radio Authority and Commercial Radio Companies Association that the present limits on participation in bodies corporate holding digital radio multiplex licences which are included in the Broadcasting Act 1990 (as amended by the Broadcasting Act 1996) may hamper the development of digital radio. Although the overall regulatory framework for digital radio remains appropriate to the Government's policy aims and to the shape of the emerging digital radio sector, I believe that there is a case for some relaxation of the restrictions on the ownership of bodies corporate holding multiplex licences to encourage investment in this area.

Following discussions between the Authority and my officials I am today issuing a consultation paper seeking views on proposals to use my order-making power in paragraph 11(5) of part III of Schedule 2 to the Broadcasting Act 1990 (as amended) to amend the present limits in the Broadcasting Act. My proposals would allow the formation of a greater number of partnerships between radio companies for the purpose of applying for multiplex licences. However, my proposals are also designed to protect plurality of ownership and diversity of content by allowing smaller radio groups and stations the opportunity to make meaningful investments in a range of applications for local multiplex licences.

I am placing copies of the consultation paper in the Libraries of both Houses.

SCOTLAND

Water Industry

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures he has taken to implement the conclusions of the Government's Review of the Scottish water industry; and if he will make a statement. [61682]

Mr. Dewar: The Scottish Water Industry Review proposed a range of measures to modernise the Scottish water industry. A central measure was the proposal to create a new position of a professional regulator responsible for all aspects of economic regulation of the Scottish water industry and for promoting the customer interest. There was consensus in all parts of the industry, including the Customers Council, that this would be a major improvement on the present arrangements. To safeguard the operational independence of the regulator, I proposed in my statement to the House of 16 December 1997, Official Report, columns 145–58, that we should establish the position in statute.

The Water Industry Bill, which was published today, contains provisions to discharge this commitment. It will wind up the current Customers Council and establish a new Water Industry Commissioner for Scotland to promote the interests of the water authorities' customers. The Commissioner will assume most of the existing duties of the Customers Council and will have the new function of advising the Scottish Executive about setting water and sewerage charges over periods of several years. The Bill also establishes new Water Industry Consultative Committees for each water authority to advise the Commissioner on the promotion of customer interests in their respective areas.

These new arrangements will allow objective, professional regulation of water charges. Requiring the Commissioner to consider charges over a number of years, will ensure more long-term stability than at present. This will allow the water authorities to plan for the future with greater certainty, helping them deliver better services to their customers as efficiently as possible.

The Bill requires the Commissioner to publish the advice put to the Executive on charges and also any modifications the Executive might make to that advice subsequently. These arrangements will safeguard the operational independence of the Commissioner, and will make the operation of the new system transparent to the general public. The Commissioner will be accountable to the Executive and, through it, to the Parliament. I believe these arrangements will give customers the best possible deal on prices and quality of service.

The water industry review also stressed the need to tackle the chronic under-investment in the industry. I can report that by the end of the current financial year the water authorities will have invested over £800 million since 1996 in new and upgraded infrastructure, with a further £1,500 million of investment planned over the following 3 years. This scale of investment represents a massive transformation and modernisation of the industry and brings to an end decades of neglect.

The Review stressed the importance of a stable financial framework for the industry, and it should be helpful that the recent allocation of EFLs has been made on a three-year basis.

The Review also recommended that the water authorities should become more responsive at a local level. To promote this our new appointments to the Water Authority Boards brought the number of local authority representatives up to roughly half of the total. I also issued a direction to the water authorities on 14 August this year requiring them to consult local authorities and other local representative bodies regularly. Copies of this direction were placed in the Library. The evidence so far suggests that these new arrangements are working well.

In sum, to implement our review we are modernising and improving standards in water and sewerage on a scale unprecedented since Victorian times. We are investing massive sums in improving the quality of drinking water and cleaning up our beaches, as can be seen by the new investment being put in place through the length and breadth of Scotland. And we are ensuring that our authorities are open, democratically accountable, responsive to local concerns and professionally regulated.

HEALTH

Correspondence

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to reply to the letters of 15 and 18 August from the hon. Member for Croydon, South to the then Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Brent, South, (Mr. Boateng) on the future of the Medium Secure Unit at Cane Hill, Croydon. [60869]

Mr. Hutton: There is no record of these letters having been received in the Department. If the hon. Member will arrange for copies to be sent to me, I shall ensure they receive urgent attention.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Local Government Finance

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to announce the provisional local government finance settlement for 1999–2000. [61635]

Mr. Prescott: I shall be making a statement to the House on Wednesday 2 December.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Floodlighting

Mr. Walter: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what change has been made to the floodlighting of the river frontage of the Palace of Westminster. [60991]

Sir Sydney Chapman: A new floodlighting scheme for the riverside elevation of the Palace was switched on for the first time on 18 November. My Committee agreed that it should be implemented as part of this year's programme of works because the previous floodlighting arrangements on the terrace were so unsatisfactory. They had consisted of temporary lights which were placed on the terrace only during the summer recesses. At other times of the year this elevation of the building was not illuminated because the floodlighting caused nuisance by spilling light into the rooms on the river front. The night time view of the unlit Palace from the riverside was most disappointing, in contrast to other well-lit buildings along the river.

The new scheme has been designed so that the floodlights are close to the base of the wall. By casting light upwards at a shallow angle the nuisance from light spilling into rooms is greatly reduced and the effect is to highlight the modelling of the stonework. The lamps themselves are highly energy efficient, so the electricity cost of the new scheme is some 30 per cent. less than before.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Fog Lights

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many motorists in Northern Ireland have (a) been given a fixed penalty notice and (b) been prosecuted for the unlawful use of fog lights in each of the last five years. [60990]

Mr. Ingram: The computerised records system does not permit a breakdown by particular offence. To provide the information requested would require a manual check of all records over each of the years in question and would incur a disproportionate cost.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Medway Secure Training Centre

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many trainees are currently held at Medway Secure Training Centre; and if he will make a statement. [61711]

Mr. Boateng: As of today, there are 36 trainees at Medway Secure Training Centre. This is fewer than the maximum of 40 trainees who may be held there because I have asked Rebound ECD, the contractors for Medway Secure Training Centre, to put in place a programme of work, including refurbishment, to address difficulties that have been experienced at the centre so as to ensure the high standard of care, control, education and training required by the contract. While this programme of work is being taken forward, the number of trainees held at Medway will be reduced on a temporary basis to 25 to help facilitate this work. Other trainees will be placed in local authority secure accommodation. The Government are committed to ensuring that secure provision for those young people whose offending is so serious or persistent as to require a period in a secure environment is of good quality, positive and constructive in tackling offending behaviour. We are working closely with Rebound ECD to achieve that. We are monitoring the situation at Medway closely and will continue to do so.

Commercial Dog Facilities

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will announce the results of the audit of commercial dog facilities that was announced in July 1997. [61712]

Mr. George Howarth: We have today laid before Parliament a report by the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Inspectorate. Copies are available in the Library. This makes a number of recommendations for best-practice in dog facilities. I have asked the Inspectorate to ensure that these recommendations are implemented, as far as is practicable, in all establishments.

The recommendations will be incorporated into the Codes of Practice for the Housing and Care of Animals—published under section 21 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986—when the Codes are next revised.

Animal Procedures Committee

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the annual report of the Animal Procedures Committee and the Committee's report on its review of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986; and if he will make further appointments to the Committee. [61713]

Mr. George Howarth: We have today laid before Parliament the Committee's annual report. Copies are available in the Library. The report contains, at appendix F, a further report by the Committee on its review of the operation of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

I welcome the Committee's report and the agenda of work it has identified for itself during the review. I particularly endorse the Committee's conclusion that it should be more open and pro-active, and that its independent role needs to be emphasised. I have already agreed to provide a dedicated secretariat for the Committee to support this way of working and to help ensure that the Committee can continue to carry out its work in an efficient and effective manner.

I am pleased to announce that nine new members are being appointed to the Committee with effect from 1 December 1998. In making these appointments, I am strengthening further the animal welfare expertise on the Committee and also bolstering the scientific expertise needed by the Committee in examining the areas it has set itself, including ethical considerations, biotechnology, use of primates and animal welfare.

The new appointees are:

Professor Christopher Atterwill—Head of Preclinical Drug Safety Department, Roche Products Limited.

Mr. Mike Baker—Chief Executive, British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection.

Professor Donald Broom—Professor of Animal Welfare, University of Cambridge.

Professor Grahame Bulfield—Director and Chief Executive, Roslin Institute.

Professor Stephen Clarke—Professor of Philosophy, University of Liverpool.

Dr. Alan Holland—Senior Lecturer in Philosophy, University of Lancaster.

Dr. Colin Johnston—Associate Head of Research, Department of Medicine, Queen's University, Belfast.

Professor Alan McNeilly—Deputy Director, Medical Research Council Reproductive Biology Unit.

Professor Genevra Richardson—Professor of Public Law, Queen Mary and Westfield College, University of London.

In publicly announcing the Committee's annual report, its review and the appointment of new members, I expect to outline other developments: the results of an audit of dog facilities and the intention of the Home Office to liaise with major grant-awarding bodies. These developments follow my recent announcement of an end to testing of cosmetics on animals in the United Kingdom.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what was the cost to her Department of travel by Ministers in her Department by (i) RAF and (ii) privately chartered aircraft (a) in the year to 1 May 1997 and (b) since 1 May 1997. [60893]

Clare Short: I refer to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, on 19 November 1998, Official Report, column 71C.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

New Opportunities Fund

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to consult on the new set of initiatives in health, education and the environment to be funded by the National Lottery through the New Opportunities Fund. [61785]

Mr. Chris Smith: Today I have published and laid before Parliament a consultation document, 'New Links for the Lottery'. Copies are widely available from my Department and through The Stationery Office.

I believe that the Lottery's long-term success depends on retaining and reinforcing public confidence in its power to address the issues that most concern people across the UK. The initiatives we are proposing—cancer prevention, detection, treatment and care; green spaces and sustainable communities; and community access to lifelong learning—demonstrate our commitment to see the benefits of Lottery money more widely spread. The document also contains proposals to increase the number of summer school places for school children, to increase the benefits to people with disabilities and to build on the contribution the Lottery can make to volunteering and community involvement. I believe that our proposals will receive widespread support, and I look forward to receiving views on how best to take them forward.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Royal Hospital, Haslar

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Attorney-General for what reasons he decided that it was not in the public interest to prosecute following an investigation into the circumstances of the disposal of clinical waste at Royal Hospital, Haslar. [61031]

The Solicitor-General: The investigation by the Ministry of Defence police to which the hon. Member refers commenced with the arrest and initial interviews of 2 suspects on 15 April 1997. Following further inquiries, they were charged on 1 December 1997 with offences of corruption and bailed to appear at Fareham Magistrates Court on 2 February 1998. However, the case had not been fully prepared for committal by the time of a hearing on 18 June 1998 and the court discharged the 2 defendants.

On 10 September 1998 my office received from the Crown Prosecution Service a request for consent to proceed against the two defendants for offences under Section 1 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906; a case may not proceed beyond committal until such consent has been given.

In considering the application, I was mindful of the history of the case. I weighed the seriousness of the alleged offences (including the loss alleged to have been suffered by the Ministry of Defence and the alleged benefits to the defendants) against the fact that the defendants had already faced court proceedings stretching over some 7 months. Almost 3 months further had elapsed. I formed a provisional view that the circumstances were not such as to justify the institution of a further prosecution. I caused inquiries to be made to ascertain what, if any, disciplinary action had been taken against the Ministry of Defence employee involved. I learned that he had been dismissed. I therefore declined to consent.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Maples: To ask the Prime Minister if drafts of the answers given to the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon by various departments on 19 November in respect of ministerial travel, were seen by anyone in his Office before publication. [60910]

The Prime Minister: In line with the practice of successive Administrations, this Government seek to secure proper co-ordination where identical questions are tabled to a number of Departments, including my Office.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what was the cost to his Office of travel in aircraft (i) belonging to the RAF and (ii) privately chartered (a) in the year to 1 May 1997 and (b) since 1 May 1997; [60902]

(2) by what means he returned from Toulouse to London in August. [60901]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 19 November 1998, Official Report, columns 742–46.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will list the people who accompanied him on the flight he made in September from Lyneham to Highgrove: what was the cost of the flight; and by what means they then returned to London; [60899]

(2) what form his bilateral discussions took in (a) Bologna in August and (b) Toulouse in August; and how many officials attended each with him. [60900]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the Answer I gave him on 19 November 1998, Official Report, columns 742–46. All relevant information concerning flights was provided in that Answer.

In line with the practice adopted by the previous Administration appropriate officials and security personnel accompanied me for each meeting. In addition to my bilateral with Mr. Jospin, I also undertook an official visit to the Airbus facility in Toulouse.

My discussions with Mr. Jospin and Mr. Prodi, like all discussions between heads of Government, were on the basis that they would remain private.

European Parliament

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the electoral system to be used for elections for the European Parliament in June 1999. [61047]

The Prime Minister: As my right hon. Friend the President of the Council made clear on 26 November 1998, Official Report, column 315, the Government are re-introducing the European (Parliamentary Elections) Bill. This would establish a proportional representation system for the European parliamentary elections as promised in our Manifesto.

TREASURY

VAT (Registration)

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the net annual gain to the Exchequer consequent on lowering the threshold for compulsory VAT registration to (a) £40,000 per annum and (b) £30,000 per annum. [61168]

Dawn Primarolo: No estimate of the net annual gain to the Exchequer consequent on lowering the threshold for compulsory VAT registration for the two cases mentioned is available.

Rules on Expenditure (Harmonisation)

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received on HM Customs and Excise's consultation paper on European harmonisation of rules on expenditure which is not eligible for full input tax deduction; and if he will make a statement. [60874]

Dawn Primarolo: So far, there have been twenty one (21) responses to the consultation paper. The closing date for comments is 11 December 1998.

VAT (Property Repairs)

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on revenue of the Edinburgh VAT and Duties Tribunal ruling (EDN/97/33) relating to VAT on work arranged by a local authority to repair property; and if this ruling will be applied to the rest of the United Kingdom. [60875]

Dawn Primarolo: Following the Tribunal decision Customs repaid over £22 million to Glasgow City Council and clarified the correct VAT treatment applicable to authorities throughout the United Kingdom.

VAT (Dried Fruit)

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue forgone as a result of HM Customs and Excise's decision not to recover VAT wrongly charged to 1 January 1999 on sweetened dried fruit. [60876]

Dawn Primarolo: On 11 September 1998, HM Customs and Excise announced the outcome of a review which clarifies the VAT liability of sweetened dried fruit. It allows suppliers who received an earlier zero-rated ruling and whose products are now properly standard-rated to apply the liability change from 1 January 1999. The revenue is estimated to be negligible.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue which would be raised if naturally sweetened dried fruit with no sweetening matter were subject to VAT at the standard rate. [60879]

Dawn Primarolo: Using information on sales of dried fruit, HM Customs and Excise estimate the annual revenue which would be raised to be about £15 million.

ECOFIN

Mr. Caplin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the council meeting of the Economic and Finance Ministers of the European Union held on 23 November. [61908]

Mr. Gordon Brown: I attended the Economic and Finance Council—ECOFIN—of the European Union in Brussels on 23 November. The Economic Secretary accompanied me.

In the context of Agenda 2000, ECOFIN discussed the EC's future financial framework and in particular the stabilisation of EC spending by 2006 at its present real-terms level of around 85 billion euro. There was increasing support for this idea, which the UK supports, not least because it will help prepare the EU for enlargement. We asked that this issue be put on the table for the Vienna European Council. I made it clear that stabilisation was compatible with CAP reform.

The Council discussed reform of the Common Agricultural Policy and Own Resources issues. I made clear the UK's willingness to find a package of measures to address other states' large net contributions, whilst making it clear that, in moderating their problems, it would be unjust to make ours worse. Stabilisation of spending should form part of this package. The Presidency undertook to prepare a report of all the Agenda 2000 discussions so far, to be submitted to the European Council at Vienna.

Commissioner Van Miert presented a paper on banks providing services of general economic interest. There was a discussion during which the German delegation said it would pursue the matter bilaterally with the Commission. Commissioner Monti proposed a framework for action in financial services. I make it clear that the UK did not support all aspects of the Commission's paper but welcomed action to improve the single market in financial services. The Council decided that a Financial Services Policy Group should be established, with the personal representatives of Finance Ministers, to identify priorities in improving the Single Market in Financial Services. The Economic Secretary will represent the UK.

The Commission introduced the 1999 Employment Guidelines, and the Chairman of the Economic Policy Committee gave his Committee's opinion on the Guidelines. The Council welcomed the Guidelines and the EPC's opinion on them.

The Council discussed the 1999 EC Budget. The Presidency concluded that a number of delegations had stressed the need for budget discipline, and several countries had also expressed concern about adequate funding for structural policies.

The Council discussed measures to take forward the Sound and Efficient Management 2000 initiative. The proposed conclusions were adopted. Commissioner Gradin made a presentation describing the progress made in the Fight against Fraud in recent years. The adoption by Council of the joint guideline on inspections of Community Own Resources was blocked by Spain and is to be remitted to Coreper.

The Council discussed combating the counterfeiting of the euro. The Presidency concluded that the Monetary Committee's recommendations would be adopted as Council conclusions. The Council discussed the issue of collector coins in the euro area. The Presidency adopted the Monetary Committee's recommendations.

The Council agreed that there will be a special ECOFIN on 31 December in Brussels to fix the exchange rates of those participating in the 3rd stage of EMU.

Population Statistics

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people aged (a) between 65 and 69, (b) between 70 and 74, (c) between 75 and 79 and (d) 80 or over years of age there are in each region within Great Britain. [61151]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Steve Webb, dated 27 November 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent question asking for the number of people aged (a) between 65 and 69, (b) between 70 and 74, (c) between 75 and 79 and (d) 80 or over in each region within Great Britain.

The following table provides the information for the ages requested for each region within Great Britain. These are the mid-1997 population estimates compiled by ONS for England and Wales and by the General Register Office for Scotland, which are the most recent available.

National Debt

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list in rank order the top five creditors to whom the United Kingdom Government are indebted. [60912]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mrs. Maria Fyfe, dated 27 November 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the UK national debt.

The ONS does not compile any information relating to the top five countries nor companies nor individuals to whom the UK is indebted. The ONS last published broad splits of "Debt of the public sector: nominal amounts outstanding" in table S1 of Financial Statistics in April 1998. Table S1 provides splits of public sector debt held outside the public sector in terms of sterling and foreign currency both by the private sector and the rest of the world.

The information is collected, largely by the Bank of England, by type of instrument. These instruments are the means by which central government raises money and include a wide range of instrument issues such as British Government Securities (Gilts) and National Savings. No published records are available as to the individual ownership of these. The National Debt currently stands at around £400 billion. The largest component is in the form of British Government Securities (total liability about £280 billion) of which about a half are held by UK life assurance and pension funds, and about £55 billion are held abroad. National savings are held by UK households and account for more than £60 billion. The ONS published detailed instrument information, on an international basis, in the Maastricht First Release, on 28 August 1998.

The Bank of England provides the ONS with the vast majority of information on the National Debt. The Bank of England Statistical Abstract contains information on the holdings of sterling national debt by sector on tables 13.3 and 13.4. The largest holdings are by the insurance and pension funds sectors. Copies of the above publications are available from the House of Commons Library.

Corporation Tax

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to implement the group payment arrangements for quarterly corporation tax payment; and how he proposes to do it. [61045]

Dawn Primarolo: We plan to have the arrangements in place first for companies with accounting periods ending on 31 December 1999, with a first quarterly instalment payment due on 14 July 1999. Details of how the arrangements will work will be published in due course.

Financial Services Authority

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many staff have transferred from the Insurance Directorate of his Department to the Financial Services Authority. [61040]

Ms Hewitt: None. Transfer is intended to take place on 1 January 1999. It is too early to give definitive figures for the numbers of staff who will transfer.

Insurance Directorate

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many staff in his Department were employed in the Insurance Directorate on (a) 31 December 1996 and (b) 31 December 1997. [61039]

Ms Hewitt: None, since the Insurance Directorate was until 5 January 1998 part of the Department of Trade and Industry. I understand, however, that the numbers of permanent staff in post, on a full-time equivalent basis, at 1 January 1997 and 1 January 1998 were 91.6 and 93.6 respectively.

Overseas Investments

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate his Department has made of the revenue which would be raised from the abolition of the deductability of interest on overseas investments. [61042]

Dawn Primarolo: No such estimate has been made.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Maples: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the occasions since 1 May 1997 on which a Minister in his Department has used (a) an aircraft belonging to the RAF and (b) a privately chartered aircraft together with (i) details of take-off and destination points, (ii) ground waiting time, (iii) dates of departure and return, (iv) purpose of the trip, (v) cost of the trip to his Department and (vi) details of people accompanying the Minister, indicating the total costs of all such travel borne by his Department (1) since 1 May 1997 and (2) between 1 May 1996 and 1 May 1997. [60898]

Ms Hewitt: I refer the hon. Member to the answer the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave him on 19 November 1998, Official Report, column 849.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Race Employment and Education Forum

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the Race Employment and Education Forum was established; and how many times it has met. [61171]

Ms Hodge: The Race Employment and Education Forum replaces the Race Relations Employment Advisory Group and was established on 23 September 1998. It has met once, on 20 October 1998.

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what budget has been allocated to the Race Employment and Education Forum for (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99. [61172]

Ms Hodge: There is no separate budget for the Race Employment and Education Forum; its costs are met from the Department's overall budget.

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment who the members of the Race Employment and Education Forum are; and what were the criteria for their appointment. [61170]

Ms Hodge: There are twenty two members of the Race Employment and Education Forum. They are:

Mr. Nadeem Ahmad, Principal Policy Officer (Racial Equality), Newcastle upon Tyne City Council; Mr. Stephen Alambritis, Head of Parliamentary Affairs, Federation of Small Businesses;

Mr. Sher Azam MBE, Bradford businessman; Mr. Wally Brown, Principal, Liverpool Community College; Ms Andrea Callender, Campaign Director, Race for Opportunity; Mr. John Cridland Director of Human Resources Policy, Confederation of British Industry; Ms Sandy Finnigan Chief Executive, Careers Bradford Ltd; Mr Len Jackson, Managing Director, Pork Farm Bowyers; Miss Mei Sim Lai, Partner, Pridie Brewster Chartered Accountants; Ms Kaliani Lyle, Chief Executive, Citizens Advice Scotland; Ms Thalia Marriott, Deputy Principal, South Thames College; Ms Gloria Mills, Director of Equal Opportunities, UNISON; Professor Tariq Modood Professor of Sociology, Politics and Public Policy, University of Bristol; Sir Herman Ouseley Chairman, Commission for Racial Equality; Mr. Ambar Paul, Chief Executive, Caparo Group Ltd.;

Mr. Clyde Pile, Managing Director, Glass Processing Midlands; Mr. Mohammed Shafiq, Equal Opportunities Manager, Greater Peterborough Chamber of Commerce, Training and Enterprise;

Mr. Sanjeev Sharma, Head of Human Resources, NatWest Life Assurance Ltd.; Ms Cherry Short, Chair Cardiff and Vale Race Equality Council and CRE Commissioner; Ms Sukhvinder Stubbs, Chief Executive, Runnymede Trust; Ms Christine Taylor-Ozgen, Head of Training and Employment, Refugee Council; Professor Gajendra Verma, Professor of Education, University of Manchester.

The criteria for membership were that both professional and lay members should have practical experience and knowledge of the issues affecting ethnic minorities in the labour market, education or training, and should be geographically representative of the country at large.

Social Affairs Council

Maria Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Social Affairs Council meeting on 20 November. [61787]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I attended the Council of Employment and Social Affairs Ministers in Brussels on 20 November.

The Council discussed the Commission's draft European Employment Guidelines for 1999 and the draft Joint Report on member states' implementation of their National Employment Action Plans in 1998.

The Presidency circulated the first draft of its own revised version of the Guidelines and undertook to produce a further draft for discussion at the joint ECOFIN/Social Affairs Council on 1 December in the light of any comments by member states.

The Guidelines and Joint Report will be put to the European Council for agreement in Vienna on 11–12 December.

Access to Work Support

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the activities of Members of the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh and London assemblies will constitute paid employment for the purposes of Access to Work support. [61046]

Mr. Andrew Smith: This has not yet been determined.

Teacher Induction Arrangements

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the consultation on the new teacher induction arrangements. [61786]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We received 569 responses to the consultation document from schools, local education authorities, teacher training institutions, teacher unions and other professional organisations. I am pleased to announce that there was almost universal support for the introduction of a structured induction programme for new teachers along the lines we proposed. I have placed a summary of the main outcomes of the consultation in the Library.

Single Gateway

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the 12 areas to pilot the Single Work Focused Gateway. [61788]

Mr. Andrew Smith: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security and I have decided on twelve areas to pilot the Single Work Focused Gateway.

From June 1999, Essex South East, Warwickshire, Clyde Coast & Renfrew and Lea Roding (East London) will be the first pilot areas. From November 1999 Somerset, Buckinghamshire, Gwent Borders and Calderdale & Kirklees will test the benefits call centre technology can bring to the Gateway process. At the same time, private or voluntary sector providers will be invited to lead pilots in Suffolk, North Nottinghamshire, Leeds and North Cheshire to test out whether they can bring extra value through innovative approaches to the Gateway.

These twelve pilot areas will play a vital part in the development of a new welfare state based on rights and responsibilities—work for those who can and support for those who cannot. They will also be at the forefront of providing the excellent service to clients that we are determined to provide.

The Single Gateway marks a step change in our welfare system. Currently, our system puts clients in boxes, depending on whether they are unemployed, lone parents, carers or face illness or disability. Under the Gateway, after an initial 'registration and orientation' phase, all clients will be allocated a personal adviser. The adviser will be responsible for working with individual clients to establish their individual needs and provide them with the help they need to become independent and move towards work. Of course, for some clients—such as the recently bereaved—it may not be appropriate to have an initial focus on work. In these cases, the personal adviser will keep the case under review and contact the client at a more appropriate stage to discuss their needs. The Gateway will be the cornerstone of our philosophy for welfare reform—work for those who can, support for those who cannot.

Local authorities will be invited to work with the Employment Service and Benefits Agency to provide a seamless and responsive service to all benefit clients.

HEALTH

Acquired Brain Injuries

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidance his Department provides to health and social services to ensure that rehabilitation services for people with acquired brain injury are provided at a time when they are most likely to prove beneficial; [60906]

(2) if he will review the way in which services for people with acquired brain injuries are co-ordinated. [60908]

Mr. Milburn: The Department accepts the need for specialised rehabilitation services for people recovering from brain injury. It commissioned a study on the subject, the National Traumatic Brain Injury Study, which was published in April 1998. Officials are now working on the production of guidance outlining management models for the treatment of traumatic brain injury. Consultation on the guidance will take place with the National Health Service and the voluntary sector.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Cotter: To ask the President of the Council what steps she has taken to establish the millennium compliance status of essential suppliers to central Government. [61135]

Mrs. Beckett: It is the responsibility of individual departments to work with their suppliers to obtain compliance information. As part of the quarterly monitoring exercise, central government departments and agencies are asked to report on the steps they have taken and progress made in establishing the millennium compliance of their essential suppliers. The individual returns from the last quarterly review were published on 9 September and are available in the libraries of the House. The returns from the next quarterly review will be published shortly.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Benefits

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will introduce a trigger in the benefits system to ensure that those who are not in receipt of income support at the time of disability living allowance being awarded are invited to claim income support. [60917]

Mr. Timms: There are no current plans to invite claims to Income Support (IS) when an award of Disability Living Allowance (DLA) has been made. DLA provides a contribution towards the extra costs associated with disability. When a claim to DLA is received from a customer there is insufficient data to indicate whether the customer would be entitled to IS. However, the leaflet issued with DLA award notices contains information about other benefits, including Income Support.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to means-test disability living allowance. [60918]

Mr. Timms: We have concluded and made clear in the Green Paper "New Ambitions for our Country: A New Contract For Welfare" (Cm 3805) that Disability Living Allowance and Attendance Allowance will remain universal, national benefits and as such they will not be subject to a means test.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has for benefits for those who are severely disabled and are older than 20 years of age. [60915]

Mr. Timms: The proposals for the reform of Severe Disablement Allowance (SDA) as set out in the Consultation Paper—"Support for Disabled People", would apply to new claims only. Existing SDA recipients aged 20 or over at the point of change would be protected and continue to receive benefit as now. Under the new arrangements, people who become severely disabled after the age of 20 would no longer be able to claim SDA.

However, around 70 per cent. of those currently receiving SDA also receive Income Support (IS) and it is likely that the same proportion would continue to qualify for IS following the introduction of the proposals. This group would, therefore, see no change to their overall level of income. Disability Living Allowance is also available to help with the additional costs of disability.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what plans he has for the relative levels of (a) disability living allowance and (b) incapacity benefit; and what decisions he has made about the minimum level of each; [60914]

(2) what plans he has for the future level of incapacity benefit. [60888]

Mr. Timms: Disability Living Allowance and Incapacity Benefit are awarded where specific entitlement conditions are met. There is no relationship between the relative levels of the benefits. There are no plans to change the amounts of the benefits, but they will continue to be reviewed as part of the normal uprating process.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many current recipients of (a) incapacity benefit and (b) invalidity benefit who are aged under state pension age, are receiving occupational or personal pensions of (i) £0.01 to £9.99, (ii) £10 to £19.99, (iii) £20 to £29.99, (iv) £30 to £39.99, (v) £40 to £49.99, (vi) £50 to £59.99, (vii) £60 to £69.99 and (viii) £70 or above per week. [60922]

Mr. Timms: Information is not available in the format requested. Such information that is available is in the table.

Incapacity benefit recipients' pension income 1996–97

Thousand

£ per week	Occupational pensions	Personal/other pensions	Total
0.01–9.99	42	23	53
10–19.99	41	13	52
20–29.99	36	5	40
30–39.99	43	3	45
40–49.99	53	3	55
50–59.99	47	6	52
60–69.99	50	1	52
70 or more	290	4	293

Notes:

1. Incapacity Benefit replaced Sickness Benefit and Invalidity Benefit in April 1995. All existing recipients at that date became Incapacity Benefit recipients.
2. Figures include 11,000 Severe Disablement Allowance recipients.
3. Other pensions includes Widows, Trade Union and Friendly Society pensions and Annuities regulated by the Pensions Act 1995 but not purchased with tax relieved pension savings.
4. Some Incapacity Benefit recipients will receive both occupational and personal/other pensions. Aggregating occupational and other pension income causes some cases to be shifted into a different band, consequently the total in the third column is not the sum of the first two.
5. Figures include a number of former Invalidity Benefit recipients above State pension age who were able to elect to remain on benefit for up to 5 years. From April 1995 Incapacity Benefit is not payable above State pension age.
6. No existing recipient of Incapacity Benefit at the point of change will have their entitlement affected by the proposal to take some account of occupational and personal pension income above £50 a week in assessing future Incapacity Benefit claims.

1996–97 Family Resources Survey

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the criteria for the award of incapacity benefit and disability living allowance; and in what circumstances a person may be awarded both. [60889]

Mr. Timms: Incapacity Benefit is a contributory benefit to help replace the income of people unable to work because of an illness or disability. It is paid to people who have the necessary National Insurance contributions and who pass the appropriate test of incapacity.

Disability Living Allowance is a non-means-tested, non-contributory benefit which can be claimed by people aged under 65 for extra care or mobility needs arising from their disability.

Both benefits may be paid if the conditions for entitlement are satisfied. Entitlement to one does not affect, and is not dependent on, entitlement to the other.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if carers who have not made national insurance contributions in the recent past will be refused incapacity benefit, but will be eligible for disability living allowance. [60913]

Mr. Timms: Carers currently have to pay a minimum amount of National Insurance contributions at some point prior to the claim, in order to qualify for Incapacity Benefit. This will continue to be the case in the future. However, as we made clear in our consultation paper "A New Contract for Welfare: Support for Disabled People" we are planning to modify the proposed new contribution test so that carers who received Invalid Care Allowance are not disadvantaged because they were unable to pay contributions due to their caring responsibilities in one of the two tax years before the claim.

In addition, disabled carers will continue to be eligible for Disability Living Allowance if they meet the conditions of entitlement for that benefit.

Pensions

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the value of the basic state pension for (a) someone of minimum state pension age and (b) someone aged 80 years as a percentage of average earnings in (i) 1980 and (ii) 1998; and if he will provide corresponding estimates for (1) all other EU countries, (2) all non-EU G7 countries and (3) other OECD nations for which similar figures are available. [60923]

Mr. Denham: The information on the value of the UK pension as percentage of average earnings is in the tables. Information on other countries is not available in the format requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Year	Basic pension at April (£)	Average Earnings at April (£)	Basic pension as a percentage of average earnings (%)
1980
Minimum pension age	23.30	109.50	21.3
Recipient aged 80	23.55	109.50	21.5
1998
Minimum pension age	64.70	384.50	16.8
Recipient aged 80	64.95	384.50	16.9

Note:
The average earnings of full time employees was calculated using the New Earnings Survey produced by the Office for National Statistics

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will take steps to provide that the affirmative statutory instrument procedure is used for changes in attendance allowance. [60881]

Mr. Timms: Proposals for Attendance Allowance would follow the normal procedure to change the eligibility criteria for Social Security benefits. This allows for regulations which are subject to the negative resolution Parliamentary procedure.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate his Department has made of the extra numbers of cold weather payments which would have been paid for the winter of 1997 to 1998 if the wind chill factor had been incorporated into the measure of temperature, for each region within Great Britain. [61153]

Angela Eagle: No criterion combining wind speed and external air temperature has been prescribed on which to make such an estimate.

Pensioners (Means-tested Benefits)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the amount of each means-tested benefit which is currently unclaimed by pensioners for each region within Great Britain. [61155]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

Amount of unclaimed Income Support and Council Tax Benefit by pensioners, by region, for the year

£ million

Government region	Amount of Income Support unclaimed	Amount of Council Tax Benefit unclaimed
North East	30	20
North West and Merseyside	100	50
Yorkshire and the Humber	65	35
East Midlands	40	30
West Midlands	60	40
Eastern	50	30
London	80	60
South East	85	60
South West	65	40
Wales	30	20
Scotland	55	50
Total	710	435

Notes:
1. All estimates are rounded to the nearest 5 million.
2. Due to small sample sizes across all regions, estimates for Housing Benefit are not available.
3. These figures do not take account of potential biases. The true figure may therefore be higher or lower than those quoted.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners are in receipt of income support and are (a) between 65 and 69 years of age, (b) between 70 and 74 years of age, (c) between 75 and 79 years of age and (d) 80 or over years of age in each region within Great Britain. [61147]

Mr. Denham: The information is in the table.

Income support claimants aged 65 and over, by region—May 1998

North West	181	29	30	36	85
Wales	81	12	13	17	38
Scotland	137	23	24	28	62

Notes:

1. Figures are based on a 5 per cent. sample of all cases and as such are subject to a degree of sampling error. For example, for an estimate of 10,000 the figure could lie between 9,100 and 10,900.
2. Figures do not sum due to rounding to the nearest thousand.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of raising the lower capital limit for income support for pensioner claimants from £3,000 to (a) the level it would have been if it has been uprated by prices since 1988, (b) £10,000, (c) £15,000 and (d) £20,000, assuming no upper limit in all cases. [61148]

Mr. Denham: The estimated Income Support costs in 1999–2000 are (a) £50 million; (b) £110 million; (c) £135 million; (d) £155 million.

Notes:

1. Variant (a) has been based upon raising the lower capital limit to £4,662. This is based upon the assumption of the £3,000 lower capital limit being uprated by the increase in the RPI between April 1988 and September 1998 (for uprating), to the nearest pound.

2. These figures are rounded to the nearest £5 million and are based upon the Department's Policy Simulation Model of income-related benefits. This model draws data from the 1995–96 Family Resources Survey, uprated to 1999–2000 levels, and calibrates results to forecast benefit caseloads consistent with the Comprehensive Spending Review forecasts.

3. Estimates relate only to Income Support costs. No assumptions has been made about how this might feasibly be aligned through the other income-related benefits.

4. For capital costings, estimates are further adjusted using May 1997 administrative data in order to bring results into line with known reported capital of benefit cases. In the absence of any other information, the same adjustments have been applied to estimated existing gainers and floaters-on. Estimates from household surveys based on reported capital holdings are subject to low levels of response and high levels of imputation. Consequently they should not be interpreted as precise point estimates, but rather as indicative of broad magnitudes.

5. Estimates do not include cases in Residential Care and Nursing Homes.

Widows' Benefits

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what will be the effect on the number of people dependent on means-tested benefits of his proposed reforms to widows' benefits. [60926]

Angela Eagle: Information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as set out.

The increase in the numbers on each of the means tested benefits following introduction of Bereavement Allowance for women is less than 5,000 in each of the first two years. In the third year, the increase for Income Support/Income Based Jobseeker's Allowance is estimated to be 10,000, the increase for each of the other means-tested benefits is less than 5,000.

The reduction in the numbers on each of the means-tested benefits following introduction of Bereavement Allowance for men is less than 5,000 in each of the first three years.

The reduction in the numbers on each of the means tested benefits following introduction of Widowed Parents' Allowance for men is less than 5,000 in each of the first three years.

The increase in the numbers on each of the means tested benefits following introduction of the £10 disregard of Widowed Parents' Allowance is less than 5,000 in each of the first three years.

Notes:

1. Means tested benefits include Income Support, Income Based Jobseeker's Allowance, Housing Benefit, Council Tax Benefit and Working Families Tax Credit.

2. Estimates are broad orders of magnitude. They are rounded to the nearest 10,000 but are not necessarily accurate to that degree.

3. Estimates assume that a constant proportion of those affected by the proposed changes to Bereavement Benefits move on or off each of the means-tested benefits.

4. Estimates use information from the 1995–96 Family Resources Survey, the Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiry and forecasts from the Government Actuary's Department concerning the number of men and women affected by the proposed changes.

5. Estimates across means-tested benefits cannot be summed to provide an estimate of the total number of people affected by the changes.

Pensioner Incomes

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the number of pensioners in each region in Great Britain who have income (a) before housing costs and (b) after housing costs below half the national average. [61154]

Mr. Denham: The information is in the table.

Numbers of pensioners with below half average income, analysed by Government office region, 1995–96 and 1996–97

Government office region	Before housing costs	After housing costs
North	*100,000	140,000
North West and Merseyside	240,000	300,000
Yorkshire and the Humber	220,000	240,000
East Midlands	160,000	200,000
West Midlands	200,000	240,000
Eastern	200,000	240,000
London	180,000	320,000
South	240,000	320,000

Numbers of pensioners with below half average income, analysed by Government office region, 1995–96 and 1996–97

Government office region	Before housing costs	After housing costs
South West	220,000	260,000
Wales	*120,000	140,000
Scotland	200,000	240,000

Notes:
1. The data are from the Households Below Average Income dataset based on the Family Resources Survey (FRS).
2. The sample sizes for pensioners by region are small. The numbers given are the average of the numbers of pensioners below the contemporary thresholds in 1995–96 and 1996–97. The data marked with an asterisk are based on particularly small samples where the dataset's estimates of numbers below half average income varied significantly between the two years.
3. Figures have been rounded to the nearest 20,000 but are not necessarily accurate to that level.
4. The FRS grossing regime is designed to match population estimates by age band at national level, not at regional level.

Social Security Spending

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the proportion of growth in spending in each Parliament since 1979 which was attributed to (a) demographic changes, (b) growth in expenditure on SERPS, (c) discretionary policy changes and (d) other factors. [60924]

Mr. Denham: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EU Industry Council

Yvette Cooper: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Industry Council held on 16 November. [61909]

Mr. Mandelson: My noble Friend the Minister for Trade and Competitiveness in Europe represented the UK at the EU Industry Council on 16 November.

The Council agreed to tighten the rules on government aid to industry. A new Regulation will codify the existing Commission procedures for the control of state aid and it will also strengthen the ability of the Commission both to recover aid paid illegally and to undertake on-site monitoring of companies receiving state aid. The Commission agreed to publish final state aid decisions in all the languages of the Official Journal and to take a formal decision before compelling a company to co-operate where it refused to allow on-site monitoring. With these two amendments, all outstanding reserves were lifted. The Presidency concluded that a political agreement had been reached on the text of the Regulation while the Council awaited the opinion of the European Parliament.

This was followed by a discussion on a Commission monitoring report on aid to certain shipyards in Germany and Spain and a brief presentation by the Commission on the impact of the crisis in Korea on shipbuilding.

The Council had an open debate on the Competitiveness of European Industry. The Commission opened the debate and noted that European industry was catching up with world competition, but that worker productivity was still behind the USA and Japan. This was followed by a round table discussion on competitiveness, which included the results of four benchmarking studies and the Commission's response to the Business Environment Simplification Task Force (BEST) report.

The Council adopted conclusions on benchmarking and the competitiveness of business services. The Presidency concluded the debate by welcoming the progress on benchmarking and invited COREPER to take forward further work on this and the Commission response to the BEST Report.

A meeting with Industry Ministers from the CEEs and Cyprus began in formal session and continued over lunch. A number of applicant states made prepared statements describing the reforms they are undertaking. During the discussion, it was emphasised that applicant states needed both to complete industrial restructuring and to take on the regulatory aquis before accession. The Commission also proposed a closer working-level dialogue in eight key sectors, including coal, steel and automotive industries, which could provide analysis of the CEEs' progress. The Presidency concluded that this should be followed up and that there was a general consensus for increasing bilateral contacts and advice to the applicants.

An orientation debate was held on the draft directive on late payment in commercial transactions. During this debate, all member states expressed support for the objective of the proposal, but had concerns on the degree of harmonisation of other aspects of national civil law. The Presidency concluded that discussions should be continued at official level with a view to reaching a Common Position as soon as possible. The Council also adopted Conclusions on the restructuring of the steel industry and the competitiveness of the recycling industry.

The Commission gave presentations on the Ottawa Conference on Electronic Commerce, the 10th Monitoring Report on the control of aid to the Steel Industry, the 27th Annual Report on Competition Policy, the Observatory for Textiles and Clothing and Delocalisation.

EU Internal Market Council

Yvette Cooper: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Internal Market Council on 9 November. [61910]

Mr. Mandelson: My noble Friend the Minister for Trade and Competitiveness in Europe represented the UK at the Internal Market Council in Brussels on 9 November.

The Council considered three elements of the Single Market Action Plan, which aims to improve the operation of the Single Market. It discussed the rolling Joint Work Programme of the three Presidencies; Member States' progress towards implementation of the Single Market Action Plan; and mutual recognition. The Commission presented the latest Single Market Scoreboard, which showed that the number of directives not yet implemented in all Member States had been cut from 26.7 per cent. last November to 14.9 per cent. currently and noted that, at 15 October, 40 actions out of 66 of the Single Market Action Plan had been completed. There was agreement that the Single Market Scoreboard should be regularly updated to help maintain progress in building the Internal Market. The Commission gave a progress report on its work on mutual recognition of national standards.

The Commission introduced an open debate on legislative simplification with a report on the simpler Legislation for the Internal Market (SLIM) initiative. The Council expressed general support for continuing SLIM and Business Test Panels, the Commission initiative aimed at improving consultation with business on the likely impact of selected legislative proposals.

The Commission represented reports on: the Expert Committee on Commercial Communications, which is addressing trade barriers in the field of advertising, Public Procurement; a proposal for a directive which aims to set noise limits for tyres; the Euro-Mediterranean partnership and the Single Market; the intervention mechanism aimed at removing obstacles to the Free Movement; the intervention mechanism aimed at removing obstacles to the Free Movement of Goods; and Units of Measurements (Supplementary Indications), with the Commission announcing its intention to extend dual metric-imperial marketing for a further ten years.

The Council reached political agreement on a measure on cableways, which harmonises safety aspect of cableways installations, and on the fee arrangements structure for the European Medicine Evaluation Agency (by a qualified majority with UK and Germany maintaining scrutiny reserves).

The Council also briefly discussed the draft chocolate directive and agreed to reconsider the dossier after further work by the Commission.

Over lunch, Ministers discussed the issue of economic reform and organisation of Council business.

EU Funding (Documents)

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will release documents to the solicitors of C. A. Barnes and Partners of Morebath, Devon in respect of the entry for Bampton, Oakford and Tiverton in the original text of Commission decision 94/197/EC. [60909]

Mrs. Roche: The Department plans to provide documents relating to Bampton, Oakford and Tiverton to Mr. Barnes' solicitors in December.

Raw Milk

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the MMC report into the Supply of Raw Milk to be published; and if he will list all those (a) who have given evidence and (b) who are due to give evidence to the MMC inquiry. [61032]

Dr. Howells: The Monopolies and Mergers Commission (MMC) is due to deliver its report on the supply of raw milk in Great Britain to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by 26 January 1999. The report will be published as soon as practicable after that date. The Department has an administrative (non-statutory) target to publish monopoly reports within 10 weeks of receipt of the report by the Secretary of State from the MMC.

It is the practice of the MMC to list in the published report those parties which have given evidence in the course of the inquiry. It is for the MMC to decide what factors they will take into consideration in the course of their inquiry, and which parties should be asked to give evidence to the inquiry, within the terms of the reference. However, anyone wishing to make their views known to the MMC should write to:

The Reference Secretary (Milk), Monopolies and Mergers Commission, New Court, Carey Street, London WC2A 2JT.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the terms of reference of the MMC inquiry into the supply of raw milk. [61033]

Dr. Howells: The Director General of Fair Trading (DGFT) asked the Monopolies and Mergers Commission (MMC) to investigate the supply of raw milk in Great Britain on 27 January 1998, under the monopoly provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973. The full terms of reference were attached to the DGFT's press notice announcing the referral and I am arranging for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

On 14 September 1998, I announced that I had agreed to a request by the MMC for an extension until 26 January of the time allowed for the inquiry. I am arranging for a copy of that press notice to be placed in the Library of the House.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Intervention Board

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to publish the Annual report and Accounts 1996–97 for the Intervention Board Executive Agency. [61789]

Mr. Nick Brown: I am pleased to advise that the Annual Report and Accounts 1996–97 has been published and copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

DEFENCE

Military Uniforms

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions have been issued by (a) ministers and (b) the chain of command regarding the change of policy on the wearing of military uniforms in public; and if he will make a statement. [60975]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Following the announcement to the House by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 19 October 1998, Official Report, columns 968–69, of the adoption of a more open approach to the wearing of uniform in public, the single-Service Chiefs of Staff each issued guidelines to their respective service. The new guidelines came into force on 1 November 1998 for mainland Great Britain and have since been extended to include those serving abroad, taking due account of local security situations.

The guidelines allow personnel to wear uniform subject to the following caveats:

a. Personnel will not be compelled to wear uniform, other than on duty should they wish to protect their anonymity.

b. Mixed civilian and military clothing is not permitted except to cover up from residence to place of duty using private transport, when an individual or individual's family wish to protect anonymity.

c. The single Services will decide on the forms of uniform that are permissible in public.

d. For practical reasons, civilian clothes will continue to be worn by military staff in selected MOD buildings.

e. Personnel may not wear uniform when representing a third party.

f. Personnel may not consume alcohol, or visit places of entertainment, in uniform, other than on duty.

It is our intention that the adoption of a more open approach to the wearing of uniform in public will increase the visibility of Service personnel in society and enhance the public awareness of Armed Forces.

Kosovo

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the decision was taken under Article J.4.2 of the Maastricht Treaty to use the Western European Union satellite centre in Spain to contribute to monitoring the situation in Kosovo; what will be the cost; and if he will make a statement. [60976]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The WEU Council decided on 25 November 1998 to task its Satellite Centre to carry out general security surveillance of the Kosovo region in accordance with a request under Article J.4.2. of the Treaty on European Union adopted by the EU Council on 13 November. Funding of this operation until the end of the calendar year will be met from the existing WEU Satellite Centre budget. A full cost estimate is not yet available.

NATO Meeting (Virginia)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the British representatives who (a) attended and (b) gave presentations at the NATO meeting in Norfolk, Virginia, on 12 and 13 November; what was discussed; and if he will make a statement. [60977]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The British representatives who attended the meeting in Norfolk were: Mr. Jon Day, Director of Defence Policy, United Kingdom Ministry of Defence; Brigadier Richard Baly, Military Attaché, British Embassy Washington; and Mr. William Shapcott, First Secretary, British Embassy Washington. Mr. Day gave a presentation on the United Kingdom's Strategic Defence Review. The focus of the conference was on improving interoperability between NATO Allies as part of the preparation for the Washington Summit in April 1999.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Arms Agency

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the terms of the agreement he made at the WEU ministerial council in Rome on 16 November to create a European arms agency; if he will list the countries involved; and if he will make a statement. [60979]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Rome WEU Council adopted the conclusions of the Western European Armaments Group (WEAG).

The Defence Ministers of WEAG reaffirmed their intention to create a European Armaments Agency (EAA). They agreed that WEAG's recently developed Masterplan should serve as the basis for further development of the EAA.

WEAG membership comprises: Belgium, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, UK, Iceland, Norway and Turkey.

I have arranged for the conclusions of the WEAG meeting and of the Masterplan to be placed in the library.

Armaments Exports

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the timing and contents of his Department's first annual accounting report of British armaments exports. [61030]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: As to timing, we will publish the Government's first annual report on strategic export controls as soon as is possible. As to its contents, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones), on 14 July 1998, Official Report, column 149.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Rural Policies

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Government's policies for rural areas in England. [61622]

Mr. Prescott: When I announced the Urban White Paper on 20 October 1998, Official Report, column 1064, I said I would be making an announcement shortly about our policies for rural areas.

We have introduced a range of new policies to implement our commitment to sustainable development and to foster a modern, inclusive society with fairness and opportunity for all. Rural communities are an integral part of our vision with the whole country and are already benefiting from our new approach. Our manifesto pledges on education, health, crime and the economy apply just as much to rural areas as to urban. Rural areas have many distinctive features and needs. In our Manifesto, we pledged to recognise these special needs and to stop the decline in rural public and transport services, give greater protection to wildlife, and give greater freedom for people to explore our open countryside.

Already we have taken action to support these pledges. We have given an extra £50 million a year to rural transport; given greater protection to the countryside by increasing the target for housing development on brownfield sites; and announced our decision to bring together the Rural Development Commission and Countryside Commission to create the new Countryside Agency to champion rural England and the English countryside. As a result of the Comprehensive Spending Review, expenditure on DETR countryside programmes will increase very significantly—from £128 million this year to £174 million in 2001–02. We are committed to restoring confidence in the farming industry and have just announced an additional aid package for the UK livestock sector that will be worth some £120 million. We have also secured the lifting of the ban on beef exports. At a regional level, the new Regional Development Agencies will bring a more strategic approach to regional development taking full account of their rural areas.

As our range of new policies bear fruit, we are determined to ensure that they come together in a holistic way to fit rural circumstances. Our vision is of a living, working, accessible and sustainable countryside, with thriving rural communities where public services are properly supported, which is contributing fully to the life and economy of the nation, and where the natural and cultural heritage is conserved and enhanced for everyone to enjoy.

We now propose to set out more details of our vision, and what we are doing to achieve it in a White Paper on rural England. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and I have therefore agreed that preparation of this new White Paper will be led jointly by our two Departments. We will also be working closely with colleagues in many other Departments to ensure that Government activity across the board is tailored and integrated to reflect rural circumstances and the distinctive contribution that rural areas make to all our lives. We will be involving the Countryside Agency and the Regional Development Agencies in drawing up the White Paper.

The White Paper will explore how our policies on matters such as the economy, health, transport, education, housing, crime, agriculture, energy efficiency and planning will support sustainable rural communities and how rural areas can contribute to the fulfilment of the government's objectives in these matters, and give rural people the opportunity to participate fully in our society. It will examine the way we are conserving and enhancing the countryside as a resource and amenity for all to appreciate and enjoy. Most importantly, it will consider how our overall environmental, social and economic objectives will be integrated in rural areas.

The White Paper will assess what more needs to be done by government, other organisation and individuals. We are determined to ensure that the links between towns, cities and rural areas are properly considered. Work on the Rural White Paper will complement that on the Urban White Paper.

There has already been much debate about the countryside. We will continue to listen to views and engage in discussions as we prepare the White Paper. I am sure many organisations and people will wish to contribute.

Rural England is a precious national resource for everyone. Our White Paper will set out a positive new strategy for the future.

Coach Services

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he had with National Express prior to their announcement of the withdrawal of a number of long-distance services. [61443]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he will take to ensure the continued operation of a minimum network of long-distance coach routes. [61442]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have no present plans to change the current arrangements under which the provision of long-distance coach services is a matter for coach operators, in the light of customer demand.

Bus Industry

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will introduce a regulatory framework and a regulator for the bus industry. [61441]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Our proposals for enhancements to the existing regulatory framework for the bus industry were set out in the White Paper 'A New Deal For Transport'.

Rail Franchises

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set out for each of the current rail franchises (a) how many Mark 1 trains are currently in use, (b) what the franchise agreement for each train-operating company originally stated as the replacement date for Mark 1 trains and (c) what revisions have been agreed to the original replacement date. [60907]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The latest information available in terms of rail vehicles is as follows. Where franchises have committed to replacement of Mark 1 stock none of the original replacement dates has been revised.

Operator	Number of Mark 1 vehicles	Franchise commitments for replacement
Connex South Eastern	583	Class 411 stock by September 2000 Class 423 by 2005 and 421 by 2006; all with new build
Connex South Central	602	—
South West Trains	429	—
North Western Trains	75	All with 70 new vehicles by March 2000
Anglia Railways	[1] 1	—
Northern Spirit	63	Class 308 (i.e. all) by December 2000
ScotRail	189	—

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list commercial charter flights used by himself or his Ministers since 1 May 1997. [60897]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Ministers in this Department have not used any commercial charter flights since 1 May 1997.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) following his flight to Blackpool on 26 September, what engagements he undertook while in the Blackpool area; [60896]

(2) what has been the cost to his Department of travel by Ministers in his Department in (i) RAF and (ii) privately chartered aircraft (a) in the year to 1 May 1997 and (b) since 1 May 1997. [60894]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him on 19 November 1998, Official Report, columns 838–39.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions where the flight by a Minister in his Department in an RAF aircraft on 3 May 1997 began and ended; and who were the two people accompanying the Minister. [60895]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 19 November 1998, Official Report, columns 838–39.

The RAF helicopter flight began at Wembley and ended at Kensington Palace. It was the only means by which my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister could travel from Wembley, where he was presenting the Rugby League Challenge Cup in his capacity as Deputy Prime Minister, to Kensington Palace in time to attend the Privy Council meeting to receive his Seals of Office. He was accompanied by my right hon. Friend the Chief Whip and two members of his family.

Millennium Dome (Transport)

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will list the members of the task force which is preparing contingency plans for transport to the Millennium Dome; [60884]

(2) what is the remit for the task force preparing contingency plans for transport to the Dome; [60886]

(3) on what dates the task force preparing contingency plans for transport to the Dome (a) has already met and (b) will be meeting; [60885]

(4) when he expects the task force preparing contingency plans for transport to the Dome to have completed its task. [60887]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have, through my Millennium Access Co-ordination Group, asked London Underground Limited to lead the production of contingency plans for transport to the Millennium Dome. Their remit is to prepare contingency arrangements to manage problems on any of the main transport links to the Dome site.

This work is being undertaken through a working group which involves the following organisations:

Association of London Government (ALG),

Association of Train Operating Companies,

British Transport Police,

Connex South Eastern,

Docklands Light Railway Limited,

Government Office for London,

Great Eastern Railway,

Highways Agency,

London Borough of Greenwich,

London River Services Limited,

London Transport Buses,

New Millennium Experience Company,

Silverlink Trains Limited, and Traffic Director for London.

It was recently expanded to include the ALG, the Borough of Greenwich and the Traffic Director.

The working group has met four times and the fifth meeting is on 30 November. London Underground Limited have also held a number of separate workshops with individual members. Further sessions will be held over the coming months as the plans are developed in more detail.

It is expected that the contingency will be ready to be called upon from Autumn 1999 onwards.

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the expected number of passengers who will travel (i) to the Dome and (ii) from the Dome via (1) Charing Cross, (2) Euston, (3) King's Cross, (4) London Bridge Station, (5) Waterloo International Station, (6) Stratford Station, (7) Liverpool Street Station, (8) Canning Town Station and (9) City Airport, on London Underground (a) Monday to Friday and (b) at weekends during 2000. [61144]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I am advised by London Underground Limited that this information is not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (i) eastbound and (ii) westbound underground trains will pass through North Greenwich station per hour on (a) Monday to Friday and (b) weekends in the year 2000. [61137]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The signalling capacity available by the year 2000 will be 24 trains per hour in each direction. The number of trains run will depend on demand. I understand that London Underground are currently working on the timetable based on projected demand. Details will be made available to the public in advance of line opening.

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the expected number of passengers per hour (a) Monday to Friday and (b) at weekends who will use the Jubilee Line extension to travel (i) to and (ii) from the Dome. [61138]

Ms Glenda Jackson: London Underground's current projected figures for the numbers of passengers who will use the Jubilee line extension to travel to and from the Dome, based on a peak day (which could be any day of the week) are as follows:

Hour	Arriving at Dome	Leaving Dome
0800	570	—
0900	3,990	—
1000	9,690	—
1100	5,130	—
1200	570	—
1300	—	570
1400	—	1,710
1500	—	2,280
1600	2,850	3,420
1700	5,130	4,560
1800	2,280	2,850
1900	1,140	2,280
2000	—	2,280
2100	—	1,710
2200	—	2,280
2300	—	6,270
0000	—	1,140
Totals	31,350	31,350

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the expected times of first and last trains on the Jubilee line extension on (a) Monday to Friday and (b) at weekends at North Greenwich Underground station (i) eastbound and (ii) westbound in the year 2000. [61136]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand that specific times are not yet available, but that London Underground are currently working on the timetable. Details will be made available to the public in advance of the line opening. First and last train times will be similar to those already in operation on the Jubilee Line and elsewhere on the Underground network (i.e. between approximately 0500hrs and 0045hrs, with slightly later opening times on Sundays).

Jubilee Line Extension

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the expected date for opening to the public of each underground station on the Jubilee line extension. [61140]

Ms Glenda Jackson: London Transport, following advice from Bechtel (the international company appointed to oversee the run up to line opening) plan to open the Jubilee Line Extension in three phases, beginning at the eastern end of the line.

London Transport plan to open phase one, between Stratford and North Greenwich, in late Spring 1999. This section includes four stations: Stratford, West Ham, Canning Town and North Greenwich. Phase two is planned for late Summer 1999. This section includes six stations: Canary Wharf, Canada Water, Bermondsey, London Bridge, Southwark and Waterloo. The third and final phase, to complete the extended line by linking Westminster station with the existing line at Green Park, is planned for late Autumn 1999.

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the expected daily opening and closing times of Underground stations on the Jubilee Line Extension in the year 2000. [61139]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Underground station opening times are a matter for London Underground Limited. I understand that Jubilee Line Extension stations will open and close in line with the vast majority of stations elsewhere on the Underground network. On that basis, stations will open between approximately 0500hrs and 0045hrs. Opening times are slightly later on Sundays.

Northern Line

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the difficulties which are delaying the introduction of new trains into service on the Northern Line, stating the date when each one is expected to be resolved. [60890]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This information is not available in the form requested. As I said in my answer to the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman) of 17 November 1998, Official Report, columns 744–45, the delivery of new trains was delayed by more than a year. This was due to design changes specified by London Underground and production problems at ALSTOM's train-building plant.

There have been a number of other problems including the computer software on trains, a delay in delivering the train simulator (and subsequent delays to driver training) and delays in proving that all train systems, such as the CCTV link to train drivers, are operationally satisfactory and reliable. In testing and commissioning new trains, snagging problems arise on each train and are addressed on an on-going basis.

ALSTOM and London Underground are working together to introduce the trains at as fast a rate as possible, and London Underground expects that a full Northern Line service will be provided with new trains by early autumn 1999.

London Underground

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the percentage increase in passenger growth per annum on each London Underground line since 1990; and what the predicted increases are for (i) 1999 and (ii) 2000. [61145]

Ms Glenda Jackson: London Transport do not keep passenger numbers for the years 1992 and 1993 centrally and figures for 1997 are currently being adjusted. However, available figures are as follows:

Passenger numbers per day (in thousands)

	1991	1994	1995	(% increase on 1994)	1996	(% increase on 1995)

[1] Reflects opening of the Jubilee Line Extension

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will list the maximum number of passengers who can be carried by each London Underground line per day (a) Monday to Friday and (b) at weekends in 1998; [61141]

(2) if he will list the expected maximum number of passengers to be carried by each London Underground line per day (a) Monday to Friday and (b) at weekends in 1999; [61142]

(3) if he will list the expected maximum number of passengers to be carried by each London Underground line per day (a) Monday to Friday and (b) at weekends in 2000. [61143]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Such figures could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. They would depend critically on the assumptions made, especially about trip length. (For example, average trip length varies by line: if all customers were to travel just one stop more could be carried than if they all travelled several stops.)

The table gives the figures available from London Transport for the number of train kilometres planned to be run per line per annum.

Train kilometres per annum (in thousands)

	1998–99 (planned)	1990–2000 (planned)	2000–01 (planned)

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 30 November 1998

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Environment Agency

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list (i) the new duties which he plans to give the Environment Agency in England and Wales and (ii) the resources which the Government will provide to the Agency to carry them out; and if he will make a statement. [61194]

Mr. Meale: The Environment Agency will undertake new duties, shortly, under the COMAH and Groundwater Regulations. Other legislation in preparation, such as the Pollution Prevention and Control Bill and regulations on Polychlorinated Biphenyls and Terphenyls, may also place new obligations on the Agency.

In common with the Agency's other regulatory expenditure it is proposed that the annual cost of work on the (CIMAH) Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984 (£1.3m) and on the Groundwater Regulations 1998 (£3m), and the cost of other new obligations will be recovered largely through charges on those regulated. For preparatory work and other costs for which charging is not feasible the Agency may draw on its annual block allocation of grant-in-aid which will be increased to over £106 million in 1999–2000 following this year's Comprehensive Spending Review.

Special Areas of Conservation

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the list of candidate special areas of conservation proposed under the European Council Directive 92/43/EEC on the conservation of natural habitats and of wild fauna and flora will be reviewed to take account of the new research by the World Wide Fund for Nature. [61005]

Mr. Meale: No. The list of candidate sites was selected using a rigorous, iterative scientific process which applied the Directive's site selection criteria. There has also been extensive consultation on the proposals and additions made in the light of earlier comments from WWF and others.

Service Personnel (Council Tax)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to allow service personnel to have their council tax demand waived during periods when they are posted on tours (a) abroad and (b) in Northern Ireland. [60861]

Mr. Raynsford: A person is counted towards the council tax bill at whichever dwelling is considered to be their "sole or main residence". The council tax is essentially a means of contributing towards the cost of providing a range of local services throughout a local area. These services include, for example, education, police and fire services, and highways maintenance. Whether people work in this country or abroad, it is reasonable that they should make a contribution towards the cost of local services where they maintain their sole or main residence. Members of the Armed Forces are treated in the same way as anyone else in determining sole or main residence and we do not have any plans to change this.

Cop-4 Talks

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Cop-4 talks held in Buenos Aires. [61010]

Mr. Prescott: I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, North (Ms Ryan) and to the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on Thursday 19 November, Official Report, columns 837–38.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the Government's policy is on the shipment of United Kingdom nuclear waste to Australia for final disposal and storage. [61009]

Mr. Meale: I am not aware of any proposal to ship United Kingdom nuclear waste to Australia. Under the Radioactive Substances Act 1993, any such proposal would be subject to approval by the competent regulatory authorities in both countries.

Garden Hedges

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received about the growing of high hedges adjacent to the boundaries of residential property; and what policy initiatives he is planning to address the issues raised in the representations. [61663]

Mr. Meale: We have received numerous representations about the growing of hedges adjacent to the boundaries of residential property. Our current policy regarding the problems caused by such hedges was set out in my previous reply to the hon. Member on 28 October 1998, Official Report, columns 164–65.

Train Arrival Times

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish, for each train operating company, the percentage of trains arriving at their destination more than three minutes early. [61656]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This information is not readily available. Such trains would be recorded as having arrived on time according to the definition of "punctual" for the relevant route group in the Franchising Director's performance bulletins, copies of which are in the House Library.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish, for each train operating company, the percentage of (a) London commuter trains, Gatwick Express trains and short distance ex-regional railway trains, arriving at their destination between three minutes and four minutes 59 seconds late, (b) ex-InterCity trains and ex-Regional Railways long distance trains arriving at their destination between five minutes and nine minutes 59 seconds late and (c) ScotRail sleepers arriving at their destination between 10 and 30 minutes late for the latest available period. [61657]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This information is not readily available. Such trains are recorded as having arrived on time according to the definition of "punctual" for the relevant route group in the Franchising Director's performance bulletins, copies of which are in the House Library.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make it his policy to reduce the maximum time trains can be late whilst still being classified as punctual within the criteria set for the Passenger's Charter performance statistics. [61658]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The immediate priority is for train operators and Railtrack to improve the punctuality of services within its current, reasonable definition.

Highway Authorities (Speed Limits)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to be able to release highway authorities from the requirement to seek his Department's approval prior to introducing 20 mph limits on roads for which they have responsibility. [60933]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I shall be introducing secondary legislation shortly in order to remove the consent requirement. I expect the new system to be in operation in the new year.

Connex South Central

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he or his Ministers held with (a) OPRAF and (b) Connex South Central before the decision was taken not to extend the latter's franchise. [61654]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None. However, as required by his Objectives, Instructions and Guidance, the Franchising Director notified the Deputy Prime Minister prior to announcing his decision not to extend Connex South Central's franchise.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reasons the application by Connex South Central to extend its franchise was refused; if he is prepared to consider an amended offer from the company; and if he will make a statement. [61653]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Franchising Director announced in July that he considered that he could obtain better value for money by competitively retendering the franchise on its expiry after seven years. The company cannot make a further offer under the option that was in their original contract. However, we have said that we are prepared in principle to consider proposals to renegotiate franchises to secure additional passenger benefits and commitments to more demanding performance targets.

Road Traffic

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate (a) the rate of road traffic growth which could be expected to occur between 1997 and 2002 if no action was taken to reduce this and (b) the rate of road traffic growth which is now expected to occur following Government action to reduce road traffic growth. [60927]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The 1997 National Road Traffic Forecasts were based on previous policies. The increase in total traffic between 1997 and 2002 implicit in the 1997 central forecasts is 9 per cent.

The Department has begun working on a revised set of forecasts which will reflect the new direction for transport provided by the New Deal. This work involves developing new approaches to forecasting traffic and its environmental and economic effects. Once the Commission for Integrated Transport is established next year, it will be advising the Department on our revised forecasts. One of the first things we will be consulting the Commission on is the alternative forecasting approaches we could use. Once we have the Commission's advice on this question, we will be able to complete our plans and announce a target date for publication.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if it is his policy to set targets for reductions in traffic levels (a) nationally and (b) for particular areas; and if he will make a statement. [60928]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 3 November 1998, Official Report, column 458.

Aircraft Emissions

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the emissions of NO_x from aircraft operating within United Kingdom airspace in each year since 1980. [60930]

Ms Glenda Jackson: No such estimates are produced for the whole of United Kingdom airspace. An annual estimate is made of the NO_x produced by civil aircraft, on domestic or international flights at UK airports, during ground movements and in the landing and take-off cycle, up to 1,000 metres. This is published in the Digest of Environmental Statistics. Information from the Digest for the period 1980 to 1996 (the latest year for which figures are available) is given in the table:

NO_x Emissions 1980–1996

	Thousand tonnes
1980	10
1981	9
1982	10
1983	10
1984	11
1985	11
1986	11

NO_x Emissions 1980–1996

	Thousand tonnes
1987	12
1988	13
1989	14
1990	12
1991	14
1992	14
1993	15
1994	15
1995	16
1996	17

The UK has played a major part in securing reductions in NO_x emissions in standards set by the International Civil Aviation Organisation and will continue to do so.

National Rail Inquiries

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish, for each month since its inception, the average time taken by National Rail Inquiries to answer a call; and if he will make a statement. [61509]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Information on the average time taken to answer a call is not recorded by the National Rail Enquiry Scheme (NRES). NRES is required by the Rail Regulator to answer 90 per cent. of all calls and to record the percentage of calls answered within 30 seconds. The Rail Regulator monitors performance against both targets but his priority has been to ensure that NRES meets its 90 per cent. target. He is currently considering formal enforcement action following recent disappointing performance by NRES.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent assessment he has made of the accuracy of the information provided by National Rail Inquiries in respect of (a) timetable information and (b) price options. [61508]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Following the Rail Regulator's mystery shopping survey into accurate and impartial retailing last year, the Association of Train Operation Companies (ATOC) agreed to carry out further similar surveys. ATOC is currently carrying out surveys into the accuracy of information provided by both the National Rail Enquiry Scheme and station ticket offices. The results are expected to be published early next year.

French Nuclear Reactors

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the recent Greenpeace report on the impact on the United Kingdom of emissions from French nuclear reactors; and if he will make a statement. [60942]

Mr. Meale: My Department has not received a copy of the report referred to, but it is understood from the Greenpeace press release that it relates to computer modelling of the dispersal of aerial discharges from the La Hague nuclear reprocessing plant.

I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on Thursday 17 November 1998, Official Report, columns 487–88.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of measurable radioactivity recorded in southern England is attributable to emissions from French nuclear reactors. [60943]

Mr. Meale: Measured levels of radioactivity in air, rainwater, lakes and reservoirs, and radiation levels over beaches in southern England are indistinguishable from levels of both natural origin and from atmospheric testing of nuclear weapons and the Chernobyl reactor accident. The low levels of man-made radioactivity found in marine foodstuffs and sediments sampled from the coastal waters of Southern England cannot be attributed to particular sources.

Cyclists and Pedestrians

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will introduce targets for reductions in casualties among (a) cyclists and (b) pedestrians expressed in terms of casualties per mile travelled. [60932]

Ms Glenda Jackson: On 15 October 1997 the Government announced that they will be setting new road safety targets for Great Britain for the year 2010. There will be one target figure for the reduction in road accident deaths and serious injuries, and another for slight injuries. We are still considering the details of the target.

Rail Electrification

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list, for each EU country, the percentage of rail track operated for passenger purposes which was electrified in (a) 1977, (b) 1987 and (c) 1997. [61655]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Department does not collect statistics separately for electrified passenger track. However, for the years for which statistics are available, the percentage of electrified track in each EU Member State is:

Percentage

Country	1975	1987	1996
Austria	46	54	60
Belgium	32	61	73
Denmark	4	8	17
Finland	7	25	35
France	27	34	45
Germany	25	34	45
Greece	0	0	0
Irish Republic	0	0	2
Italy[1]	49	57	64
Luxembourg	33	67	95
Netherlands	61	68	73
Portugal	11	14	22
Spain	27	44	56
Sweden	62	64	68
United Kingdom	20	25	30

Dangerous Driving

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the charge of dangerous driving and the appropriateness of the criteria which must be met before such a charge can successfully be brought. [60935]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Transport Research Laboratory is undertaking a research project to discover more about the process whereby charges are brought and prosecuted for dangerous driving, including the application of the criterion in section 2A of the Road Traffic Act 1988, or for the lesser charge of careless driving.

Shadow Strategic Rail Authority

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reason the Chair of the Shadow Strategic Rail Authority will be required to work only two and a half days a week. [61652]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have advertised this appointment of approximately 2.5 days a week because we judge this to be the right time commitment for the job of leading the British Railways Board as part of the Shadow Strategic Rail Authority and, subject to legislation, the SRA proper with its full-time Chief Executive.

Packaging Waste

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the current review of packaging regulations will cover the benefits for supermarkets from their back of store waste and the effects of such benefits on others in the packaging chain. [61499]

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans his Department has to increase retailers' obligations under the packaging and waste regulations. [61636]

Mr. Meale: The review of the Producer Responsibility Obligations (Packaging Waste) Regulations 1997 covered a range of issues as set out by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment (Mr. Meacher) in his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) on 17 December 1997, Official Report, columns 193–94.

Each of the four main sectors may have back-door waste to some extent. Those businesses that do have such waste are likely to use it towards the discharge of their obligations. Retailers are likely to have larger quantities of back-door waste than other businesses, but will incur costs in making that material available. They also carry a higher share of the burden. A share-out of the burden between industry sectors was agreed on the 15 December 1995, and that industry agreement is the basis of the present Regulations. Each sector's "activity" obligations in the regulations are:

Sector	15 December 1995 Agreed share of the burden %	Activity obligation in the Regulations %
Raw Material Manufacturer	5.5	6
Convertor	14.5	11
Packer/Filler	35	36
Sellers/Retailers	45	47

Proposed Golf Course (Buckinghamshire)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will announce the decision on the application to develop a golf course on the ancient woodland site at Penn, Buckinghamshire. [61498]

Mr. Raynsford: The Inspector's Report following his site visit is currently being considered. It is anticipated that the decision will be issued by the end of the year.

Building Regulations

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what account was taken of the accessibility of blocks of flats in the decision to extend part M of the building regulations to housing in October; and if he will make a statement. [61651]

Mr. Raynsford: The Building Regulations (Amendment) Regulations 1998 (SI 1998 No. 2561) made on 26 October 1998 modified Part M in Schedule 1 to the Building Regulations 1991 (SI 1991 No. 2768) to apply requirements on access and facilities for disabled people to the design and construction of dwellings. The definition of dwelling in the 1991 regulations includes dwelling houses and flats.

The revised Approved Document published to provide practical guidance on satisfying the amended requirements applies to all dwellings, including flats, and also includes guidance on passenger lifts and common stairs in blocks of flats.

Four Star Petrol

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to ban the use of four star petrol. [61505]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Four star leaded petrol will be banned from general sale from 1 January 2000 under regulations currently being prepared. The regulations will allow the continuance of a very limited supply of leaded petrol for use by historic vehicles. The Department is well advanced in preparing publicity material for motorists that currently use leaded petrol and further details will be announced very shortly.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Flooding (Brindley Ford)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on recent flooding at Brindley Ford arising from the Coal Authority's maintenance of the nearby opencast coal site. [61191]

Mr. Battle: Following heavy rain in late October, flooding occurred at Brindley Ford to the south of the former Brownlees opencast site, part of which is owned by the Coal Authority.

The authority is currently investigating, in association with the Environment Agency, Staffordshire county council, and Stoke-on-Trent city council, the water management at the locality to identify the cause of the flooding and ways of dealing with it.

Textiles Industry

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the role of London Fashion Week in promoting the United Kingdom textile industry; and if he will make a statement. [61646]

Mr. Battle: My Department is one of the supporters of London Fashion Week and we therefore assess its effectiveness in promoting the UK textiles and clothing sector each time it takes place.

London Fashion Week is an important showcase for British design talent. Many of the designers whose profiles were initially raised by London Fashion Week are now working closely with UK producers of textiles and clothing, as well as with UK retailers, to provide a competitive design edge to existing ranges, and to help develop new and innovative products. London Fashion Week also plays an important role in projecting the image of British fashion and textiles world-wide.

Strategic Export Controls (White Paper)

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what were the results of the public consultation following publication of the White Paper on Strategic Export Controls; and if he will make a statement. [61814]

Mr. Mandelson: The Department has received 54 responses to the White Paper on Strategic Export Controls. I am placing copies of the responses, except two for which complete confidentiality has been requested, in the Libraries of both Houses and in the Library of the Department. I have also arranged for copies of the responses to be made available on request from the Department's Export Control Organisation.

We are currently reviewing our proposals in the light of the responses received, and will make a further announcement in due course.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Women's Boxing

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to (a) ban or (b) place restrictions on women's boxing. [61008]

Mr. Banks: The Department has no plans either to ban or to place any restrictions on women's boxing.

I appreciate the strength of feeling on this issue, but I should stress that the Government do not control boxing—or, indeed, any other sport in this country. We are, of course, keen to see that the proper medical safeguards and regulations are in place for all sports, especially those which may carry a higher level of physical contact, and believe that the sport's governing bodies should remain primarily responsible for this.

Grade II Listed Sites

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what responsibilities attach to owners of Grade II listed sites. [61133]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 27 November 1998]: Grade II listed buildings form an important part of the nation's historic environment, for which we all share responsibility. The Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservation Areas) Act 1990 requires the owner of any listed building to obtain listed building consent for any works of demolition or for any works of alteration or extension which would affect its character as a building of special architectural or historic interest. The carrying out of such works without prior consent is a criminal offence.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what grants are available to the owners of Grade II listed sites. [61134]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 27 November 1998]: Grade II listed buildings in conservation areas are eligible for grant funding from English Heritage. The Heritage Lottery Fund can also provide funding for any grade of listed building provided that the application meets their assessment criteria.

Local authorities have powers to give grants for any buildings of special architectural or historic interest. They can give grants up to 50 per cent. of costs, and authorities may also make interest-free loans rather than grants, using the same criteria.

Further information on other sources of funding may be found in the Directory of Grant Making Trusts published by the Charities Aid Foundation, available from public libraries, and Funds for Historic Buildings published by the Architectural Heritage Fund, Clareville House, 26–27 Oxendon Street, London SW1Y 4EL.

New Opportunities Fund (Scotland)

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what changes he proposes to make to the operation of the New Opportunities Fund's three operational themes in Scotland after the establishment of the Scottish Parliament; and if he will make a statement. [61029]

Mr. Banks [holding answer 27 November 1998]: The framework for the New Opportunities Fund's first three initiatives (healthy living centres, out of school hours activities and childcare, and ICT training for teachers and librarians) already reflects the particular circumstances in Scotland, and each initiative has a specific funding allocation which must be spent on projects in Scotland. Any further initiatives established before the creation of the Scottish Parliament will also take into account the differing needs of each part of the United Kingdom, including Scotland.

After the establishment of the Scottish Parliament, Scottish Ministers will be able to make Orders or Directions in relation to initiatives applying in Scotland only, and as appropriate make Directions in relation to the application in Scotland of UK wide initiatives, after consultation with and, where necessary, the consent of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. My right hon. Friend will remain responsible for Orders or Directions relating to UK wide initiatives, after consultation with Scottish Ministers. The details of these arrangements are still under consideration.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Telephone Lines

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee what plans he has to ensure that hon. Members have access to ISDN telephone lines. [61438]

Mr. Richard Allan: An hon. Member who has a specific communications requirement concerning his Parliamentary duties should raise the matter with the Director of Communications. The provision of communications, including ISDN, at locations outside the Parliamentary Estate is currently being considered, and the Information Committee will be discussing this in the new year.

DEFENCE

Territorial Army

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many vacancies there were for the Territorial Army and Voluntary Reserve (a) in May 1997 and (b) at the latest date for which figures are available. [60860]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The Territorial Army establishment in May 1997 was 59,000 posts, of which 55,900 were filled. In October 1998, the latest date for which figures are available, the establishment was also 59,000 posts, of which 53,847 were filled.

Service Personnel (Electoral Roll)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what procedures exist for service personnel to be registered on the electoral roll; and what proposals he has to increase the number of registrations. [60862]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Service personnel may vote only when they are registered as Service Voters. The Representation of the People Act 1993 obliges my Department to ensure that all eligible members of the Armed Forces and their spouses are given the opportunity and adequate assistance to register as Service voters. To register, personnel make a Service declaration to the electoral registration officer for the area in which the applicant's qualifying address is situated, and this single registration remains valid throughout a Service career. Spouses may register as either Service or civilian voters.

Queen's Regulations for all three Services contain detailed information on the timetable for submitting declarations to ensure inclusion in the register of electors for Parliamentary, European Parliament and local government elections.

Instructions on the action required to make initial Service declarations or to make new ones on any change of address are also included in the Regulations. In addition, each Service issues formal reminders annually describing the registration procedures and listing the relevant forms to be completed. The reminders draw attention in particular to the need to re-register or to amend qualifying addresses where necessary. Commanding Officers are made personally responsible for ensuring that unit administrative arrangements are efficient and that units hold sufficient forms, and are regularly formally reminded of their responsibilities.

We will continue to employ these measures to encourage Service personnel to register and to vote, but doing so is, of course, a matter of personal choice.

Soldiers (New Entrants)

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what financial assistance is available to new entrant soldiers who are themselves on income support, or whose parents are, towards the cost of equipment and supplies which they are required to purchase and to meet obligatory insurance costs. [60921]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 27 November 1998]: All new entrant soldiers are given an advance of pay, equivalent to one day's pay, when they are attested at a recruiting office, regardless of whether they, or their parents, are in receipt of income support. This advance is intended to cover the purchase of small personal items a new soldier may require. Any equipment a soldier needs to perform his or her duties is provided by the Army.

My Department places no obligation on new entrants to the Army to take out insurance cover, but applicants are advised to insure their personal belongings, and any military equipment they are issued with against loss or damage for which the holder would be held responsible. New entrants are also advised to consider the purchase of personal accident or life insurance.

Freedom of Information

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the changes in departmental practices which would be required to comply with the planned Freedom of Information Act. [61512]

Mr. Spellar: The Ministry of Defence is already committed to greater openness in its work and currently operates in accordance with the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. The Department's policy is that staff should take a positive approach towards the release of information. Details of MOD's policy and guidance to staff can be found on the Department's internet site at http://www.mod.uk/policy/opengovt/index.htm. Once the details of the draft FoI Bill have been finalised, instructions, advice and training will be available for staff in order to ensure that they are able to implement the Act and to foster an open culture.

SCOTLAND

Kincardine Bridge

Ms Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he plans to make an announcement on the replacement of the Kincardine Bridge. [61162]

Mr. Macdonald: I am announcing today my decision on a preferred line for a new crossing of the Forth in the vicinity of Kincardine. I have decided that, subject to the necessary statutory procedures, a new crossing should be built on an alignment approximately 2 kilometres upstream from the existing crossing at Kincardine. The new crossing will be used in conjunction with the existing bridge which will be refurbished. A new short Kincardine Eastern Link Road will also be constructed to link with the existing bridge and divert traffic travelling to and from Fife away from the centre of Kincardine village. My decision has taken full account of the five criteria—economy, environmental impact, safety, accessibility and integration—which the Government use to appraise trunk road investment. The sensitive ecology of the Forth Estuary meant that environmental considerations were particularly important. I am aware that the new crossing will potentially have an adverse visual impact on the village of Airth and every effort will be made to mitigate this.

My decision means that the further preparatory work which is required before construction can begin can now be commissioned and the Comprehensive Spending Review has provided resources for this. I am not able, at this stage, to give a firm indication of when construction will begin. The time needed to complete the preparatory work means that, in all probability, construction could not begin before 2003.

I have written to my hon. Friend giving her further details of my decision and I shall arrange for a copy of my letter to be placed in the Library of the House.

Dounreay

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the UKAEA has yet responded to the HSE/SEPA report on the management of safety at Dounreay; and if he will make a statement. [62010]

Mr. Dewar: Safety at Dounreay remains paramount and I am keeping closely in touch with developments there. The United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority has today published an action plan in response to the audit of the management of safety at Dounreay carried out earlier this year by the Health and Safety Executive and Scottish Environment Protection Agency. I have arranged for the action plan to be placed in the House of Commons Library.

Management and staff at Dounreay have worked very hard to produce this response to the many recommendations contained in the audit report. They have shown that they are taking the audit very seriously indeed. There are a number of points of detail which need to be discussed further, and there are issues of timing which need to be refined. Nonetheless this is an encouraging first step on what will be a long journey to bring the plant up to the standards expected of a modern nuclear licensee.

I expect UKAEA management to press ahead with implementation of the action plan as soon as it has been agreed by the plant's regulators. This will build on the actions already underway.

CABINET OFFICE

Ministers' Severance Payments

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what has been the total amount spent on severance payments to those who have resigned, retired or been dismissed from ministerial office since 1 May 1997, broken down by ministry. [61516]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The Ministerial and Other Pensions and Salaries Act 1991 entitles Ministers (except the Prime Minister and the Lord Chancellor) to a severance payment of one quarter of their ministerial salary on leaving office.

The information requested is set out in the table.

Department	Amount (£)
Cabinet Office	11,300.25
Culture, Media and Sport	14,063.50
Environment, Transport and the Regions	11,300.25
HM Treasury	15,281.75
Northern Ireland Office	6,068.25
Social Security	19,295.50
Scottish Office	5,905.75
Trade and Industry	6,068.25
Welsh Office	17,368.50
Total	106,652.00

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Schools (Absenteeism)

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will commission research into staff absenteeism rates in schools (a) prior to and (b) following OFSTED inspections. [60880]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Department's research programme is considered as a whole so that research priorities can be weighed against each other. The programme for 1999–2000 is under consideration and such research can be considered in that context, alongside other research priorities.

Key Stage 3

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what representations he has received on this year's Key Stage 3 tests in English, Maths and Science; and if he will make a statement; [61001]

(2) what representations he has received on the percentage increases in the achievement of levels 6 and 7 in English in 14 year olds and over since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [61002]

Ms Estelle Morris: Forty letters have been received about Key Stage 3 English, mathematics and science; no letters have been received specifically about the percentage increase in the overall attainment in levels 6 and 7 in Key Stage 3 English since 1997 and 1998. Pupils and teachers are congratulated on the improvement in English performance this year. The mathematics and science results demonstrate the need to maintain our focus on raising levels of attainment. The Government are fully committed to raising standards in schools. This is why we have asked schools to set themselves challenging targets for pupil attainment, and why we are investing an additional £16 billion in education in England over the next three years.

New Start Partnerships

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps he will take to ensure that the training provided by the expanded New Start programme will target the needs of industry. [61173]

Mr. Mudie: We are encouraging employers to play a full part in all New Start partnerships, which aim to re-engage young people in learning, often through work related activities.

They will also have opportunities to influence the local strategic Lifelong Learning Partnerships to be established next year.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the numbers of claimants on jobseeker's allowance who were called in to attend interviews whilst taking their holiday entitlement in the United Kingdom in each year since 1996. [61195]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Richard Burden, dated November 1998:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply direct to your question regarding the number of claimants on Jobseeker's Allowance who were called in to attend interviews whilst taking their holiday entitlement in the United Kingdom in each year since 1996. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

I regret that the Employment Service does not collect statistics of the number of jobseekers who are called in to the Jobcentre to attend interviews during their holiday. In practice, this situation should not occur frequently as interviews can be rearranged if Jobcentre staff are aware in advance that a jobseeker is away from home.

I am sorry that I cannot be more helpful.

Employment Service

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will establish website pages for each Employment Service region setting out the names and addresses of each contractor and sub-contractor supplying New Deal service contracts in each district. [61624]

Mr. Andrew Smith: We have no present plans to include this level of local detail on the New Deal website but I am examining how we can best use the internet for the New Deals and Employment Services more generally, and will include this suggestion in the examination. For now, those who wish to find out more about local provision should initially contact either the appropriate Jobcentre or the Employment Service District Manager.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the reasons for the Employment Service's failure to meet its target for 1997–98 for placing people on Training for Work. [61075]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Employment Service (ES) placed 130,600 people on training for work in 1997–98, against a target of 150,000 placings.

The assumptions on which the target was based proved mistaken in two respects. Training for Work employed status starts (which did not count towards the ES target) and direct recruitment by TECs/LECs were both higher than planned. This reduced the ability of the ES to meet its target. However, the ES share of non-employed Training for Work starts, as 81 per cent., met the Government's expectations.

Overall, the Government's target of 180,000 Training for Work starts in England was exceeded, with over 183,000 starts being achieved. This achievement would not have been possible without the strong support given to TECs/LECs by the ES.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list by region the number of staff employed by the Employment Service in (a) 1997–98, (b) 1996–97, (c) 1995–96 and (d) 1994–95. [61076]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Don Foster, dated November 1998:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question regarding the number of staff who are employed by the Employment Service, listed by region, in (a) 1997–98, (b) 1996–97, (c) 1995–96 and (d) 1994–95. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Employment Service.

I have recorded below a breakdown by region and by Scotland and Wales of the number of staff in post as at 1 April for 1998, 1997, 1996 and 1995. These figures include temporary and fixed term appointees as well as permanent staff. People who are on career breaks or absent for any reason beyond three months are excluded from these figures.

Employment Service—staff in post—1 April 1995–98

Region/country	Staff in post as at 1 April 1998	1997	1996	1995
Scotland	3,552	3,479	4,098	3,884
Northern	1,877	1,938	2,443	2,438
Yorkshire and the Humber	3,108	3,000	3,736	3,754
North West	4,606	4,071	5,150	4,360
East Midlands and Eastern	2,963	3,061	3,640	3,800
West Midlands	2,811	2,913	3,535	5,158
Wales	1,895	1,803	2,151	2,296
London and South East	8,163	9,530	11,326	12,304
South West	2,398	2,638	3,094	3,358
Head Office	2,155	1,741	1,983	2,027
Total	33,528	34,174	41,156	43,379

I hope this is helpful.

Work-based Training

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he has set a target for the number of people to be placed on Work-based Training for Adults in 1998–99. [61073]

Mr. Mudie: The target for the number of people to be placed on work-based training for adults in 1998–99 is 120,000.

Dyslexia

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how many primary schools provide computers with voice-driven software for dyslexic students; [60961]

(2) how many secondary schools provide an audio tape library for dyslexic pupils; [60962]

(3) how many secondary schools provide computers with voice-driven software for dyslexic pupils; [60963]

(4) how many primary schools provide an audio tape library for dyslexic pupils. [60964]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is not held centrally. Schools are expected to explore the possible benefits of and, where practicable, secure access for a child to appropriate information communications technology. Where such equipment is identified as educational provision and it appears in Part 3 of a statement of special educational needs the local education authority has a duty to see that the equipment is provided.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the cost of screening all rising fives for dyslexia. [60953]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This information is not held centrally. The Education Act 1996 states that those responsible for a nursery school's governance shall use their best endeavours to secure that appropriate special educational provision is made for all their registered pupils with learning difficulties. Local education authorities expect that they will follow broadly the same procedures for identifying and meeting these needs as the Code of Practice on the Identification and Assessment of Special Educational Needs recommends for children of compulsory school age.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received on the ring fencing of special education funds for dyslexia. [60957]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government's plans for the further development of financial delegation to schools will require local education authorities to inform schools what part of their budgets are set with reference to pupils' special educational needs, but will continue to give governing bodies flexibility to decide their actual spending on special needs within the total budgets available to them. The majority of consultation responses on this proposal welcomed the clarity it would bring but were opposed to ring fencing an element of school budgets for special needs.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice is offered by his Department to selective entry schools on making special provision for the needs of dyslexic children in entrance tests. [61197]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Children with special educational needs but without statements must be treated as fairly as other applicants. Admission authorities may not refuse to admit a pupil because they consider themselves unable to cater for his or her special educational needs. Admission authorities must consider applications from children who have special educational needs but no statement, on the basis of the school's published admission criteria. They cannot refuse to admit a pupil on the grounds that he or she does not have a statement of special educational needs, or is currently being assessed for one. Where admission authorities give some priority to children with special educational needs but without a statement, their published admission arrangements should state in what way their arrangements differ for such children.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many children in each local education authority area are identified as being dyslexic in the most recently available figures. [60952]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Provisions in the Education Act 1981, now consolidated into the Education Act 1996, require schools to submit information on numbers of pupils with special educational needs. There is no requirement for them to record the nature of the disability or learning difficulty. The Statistical Bulletin Special Educational Needs in England published annually summarises the information available on special educational needs. This includes details of pupils with statements by local education authority area and region, and details of pupils, with and without statements, in maintained primary and secondary schools by local education authority area and region.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the methods used by local education authorities to identify children with dyslexia; and if he will publish the guidelines. [60949]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Guidance to help schools and local education authorities identify and assess children with specific learning difficulties, which includes dyslexia, is contained in the Code of Practice on the Identification and Assessment of Special Educational Needs. The Code was published in May 1994.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what information he has on the number of unemployed people who are identified as dyslexic during a jobseeker's allowance interview. [60965]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, dated November 1998:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply direct to your question concerning the number of people who are identified as dyslexic during a Jobseeker's Allowance interview. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

The Employment Service does not keep statistics on the number of unemployed people identified as having dyslexia. Where an individual is identified as having dyslexia they can be referred to a Disability Employment Adviser for specialist support to help them find employment.

I am sorry that I cannot be more helpful on this occasion.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if he will publish the amount spent per local education authority on (a) identifying children with dyslexia and (b) educational support for such children in the last year for which figures are available; [60954]

(2) what is his estimate of the amount of specialist help in terms of (a) cost and (b) time given to each dyslexic child through stages one to five; [60955]

(3) what monitoring of expenditure by local education authorities on dyslexia is undertaken by his Department; and if he will make a statement; [60956]

(4) what estimate he has made of the time allotted by each local education authority to dyslexic children for special help for each of stages one to five in the last year for which figures are available. [60958]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Department does not collect information on time spent or cost of education provision made by type of special educational need per local education authority or school. The Education Act 1996 and Code of Practice on the Identification and Assessment of Special Educational Needs recognises that every child has individual needs, including those children with dyslexia, and requires that local education authorities shall have regard to their duty to meet those needs. Similarly, school governing bodies shall use their best endeavours to see that they provide for pupils with special educational needs. This implies that children whose dyslexia requires special provision should have their educational needs identified and provided for appropriately.

Teachers (Flu Injections)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to offer teachers free flu injections; what estimate he has of the number of days off work which would be saved if such injections were available; and if he will make a statement. [60929]

Mr. Charles Clarke: My right hon. Friend is advised on this issue by the Department of Health which has issued specific recommendations about the risk groups who are offered annual influenza immunisation. He has no plans to offer teachers free flu injections outside the Department of Health recommendations and has made no estimate of the number of days off work that would be saved. He has asked the Local Government Association to survey Local Education Authorities on the extent of teacher sickness absence as part of the wider initiative on managing sickness absence in the public sector.

Special Needs

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what factors are taken into account when classifying children as having moderate learning difficulties; what plans he has to review the statementing system; and if he will make a statement. [61502]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Code of Practice on the identification and assessment of special educational needs includes guidance on the factors to be taken into account in deciding whether a child with learning difficulties should be given a statement. These include whether the child is working at a level significantly below his contemporaries in any of the core subjects of the National Curriculum; whether there is evidence that the child is falling progressively behind the majority of children of his or her age in academic attainment; whether there is evidence of impaired social interaction or communication; and whether the child has a significantly restricted repertoire of activities, interests and imaginative development. The recent publication "Meeting Special Educational Needs: A programme of action" makes it clear that the Government have no intention of removing the legal protection offered by statements or of constraining parents' access to a statutory assessment where they believe it is necessary. There are however wide variations between LEAs in making statements. The Government therefore propose to publish non-statutory guidance on criteria for statements drawing on a range of examples of current practice.

Disabled Students

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he intends to respond to the findings of the Snowdon Survey on financial considerations relating to students with disabilities. [61511]

Ms Hodge: The Government will respond to the Snowdon Survey recommendations in due course, after the results of the Scheme's consultation on the survey have been received.

New Deal (Planning Assumptions)

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the planning assumptions on which the New Deal pilots for over 25s are based, indicating the proportion of each part of the client group that the Government would usually expect, in the absence of the New Deal, to leave jobseeker's allowance within six months of reaching (a) 12 months, (b) 18 months and (c) 24 months unemployment and the indicative information the Government have about the proportion of jobseeker's allowance leavers who, in the absence of the New Deal, would go into jobs. [61081]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The specification, including off-flow rates from JSA, is in the Library.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the planning assumptions on which each New Deal model, excluding the New Deal pilots for over 25s, are based, indicating the proportion of each client group that the Government would usually expect, in the absence of the New Deal, to leave jobseeker's allowance within six months of reaching (a) six months, (b) 12 months, (c) 18 months and (d) 24 months unemployment and the indicative information the Government have about the proportion of jobseeker's allowance leavers in each client group who, in the absence of the New Deal, would go into jobs. [61079]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I have placed the individual New Deal planning assumptions for each of the 143 Units of Delivery in the Libraries.

A-levels

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list, for the most recent year for which survey information is available, the percentage of A level grades which are forecast (a) correctly, (b) too low, (c) too high and (d) too high by two grades or more; and if he will list each by school type. [61077]

Mr. Mudie: This information is not collected by the Department.

Construction Industry Training Boards

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the percentage increase in pay settlements awarded by the CITB and ECITB for the next financial year. [61631]

Mr. Mudie: On 1 August 1998 the CITB awarded a 3.75% pay increase to its staff and the ECITB awarded an increase of 5%. In each case the awards are applicable to 31 July 1999.

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the percentage increase in the levy charged to their in-scope companies by the CITB and ECITB for the next financial year. [61632]

Mr. Mudie: CITB proposes to raise a two-part levy in the next financial year with an increase of 0.09% in the percentage rate of payroll, from 0.29% to 0.38% for direct employees and no increase in the percentage rate for net payments to labour only subcontractors. ECITB is not proposing any increase in the next financial year.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Attorney-General what steps have been taken to implement the recommendations of the report of the Review of the Crown Prosecution Service by the Right Hon. Sir Iain Glidewell. [62017]

The Attorney-General: My statement to the House on publication of the Glidewell Report on 1 June 1998, Official Report, column 42, undertook to publish a formal response setting out the Government response to each recommendation, whether it would be implemented and, if so, how. I then said that a plan of action would be drawn up and published.

A programme of change based on recommendations made by the Glidewell Report and our prior decision to restructure the Crown Prosecution Service into 42 areas is being taken forward briskly under the leadership of Mr. David Calvert-Smith QC, whose appointment as Director of Public Prosecutions took effect on 1 November, and Mr. Mark Addison, who was appointed Chief Executive on 5 June. They expect to take decisions in the near future about the senior management structure within CPS headquarters and an open competition for the appointment of Chief Crown Prosecutors for each of the 42 new areas commenced with the placing of advertisements on 16 November. The selection process for the Area Business Managers recommended by the Glidewell Report is currently under way.

All this will be taken forward within the framework of the Government's overall strategy for developing a properly co-ordinated criminal justice system working to a common set of overarching aims and objectives. The emphasis will be on clear central policies for the criminal justice system delivered locally.

The objectives set for the change programme are:

The organisation should be taken as an opportunity for a fresh start for the CPS, building on the achievements of the past 12 years;

The development of a form of CPS management at both national and local levels which reflects the new structure and the demands of a decentralised national service;

CPS priorities should be reordered to focus more on the core business of prosecuting, placing greater emphasis on the more serious cases and providing greater separation of management from legal work, greater autonomy for the areas and better prospects for staff;

The agencies which make up the criminal justice system should have shared and mutually reinforcing objectives, and should co-operate together to achieve better results across the system as a whole, in accordance with the Government's decisions on the outcome of the cross-cutting spending review of the criminal justice system;

Decisions on the Glidewell recommendations should be reached as soon as possible and implementation of those decisions should be rapid and purposeful taking account of the need for phasing to provide a smooth transition and to contain costs.

Detailed consideration of the recommendations contained in the Glidewell Report has taken one of two forms. First, the Chief Executive has been energetically pursuing recommendations specific to the CPS with the support of an internal steering group and working parties to consider specific issues. He as also put in place mechanisms for obtaining the views of CPS staff at all levels. This has included work on internal structures, training, career prospects, central and special casework and the development of an independent element for the CPS Inspectorate.

Secondly, those recommendations which also affect other criminal justice agencies have been the subject of consideration within existing or specially established inter-departmental groups. The work is being carried forward under the auspices of the Strategic Planning Group which the Home Secretary, myself and the Lord Chancellor established earlier this year to co-ordinate planning within the criminal justice system. I have today placed in the Library of the House a chart setting out the present position in relation to each of the recommendations in the Glidewell Report. It shows those which have been accepted, in whole or in part, and the manner in which consideration of the remaining recommendations is being progressed, together with the anticipated timetable. Of the recommendations internal to the CPS, it is proposed that 39 should be accepted, in whole or in part, with 13 under consideration, considered or noted. Of the 23 inter-agency recommendations, 7 have been accepted, wholly or in part, with 16 remaining under consideration or considered.

My statement to the House on 1 June contained an invitation to interested parties to comment on the recommendations made in the Glidewell Report. I am grateful to all those who took the trouble to respond for the care and effort which went into their responses. These have been carefully considered and will continue to inform decisions about those recommendations still under consideration.

I draw the attention of my hon. Friend to three specific aspects of the work so far undertaken. First, the recommendations in respect of Criminal Justice Units (recommendations 13–16 and 20) contain some of the most important and sensitive proposals in the Report. It recommended greater priority for all casework and sees the working arrangements between the CPS and the police service as crucial to successful handling of casework and therefore to achieving that priority. Acceptance would lead to major changes in the way in which CPS officers and the police operate. They are being considered by a newly formed Criminal Justice Units Project Group, which is chaired jointly by the CPS and the Association of Chief Police Officers. The issues raised will inevitably take some time to address, but it is hoped conclusions can be reached in the Spring of 1999 so as to provide the new Chief Crown Prosecutors with a firm basis for planning the operations in their areas. The proposal for the establishment of Trial Units (recommendation 18) is so closely linked to the question of Criminal Justice Units that it must remain under consideration until the position in that respect is clearer.

Secondly, the Report contains a number of recommendations (recommendations 21, 22 and 26) concerning the CPS's relationship with the courts, and suggests that the CPS should play a greater part in the listing of cases in both the Magistrates' Courts and the Crown Court. These recommendations are accepted.

Listing is ultimately the sole responsibility of the courts. The CPS, however, should play a close part in co-operative arrangements among all relevant agencies, necessary to ensure effective listing by the courts. The text of the report makes clear that greater involvement of the CPS in Magistrates' Courts listing would come about only by agreement, at local level, between the courts and the CPS. Although it should not inhibit CPS liaison and closer involvement in the overall listing process, any such agreement must recognise that the courts are the neutral and independent arbiters of the cases brought before them, and that a decision concerning the listing of an individual case is ultimately a judicial function.

Co-operation is needed at a local level to ensure that listing practices are effective and bring about significant improvements in, for example, the level of cracked and ineffective trials. In the Crown Court, improved case preparation and inter-agency moves towards better case management should lead to more effective listing practices, ensuring that cases are prepared and listed for trial more quickly.

Thirdly, the Glidewell Report made recommendations (68 to 72) for changes to the structure and remit of the CPS Inspectorate to incorporate a greater independent element. Those recommendations are being accepted in principle but with some modifications as to the detail. I propose that in future the CPS Inspectorate should be headed by a Chief Inspector appointed by me who would report to me. I also propose that there should be a non-executive Advisory Board which would include a lay member and that Inspectorate staff would include as well as CPS staff on secondment some individuals from outside the CPS. In addition, I propose that the remit of the Inspectorate should be widened to include performance efficiency and effectiveness so that it examines not only the quality of casework decisions and casework decision-making processes (as it does now), but also any other areas of CPS performance where they impact on issues surrounding casework, excluding financial audit. Consideration will be given to whether these arrangements should be placed on a statutory footing.

I take this opportunity to commend all those who have participated in the work so far undertaken, whether within the CPS or in other criminal justice agencies, on the progress made. I am confident that the position we have reached provides a sound basis for the CPS to go forward as a national but decentralised service with effect from April 1999 and so obtain maximum benefit from the "fresh start" which the Glidewell Report advocated.

I shall provide the House with a further report in the first half of 1999.

Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Attorney-General how many wasted costs orders have been made by courts against the Crown Prosecution Service in (i) 1996–97, (ii) 1997–98 and (iii) 1998–99 to date, with the breakdown of each Crown Prosecution Service Area and the total sums for such areas and further broken down by the Crown courts and the magistrates courts. [61161]

The Attorney-General: Wasted cost orders are usually understood to be orders against individuals pursuant to section 19A of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985. These are extremely rare in relation to representatives of the Crown Prosecution Service.

My hon. Friend's question is taken to refer to orders made under section 19(1) of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985, and regulation 3 of the Costs in Criminal Cases (General) Regulations 1986, these being orders based on an unnecessary or improper act or omission for which the prosecution is held responsible. The numbers of such orders made against the Crown Prosecution Service are set out for each year in the tables, with the totals for each Area, broken down to show awards made in the Crown Court and those made in magistrates courts. The final column of each table shows the amounts actually paid out by the Crown Prosecution Service, but it is not possible to divide this into sums paid in respect of orders made in the Crown Court and orders made in magistrates courts.

The number of orders made does not necessarily equate with the numbers of orders paid. No central record is kept of the amounts ordered to be made, although the Crown Prosecution Service accounting system records the payments actually made in the relevant accounting year.

3. Information about the amounts paid includes payments in respect of orders made in the Higher Courts, but the amounts cannot be broken down by the type of court.

HEALTH

Mental Illness

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the population aged between 16 and 65 years have (a) suffered from mental illness, (b) been under the care of a psychiatrist and (c) attempted suicide. [60993]

Mr. Hutton: A survey conducted in Great Britain in 1993 established that about one in six adults between the ages of 16 and 64 suffered from a neurotic disorder in the week before interview and about four per thousand had suffered from a psychotic disorder in the previous twelve months. There was no significant difference in the rates for England. Not all of those with neurotic symptoms would need medical care and in most cases this could be provided by the patient's general practitioner.

Only a small proportion of mentally ill people will need in-patient care. Those patients with finished consultant episodes following admissions to hospitals are shown in the table.

Information on attempted suicides is not collected centrally. The nearest data relating to attempted suicides are on self-inflicted injury resulting in admission to hospital, for which data are collected centrally. This information is included in the table.

Abortion

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the accuracy of British abortion statistics; and if he will make a statement on how they are compiled. [61673]

Ms Jowell: Abortion statistics are compiled from the information provided on the notification form which medical practitioners are obliged by the Abortion Act 1967 to submit to the Chief Medical Officer within 7 days of each abortion. Incomplete or unclear forms are returned to practitioners for clarification and resubmission. Any evidence of non-reporting is investigated and would be referred to the Crown Prosecution Service if appropriate.

The Department's Chief Medical Officer recently wrote to all obstetricians and gynaecologists in England and Wales to remind them of their legal obligations with regard to completion of notification forms.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the use of hydrolysed DNA assay testing for the early detection of cervical cancer in tandem with the present smear test. [61530]

Mr. Hutton: The Department is aware of a number of new technologies being developed which might be used to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the National Health Service cervical screening programme. Any changes to the programme will be introduced only after assessments have proven they are both clinically and cost-effective. The Advisory Committee on Cervical Screening is currently considering the potential role of new technologies in the cervical screening programme.

Child Labour

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when he expects to be able to announce proposals to alter child labour legislation in the United Kingdom; [60950]

(2) if he will publish the representations received on the future of child labour legislation in the United Kingdom. [60951]

Mr. Milburn: We expect the report of the group currently reviewing child employment legislation to be available in the early part of next year. The timing of any alterations to child employment law will depend on the findings of that review. We expect the review's report to contain details of any representations they received.

Dyslexia

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what departmental funding is made available for research programmes into the causes of dyslexia; and what expenditure is planned for 1999–2000; [60966]

(2) what research information is held by his Department on the causes of childhood dyslexia; and if he will make a statement. [60960]

Mr. Hutton: The Department does not hold, nor does it plan to commission, any research into the possible causes of dyslexia.

We are collaborating with the Department for Education and Employment on a small project to investigate whether the use of coloured overlays in schools could help the development of children's reading skills. The cost of this research has not yet been fully estimated.

Children's Health (Income during Pregnancy)

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the relationship between income during pregnancy and a child's (a) health in early years and (b) long-term health prospects. [61735]

Ms Jowell: The recent independent inquiry into inequalities in health, chaired by Sir Donald Acheson, examined, among other things, inequalities in women of childbearing age, expectant mothers and young children. More generally, the inquiry report drew attention to improvements in health and life expectancy associated with income and living standards.

We are firmly committed to improving the living standards of the poorest households and are already taking a number of measures that will help to achieve this. We shall be considering Sir Donald's recommendations as a whole in the development of our new health strategy, about which we shall publish a White Paper early next year.

Councillors

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the local authorities in (a) England and Wales and (b) Scotland showing the number of councillors on each who are (i) men and (ii) women. [61729]

Ms Jowell: The information requested has been the subject of a survey of local authorities conducted by the Women's Unit. It is in the process of being analysed. Not all the responses have been received as yet. The results are being examined and an analysis will be placed in the Library.

Care Services (Gloucester)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what standard spending assessment has been allocated to Gloucester County Council for the provision of care services in (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99 and (d) 1999–2000. [61506]

Mr. Hutton: Details of the standard spending assessments allocated to Gloucestershire County Council for the provision of social services up to 1998–99 are shown in the table. Indicative standard spending assessment figures for 1999–2000 by local authority will be announced shortly.

Year	£ million
1996–97	61.579
1997–98	66.678
1998–99	70.932

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what care services local authorities are required to provide; what assessment he has made of the level of care services provided by Gloucestershire County Council; what steps he is taking to improve care facilities; and if he will make a statement. [61507]

Mr. Hutton: Social services authorities' powers and duties to provide care services for adults are set out in various pieces of legislation, including the National Assistance Act 1948, the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968, the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970, the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986, the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, the Carers (Recognition and Services) Act 1995, and the Community Care (Direct Payments) Act 1996.

Local authorities' responsibilities for providing care services for children are set out in the Children Act 1989, part III of which deals with support to children in need and their families including the provision of accommodation for children; part IV, with ensuring care and supervision through the courts; part V, with the protection of children from abuse and neglect; and part X concerns child minding and day care for young children.

In recent years Gloucestershire has been inspected by the Social Services Inspectorate as follows:

Year	Report
1998	Care management/care programme approach (mental health)
1997	Hospital discharge (care management)
1996	Children leaving care
1995	Information Strategies and systems in community care
1995	Foster care
1995	Inspection units
1994	Complaints procedures

Copies of all these reports are available in the Library.

We are today publishing our White Paper, Modernising Social Services. This sets out a wide range of proposals to improve standards in all social services.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police (Early Retirement)

22. Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to reduce the rate of early retirement in the police. [61112]

Mr. Boateng: Following our consultation document earlier this year on police pension arrangements, work is in hand on specific proposals to improve practice in managing ill-health retirement and to support good management practice with changes to the Police Pensions Regulations where necessary. Any proposals we make will be published in advance to allow for full consultation with the interested parties.

Departmental Research

23. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the priorities for research in his Department. [61113]

Mr. Boateng: My Department is carrying out social and scientific research and evaluation across the range of Home Office policy and programmes, in particular, formulating a new Crime Reduction Programme and evaluating the key proposals in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, a new programme of drugs research, carrying out repeat surveys of both Local Voluntary Activity and Youth Lifestyles and a £700,000 programme of police research. This year's external research programme of the Home Office's Research, Development and Statistics Directorate was published in June and copies are available in the Library. The details of the police research programme will soon be available on the Internet.

Prisoners

24. Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress being made in reducing the prison population. [61114]

Mr. Boateng: The prison population peaked at 66,500 at the end of July and, taking seasonal factors into account, there has been no substantial growth in the population since April this year.

The Government believe that prison must be the right response for those who pose a danger to the public, such as violent or sexual offenders and for persistent offenders. It is, however, for the courts to decide the appropriate sentence in any individual case, within the statutory limits set by Parliament. The Prison Service has a duty to keep in custody those sentenced to prison and the Government's duty is to provide the resources to enable this to happen. The Comprehensive Spending Review took full account of this.

Liquor Licensing Laws

25. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on reform of the liquor licensing laws. [61115]

Mr. George Howarth: On 5 May, I announced that we were starting a general review of the liquor licensing laws. This is underway; we need to look at the full range of issues before announcing our conclusions.

Prisons (Drug Tests)

26. Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his assessment is of the impact of random drug tests in prison. [61116]

Mr. George Howarth: Drug testing is an integral part of the Prison Service's drug strategy. It provides an indication of the level of drug misuse in prisons and a deterrent to those who may be tempted to use drugs. It is a valuable part of a package of measures to combat drug misuse. In May, I announced a new strategy for testing which provides for a more targeted approach.

Prison Service

27. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the proportion of Prison Service expenditure derived from the Prison Service's trading activities. [61117]

Mr. George Howarth: Although the Prison Service is not set up as a trading organisation, it does derive income from commercial activities. Gross expenditure by the Prison Service in 1997–98 was £1,760.9 million.

This expenditure was offset by receipts of £23.3 million in the classes authorised for use as appropriations in aid, of which £8.4 million were from sales of capital assets. £7.7 million (33 per cent. of all receipts; 52 per cent. of current receipts) of those receipts arose from external sales from prison industries and farms.

Police (Effectiveness)

28. Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what performance indicators are used to measure the effectiveness of police forces. [61118]

Mr. Boateng: The effectiveness of police forces is measured against performance indicators identified by the Home Office, the Audit Commission and Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC) and the Association of Chief Police Officers. The indicators are designed to cover the most important aspects of service delivery. Detailed comparative analysis of performance based on the indicators is included in the published HMIC inspection reports.

Channel Islands

29. Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what deadlines he will be giving to the Channel Islands for the completion of the proposals set out in the Edwards report. [61119]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Minister of State, my noble Friend the Lord Williams of Mostyn, is to chair a group made up of representatives of the Channel Islands, the Isle of Man and the United Kingdom to examine the conclusions of the Edwards Report and the plans of action being drawn up in response to those conclusions, including timetables.

Community Sentences

30. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out the steps he is taking to increase public awareness of the value of community sentences. [61120]

Mr. George Howarth: My Ministerial colleagues and I try to publicise good work undertaken by the probation service, of which there are many examples. We are also considering, in the light of responses to the consultation document "Joining Forces to Protect the Public", renaming community sentences to help the public to understand better what they involve and the important responsibilities which the probation service has in punishing offenders, reducing crime and protecting the public.

Crime and Disorder Act 1998

31. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the implementation of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. [61121]

Mr. Boateng: The Crime and Disorder Act received Royal Assent on 31 July 1998. Of the 121 sections in it, 87 have now been brought into force, some on a pilot basis. The majority of other sections will be introduced within the next 12 months. Sex offender orders will come into force on 1 December. Anti-social behaviour orders will come into force on 1 April next year.

Crime and disorder reduction partnerships, which are central to the Act, are being established throughout England and Wales. Many areas have already undertaken significant work towards their crime and disorder audits. Up to date information on the implementation of the Act is available on the Internet at www.homeoffice.gov.uk/cdact/index.htm.

Crime Victims

32. Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to give increased rights to the victims of crime. [61122]

Mr. Boateng: We believe that the needs of victims and witnesses should be at the heart of the criminal justice system. We shall be introducing in the current parliamentary session the Youth Sentencing and Witnesses Bill, which will give increased rights to victims of crime. Other measures in the Bill, while not conferring rights on victims as such, will nonetheless make a further significant contribution towards improving the position of victims.

34. Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice is given by his Department to the police about the need to inform the victims of crime about the outcome of their case. [61124]

Mr. Boateng: Under the Victim's Charter the police have a responsibility for informing victims if someone has been caught, cautioned or charged: victims who want to receive further information should additionally be told of any decision to drop or alter the charges substantially, the date of any trial and the final result. Most police forces have now established arrangements for keeping victims informed of more significant developments in their case, though practice varies across the country. Ways in which this Charter standard might be achieved more readily and more consistently have been the subject of pilot studies over the past two years. An interim evaluation report has just been published—a copy has been lodged in the Library—and the final evaluation should be available next Spring. Our intention is then to issue good practice guidelines to all police forces.

Crime Reduction

33. Mr. Ivan Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what resources he has made available to help reduce crime in areas with high offending rates. [61123]

Mr. Boateng: On 21 July 1998, Official Report, columns 914–24, the Government announced a new crime reduction programme supported by £250 million over the next three years. As part of that programme, we will be spending at least £50 million over the next three years on tackling domestic burglary in areas with a high burglary problem.

Crime (Essex)

35. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about the level of crime in Essex. [61125]

Mr. Boateng: I have received a number of representations from members of the public about crime issues in Essex.

The crime rate statistics for 1997–1998 recently presented to the Audit Commission for its annual review of police performance, confirmed that the crime rate in Essex decreased by 9.8 per cent. against the previous 12 months. The total number of offences falling to 89,380—the lowest since 1990.

Young Offenders

36. Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the punishment of young offenders. [61126]

Mr. Boateng: The Government have set out their policy on the punishment of young offenders in three consultation documents (Tackling Youth Crime, New National and Local Focus on Youth Crime and Tackling Delays in the Youth Justice System). By 8 December 1997, 297 responses had been received to "Tackling Youth Crime", 250 responses to "New National and Local Focus", and 177 responses to "Tackling Delays". Summaries of the responses to each of the three papers have been placed in the Library.

The White Paper "No More Excuses—A New Approach to Tackling Youth Crime in England and Wales" was published in November 1997. Many of the policies contained in the White Paper were made by the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, which received Royal Assent on 31 July 1998.

Detainees

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his current estimate of the number of people detained under immigration legislation. [61100]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: As at 31 October, approximately 970 people were held in detention solely under Immigration Act powers.

Psychiatric Care

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were clinically assessed as requiring medium secure psychiatric care in each of the last five years; how many of those assessed were transferred to psychiatric hospitals; and if he will make a statement. [61157]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The number of transfers to hospital by direction of the Home Secretary under section 47 and 48 of the Mental Health Act 1983 in each of the last five years was as follows:

Year	Number of Prisoners transferred
1993	767
1994	785
1995	723
1996	745
1997	745

Some 50–60 per cent. of such transfers are to medium secure or equivalent conditions of security. Information about the number of clinical assessments for psychiatric care is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Medway Secure Training Centre

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the ministerial visits to the Medway Secure Training Centre since 1 May 1997. [61018]

Mr. Boateng: Medway Secure Training Centre opened on 17 April 1998. The then Minister of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), visited the centre on 26 August, as did I on 17 November 1998.

Sara Barhandi

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress he has made in ascertaining the whereabouts of Sara Barhandi, abducted from her home on 15 August. [60997]

Mr. Boateng: Since being notified of the disappearance of Sara Barhandi, the police have made extensive inquiries, both within the United Kingdom and abroad, in an effort to locate her. This included issuing an All Ports Bulletin in an effort to prevent her from being removed from this country. To date, no information has yet been received to confirm her whereabouts, although inquiries are ongoing.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will take steps to regulate the destruction of unwanted animals bred for use in experiments; [60936]

(2) what steps he is taking to reduce the numbers of animals bred for use in experimentation but subsequently discarded without being so used; [60938]

(3) if he will make it a requirement for those holding project licences under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 to publish details of the number of surplus animals killed each year; [60937]

(4) if he will estimate the number of animals bred each year for possible use in experimentation but subsequently discarded without being so used. [60939]

Mr. George Howarth: Under the terms of section 10 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, animals bred in designated establishments for use in scientific procedures but which are surplus to requirement must be killed by a method which is appropriate under Schedule 1 to the Act or otherwise approved by the Secretary of State. We have already accepted recommendations made by the Animal Procedures Committee, in its interim report on the review of the 1986 Act, that those killing animals by Schedule 1 methods should be trained and that a register of competent persons should be maintained in designated establishments. We have no plans, at this stage, to introduce further controls.

The production of genetically modified animals is a regulated procedure under the terms of the 1986 Act and must, therefore, have project licence authority. Details of all such animals are already included in the annual statistics. Project licence holders are not, however, responsible for the breeding of non-genetically modified animals and it would not, therefore, be possible for them to provide details of the number of surplus animals killed each year. All establishments are, however, required to keep records of the source, use and disposal of animals.

The Animals Procedures Committee has been looking at overbreeding and wastage of laboratory animals as part of its review of the operation of the 1986 Act. The Committee's report on the review was published as appendix F to the Committee's annual report, which was laid before Parliament on 26 November. The Committee notes that some overbreeding is unavoidable, but it can be minimised and the Committee has identified six principles of good practice which will be refined in collaboration with the Laboratory Animal Science Association. We accept the Committee's recommendation that we should issue these as guidelines for breeding establishments.

The Committee also suggests that establishments be required to report to the Home Office figures for overbreeding of those animals listed in Schedule 2 to the 1986 Act. We will consider this.

Driving Offences

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average penalty applied to a person convicted of accidentally killing another whilst in charge of a motor vehicle. [61501]

Mr. Boateng: The readily available information relates to the average length of custodial sentences (unsuspended imprisonment and young offender institution) in England and Wales in 1996 for the three offences involving causing death and is as follows:

Offence	Average sentence length (months)
Causing death by dangerous driving	33.7
Causing death by careless driving under influence of drink or drugs	34.5
Causing death by aggravated vehicle taking	22.6

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were (a) charged with and (b) convicted of dangerous driving in the last year for which figures are available. [60934]

Mr. Boateng: The readily available information relates to the number of proceedings and findings of guilt for offences of dangerous driving, which, in England and Wales in 1996, the latest year for which figures are available, were 10,017 and 5,750 respectively.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he gives to the police regarding decisions on whether to prosecute offending motorists or to require them to undertake driver improvement schemes; what percentage of offending motorists (a) were prosecuted and (b) took part in these schemes in (i) Gloucestershire and (ii) the United Kingdom in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [61504]

Mr. Boateng: None. Decisions on whether to prosecute drivers or offer them a place on a driver improvement scheme are for the police to take in consultation with the Crown Prosecution Service, as appropriate. The figures requested are not available centrally.

Policing (Greater Manchester)

Ms Blears: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the funding to be made available for policing in Greater Manchester in 1999–2000. [61107]

Mr. Boateng: My right hon. Friend announced on 21 July 1998, Official Report, column 915, that the police service in England and Wales will receive an additional £1.24 billion over the next three years from 1999–2000. Our plans allow for police expenditure to increase by 2.65 per cent. in 1999–2000. Funding will be allocated to individual police authorities by means of a needs-based formula next year. We will announce provisional allocations later this week.

Sex Trafficking

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information his Department (i) collects and (ii) publishes on the trafficking in women for sexual purposes in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the rest of the EU and (c) wider Europe. [61533]

Mr. Boateng: The Government do not collect statistical information specific to women who are trafficked for sexual purposes.

The Home Office Policing and Reducing Crime Unit of the Research, Development and Statistics Directorate is currently considering commissioning a small research study on trafficking in women. This will draw together any information which exists on the extent and forms of trafficking in women in England and Wales.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what involvement his Department has in the efforts to combat the trafficking in women for sexual purposes in (a) the EU and (b) wider Europe. [61531]

Mr. Boateng: The United Kingdom is fully committed to opposing trafficking in women and its associated activities. We are taking steps to implement the European Union Joint Action of December 1996 to combat trafficking in human beings and sexual exploitation of children, and we support and participate in the European Union STOP programme, which provides for incentives and exchanges for persons responsible for combating trafficking in human beings and the sexual exploitation of children. In addition, we recently adopted The Hague Ministerial declaration on a European Code of Conduct to prevent and combat trafficking in women for the purpose of sexual exploitation.

Among other initiatives, this year the United Kingdom took part in an European Union/United States information campaign to address the problem of trafficking in women from Poland and the Ukraine. We are also working on the problem, together with other European Union member states and countries of Central and Eastern Europe, within the European Conference. At the meeting of the European Conference on 6 October 1998, the conference tasked its expert group on drugs and organised crime to examine how the measures in the Joint Action to combat trafficking in human beings and the sexual exploitation of children could be extended to all States participating in the group's work.

The Government also support action to combat illegal immigration, including that of women for sexual purposes, in both European Union and international fora, and have supported information campaigns aimed at alerting women to the risks involved in such illegal immigration.

European Network of Policewomen

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what contribution his Department makes to the work of the European Network of Policewomen; what is the composition and role of the network; and what is the estimated annual cost to public funds of United Kingdom participation in it. [61532]

Mr. Boateng: The organisation is based in the Netherlands and the majority of its funds are provided by the Dutch Ministries of the Interior and Justice. This Department does not make any contribution to the work of the European Network of Policewomen centrally. However, a small number of police forces and National Police Training at Bramshill, who are supporting members, have made small annual contributions.

I understand that the main objective of this organisation is "to optimise the position of policewomen in the European police service".

It promotes the exchange of information, research and training between organisations and individuals who endorse the ideal that the police organisation should be a place where women and men can work together as equals.

Dyslexia

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the percentage of the (a) female and (b) male prison population who are dyslexic in each of the past 10 years. [60946]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service does not currently undertake separate screening tests for dyslexia so the information requested is not available. However, dyslexia screening on induction for prisoners in the dispersal estate is to be introduced from 1 January 1999. In addition, the Prison Service is looking at a number of options to identify dyslexia needs among prisoners and will issue guidance on screening tests to providers of prison education when the research which it has commissioned is complete, at the end of February 1999.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his Department's estimate of the number of current young offenders who are dyslexic; and what estimate he has made of the number in each of the last five years. [60947]

Mr. Boateng: No information is available about the number of young offenders who are dyslexic. However, results from Prison Service skills screening tests for literacy and numeracy amongst prisoners in general suggest that 60 per cent. have poor literacy and communication skills and 75 per cent. have poor numeracy skills.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what specialist help is available to dyslexic prisoners by the Prisons Education Department; and if he will make a statement. [60948]

Mr. George Howarth: All education departments in prisons try to identify the individual learning needs of prisoners. Where there is an indication that there are dyslexia needs, specialist advice and guidance is sought and appropriate learning can be made available. Specialist advice is sought from the British Dyslexia Association which provides a full diagnostic assessment, or, within some education departments, from teachers who have undertaken specialist training leading to nationally recognised accreditation.

WPC Fletcher

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a statement on Scotland Yard's continuing investigation into the case of WPC Fletcher. [61088]

Mr. Straw: As I said to my hon. Friend in my answer of 26 October 1998, Official Report, column 47, I understand from the Metropolitan Police that their review of the evidence surrounding the murder of Woman Police Constable Fletcher is nearing completion. I expect to receive a report as soon as is practicable after the police inquiries are completed.

Firearms Compensation Scheme

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total cost of all the options of (a) the high calibre handgun compensation scheme and (b) the low calibre handgun compensation scheme; and what were the associated staff costs in each case. [61633]

Mr. Boateng: The information is as follows:

Cost of payments under the large-calibre handgun compensation scheme: £57,160,079

Cost of payments under the ex gratia payment scheme for small-calibre pistols: £4,671,200

Cost of payments under the statutory compensation scheme for small-calibre pistols: £1,452,958

Firearms Compensation Section staff costs (including Agency staff) at end October 1998: £1,704,339.

Immigration Advisers

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to bring forward measures to regulate immigration advisers. [61092]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We hope to bring forward legislation to regulate unscrupulous immigration advisers in the next few months.

TREASURY

Pensions Mis-selling

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps the FSA has taken to investigate the possibility of general mis-selling of (a) free-standing additional voluntary contributions and (b) other pension top-up policies since their introduction. [61186]

Ms Hewitt: This is a matter for the Financial Services Authority. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the FSA's statement of 19 October.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the uncertainties involved in estimating the ultimate cost to firms of the mis-selling pensions review; and what steps he will take to produce an estimate of the split of the likely cost of the pension review between with profits and unit linked policies. [61182]

Ms Hewitt: This is a matter for the Financial Services Authority.

VAT (Dried Fruit)

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will estimate the revenue from VAT on sweetened dried fruit sold as confectionery in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 as a result of HM Customs updating of VAT Notice 701/14 Food; [60878]

(2) how much revenue was raised from VAT charged on sweetened dried fruit sold as confectionery in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98. [60877]

Dawn Primarolo: There are no actual figures on VAT receipts from dried fruits available. Using information on sales of dried fruit, HM Customs and Excise estimate the VAT on sweetened dried fruit sold as confectionery to be no more than £5 million for each year.

The updating of VAT Notice 701/14 Food has no effect on the VAT treatment of sweetened dried fruit sold specifically as confectionery.

Individual Savings Accounts

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the advantages of including the savings-related share option scheme within the proposed system of ISA accounts. [61187]

Ms Hewitt: The facility to transfer shares emerging from Inland Revenue approved all-employee savings related share option and profit sharing schemes to ISAs continues a facility already available with single company PEPs. The facility has been retained for ISAs following responses to the original ISA consultation by companies operating these schemes. We are persuaded that this facility is a significant incentive to employees in these schemes to hold onto their shares and can help to achieve our objective of boosting employee share ownership.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is his latest estimate of the number of additional savers expected as a result of the introduction of the individual savings account; and if he will make a statement; [61070]

(2) how many extra savers he expects as a result of the introduction of the individual savings account. [60945]

Ms Hewitt: I refer the hon. Gentlemen to the answer given by the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) on 17 November 1998, Official Report, column 496.

Financial Services

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he intends to take to collect information on the proportions of financial services products sold (a) on commission and (b) by advisers taking a fixed fee. [61185]

Ms Hewitt: None.

Double Tax Relief

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to publish a consultation document on his review into double tax relief. [61041]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 27 November 1998]: No date has been set for publication of the consultation document. Informal consultations with business and with representative bodies are still continuing.

European Community VAT

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions have taken place in the Council of Ministers (ECOFIN) in respect of the proposals of the European Commission in Com (96) 328 Final concerning a revised system of VAT. [61727]

Dawn Primarolo: The European Commission's proposals for a Common VAT System were presented to member states at the 14 October 1996 ECOFIN by Commissioner Monti, but they were not endorsed or debated at that meeting. A Commission proposal to reform the VAT Committee, which forms part of the Common VAT System proposals, is on the agenda for the ECOFIN meeting on 1 December 1998.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what memoranda have been made available to (a) hon. Members and (b) others, signed by Ministers, concerning the proposals of the European Commission for a revised system of community value added tax, as contained in their Document 9466/96 Com (96) 328 Final; and on what dates they were made available. [61726]

Dawn Primarolo: The following Explanatory Memoranda have been made available to hon. Members:

Document 9466/96 of 25 September 1996 on the Commission's overall work programme for a Common VAT System;

Document 7478/97 of 16 June 1997 and Supplementary Document 12805/97 of 17 December 1997 on a proposal for enhanced arrangements for co-operation between tax authorities;

Document 9118/97 of 29 July 1997 on a proposal for reform of the VAT Committee;

Document 9741/98 of 21 July 1998 on a proposal concerning the rules governing the right to deduct VAT; and Document 9877/98 of 24 July 1998 on a proposal on mutual assistance in the recovery of debts.

EC Monetary Committee

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals have been placed before the Council of Ministers (ECOFIN) of the European Community for the formation of the Monetary Committee required under Article 109c of the Treaty of Maastricht and Article 114 of the proposed consolidated Treaty of that community; and if he will make a statement. [61725]

Ms Hewitt: In accordance with Article 109c(2) of the Treaty, the present Monetary Committee will be dissolved at the beginning of stage 3 of EMU (1 January 1999). The same Article requires that an Economic and Financial Committee (EFC) be set up as its successor.

On 25 February 1998 the European Commission presented its proposal for the formation of the EFC. This was circulated to Member States on 27 March 1998 (7189/98 COM(1998)110 final).

The proposal was deposited in Parliament on 7 April 1998 and an explanatory memorandum was submitted to Parliament on 22 April 1998. This cleared scrutiny on 27 April 1998 through the Lords Select Committee on the European Communities (the Chairman's 954th Sift) and on 29 April 1998 through the Commons Select Committee on European Legislation (26th Report Session—1997–98).

The tasks of the EFC are set out in the Treaty.

EU Convergence Programme

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has submitted a new convergence programme revising that of September 1997 to the EU Council following the downward revision of his growth projections. [61718]

Ms Hewitt: The Government intend to submit a new Convergence Programme in the near future.

Drugs

Mr. Singh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what quantity of heroin has been imported into the United Kingdom through controlled deliveries since 1985; from which countries it came; and in (a) how many instances and (b) what quantity some of those imports have gone missing. [61717]

Dawn Primarolo: It is not Customs and Excise policy to disclose detailed information relating to operational activity.

Mr. Singh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will publish the result of the Customs National Investigation Service inquiry into the practice of the controlled delivery of drugs by drugs liaison officers attached to the British High Commission in Islamabad. [61486]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs are conducting an internal review of procedures used in controlled deliveries. It is not practice to publish such reviews.

Mr. Singh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action was taken in respect of the senior British Drugs Liaison Officer who was caught in possession of heroin in his official vehicle in mid-1997. [61627]

Dawn Primarolo: No such incident took place.

European Central Bank

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy to promote increased transparency in the decision-making processes of the European Central Bank; and if he will make a statement. [61063]

Ms Hewitt: The Government believe that it is vital that the European Central Bank (ECB) is as open and transparent as possible. Transparency is an important factor in ensuring that the ECB gains the trust of the European public and financial markets. Ultimately it will provide the credibility needed to deliver a more effective monetary policy. The Government welcomed the announcement by the ECB on 13 October on elements of their monetary policy strategy which was a useful first step. The Government hope to see further evidence from the ECB of a genuine commitment to openness.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy that the European Central Bank should adopt an inflation target; and if he will make a statement. [61064]

Ms Hewitt: In accordance with the Treaty, the primary objective of the ECB is to achieve price stability. The ECB announced on 13 October its intention to base monetary policy decisions on a wide range of economic and financial variables, including a monetary aggregate. This is typical of most central banks, including the Bank of England. The important issue is that the ECB meets it Treaty objective.

Income Tax

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the full-year revenue yield of introducing a new 50 per cent. rate of income tax on taxable income of over £100,000 per annum. [61196]

Dawn Primarolo: The estimated full year yield at 1998–99 income levels of introducing a 50 per cent. rate of income tax on taxable incomes over £100,000 per year is £2.0 billion.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number of people likely to benefit from the working families tax credit in each parliamentary constituency in the United Kingdom. [61803]

Dawn Primarolo: I regret that estimates for individual constituencies are not available.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Visa Applications

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for visit visas have been refused at the high commissions in (a) Colombo, (b) Islamabad, (c) Delhi, (d) Accra and (e) Istanbul, and what proportion of total applications this represents, in each of the last four years, and in the current year to date. [61000]

Mr. Fatchett: The numbers of visit visas refused so far this year in (a) Colombo, (b) Islamabad, (c) Delhi, (d) Accra and (e) Istanbul are as follows:

January to October 1998

	Issued	Refused	Percentage of total visit applications processed
Colombo	11,950	427	3.4
Islamabad	32,429	6,249	16.2
Delhi	52,925	4,665	8.1
Accra	17,944	4,136	18.7
Istanbul	49,597	2,222	4.2

Global Entry Clearance Statistics for the years 1994–97 inclusive have recently been made available to the House of Commons Library. These contain the other information requested in respect of previous years.

Pakistan

Mr. Andy King: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government plans to make to the Pakistan Government following the murder of a family of nine Christians in Nowshera Peshawar. [61003]

Mr. Fatchett: We were deeply shocked by the murder of nine members of a Christian family near Peshawar. The murders have been condemned by the Government of Pakistan. We and our European Union partners regularly urge the Government of Pakistan to protect the rights of religious minorities in their country, most recently at a meeting between Pakistan and the EU Troika on 25 November.

Sara Barhandi

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress he has made in ascertaining the whereabouts of Sara Barhandi, who was abducted from her home on 15 August. [60996]

Mr. Fatchett: The precise whereabouts of Sara Barhandi remain unknown. Our Vice Consul has contacted Sara's relatives in Morocco but they did not disclose here whereabouts.

Sara is a dual British/Moroccan national. While she is in Morocco our Embassy has no formal locus to intervene. Consular staff will, however, continue to offer as much support to Sara's mother as they properly can and make informal inquiries with the Moroccan authorities.

Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the export of armoured vehicles for use by the US and British embassies in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the export of armoured vehicles and other non-lethal military equipment to the Kosovo Diplomatic Observers Mission in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. [62007]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Government has allowed the export to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) of eight armoured Land Rovers, for use by the US Embassy in Belgrade, and a further two armoured Land Rovers and an armoured Rover saloon for use by the British Embassy in Belgrade. We attach the highest priority to ensuring the safety of staff and personnel at our Embassy in Belgrade, and we rightly recognise that other diplomatic missions, like the US Embassy in Belgrade, attach high priority to the protection of their staff. We were therefore glad to be able to allow these exports, which are not caught by arms embargoes against the FRY.

In advance of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe's establishment of the Kosovo Verification Mission (KVM), the Government have allowed also the export of up to 30 armoured Land Rovers and other essential and non-lethal military equipment for use by observers at the British Embassy in Belgrade (known as the Kosovo Diplomatic Observers Mission, or KDOM). It is clearly important that British and other staff at KDOM should be protected in the course of their duties which include monitoring the enforcement of the arms embargo against the FRY. These personnel will, in due course, become members of KVM. The UN Sanctions Committee has raised no objection to these exports.

Argentina

Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what new exceptions there have been to the arms embargo on Argentina. [62008]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Licences have recently been issued to allow the following exports:

(a) two firearms (deactivated to Argentina specification) to a private individual in Argentina;

(b) nine sets of gun rings and smoke grenade launchers to be mounted on armoured personnel carriers in service with the Argentine contingent of the UN forces in Cyprus;

(c) re-export of radio equipment for the Argentine Gendarmeria after repair by the manufacturer in the United Kingdom;

(d) supply of radio equipment for the Argentina Gendarmeria.

These decisions represent exceptions but not changes to the arms embargo on Argentina, which remains in place unchanged.

Council of the European Union

Mrs. Gilroy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the forthcoming business in the Council of the European Union for December and the major European Union events for the next six months. [62009]

Ms Quin: The information is as follows:

Note:

This calendar is primarily concerned with European Union matters, but certain other relevant events are also included. Events and dates quoted are based on the information available on the date of issue.

International Criminal Court

Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the United Kingdom will sign the Statute of the International Criminal Court. [62011]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Our Permanent Representative to the United Nations in New York will sign the Statute of the Court today on behalf of the UK.

Official Hospitality (Wine)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the total expenditure of the Government Hospitality Fund Advisory Committee for the Purchase of Wine since 1 May 1997; what is the average cost of each bottle purchased; and what percentage of wine purchased is of United Kingdom origin. [60940]

Mr. Fatchett: There has been no expenditure by the Government Hospitality Fund Advisory Committee for the Purchase of Wine. The Committee makes recommendations on quality only and is not involved with the purchase of wine.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is the oldest bottle of wine held for Government hospitality purposes; [61517]

(2) what has been the most expensive bottle purchased on the recommendation of the Government Hospitality Fund Advisory Committee for the Purchase of Wine since 1 May 1997. [61515]

Mr. Fatchett: The purchasing policy for wines bought for the Government Hospitality cellar are the same as those that applied under previous Administrations. Wines are purchased to ensure availability at reasonable cost of appropriate wines suitable for the wide variety of functions organised by Government Hospitality.

The oldest wine in the cellar is a top grade Claret, Château Latour 1955. The most expensive bought since 1 May 1997, a Claret of equal quality, is Château La Fleur Petrus 1995, which cost £37.60 a bottle inclusive of VAT.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the members of the Government Hospitality Fund Advisory Committee for the Purchase of Wine; how many times the committee has met since 1 May 1997; if its deliberations are a matter of public record; and if he will make a statement. [60941]

Mr. Fatchett: The Chairman of the Government Hospitality Fund Advisory Committee for the Purchase of Wine is Sir Ewen Fergusson; the four members are Mr. Anthony Hanson MW, Mr. Mark Savage MW, Mr. Sebastian Payne MW and Mr. John Avery MW. The Committee has met six times since 1 May 1997 and produced an Annual Report recording its work for 1997 which was published on 28 January 1998.

Pitcairn Island (Asbestos)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the report from the Government of Pitcairn Island on the disposal of asbestos waste near the island. [61674]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: An urgent investigation into the circumstances of the incident is being carried out. When the information is available a report will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Office Automation

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the replacement programme for office automation and telecommunications infrastructure will be completed. [61677]

Mr. Fatchett: The FCO's office automation replacement programme will be completed in 2000. The implementation schedule ensures that all FCO business critical computer systems will be millennium compliant, either by correction or replacement, before the end of 1999.

A private finance initiative contract that will provide a managed voice and massaging service between the FC and its overseas missions is in the final stages of negotiation. The contract, which is expected to be signed by mid February 1999, states that implementation of the full service will take 25 months from contract signature. But implementation has already started, under an Instruction to Proceed, in order to replace all non-millennium compliant telephone switchboards.

Sudan

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reply he has given to the invitation from the Sudanese Government for a United Kingdom verification mission to examine the Al-Shifa factory site. [61500]

Mr. Fatchett: A revised draft resolution on this issue has recently been submitted to the UN Security Council. We believe that this is the appropriate place for such suggestions to be considered.

We will continue to urge Sudan to become a party to the Chemical Weapons Convention, which prohibits the acquisition, development, production, stockpiling and use of chemical weapons. It is supported by a verification regime consisting of data declarations and on-site inspections.

Iraq

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the legal authority on which the Government plan to take military action against Iraq are based. [61676]

Mr. Fatchett: The precise legal basis for any future military action will depend on the circumstances at the time, but any action taken by the Government will be lawful.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the Iraqi opposition groups that ministers have met over the past four weeks. [61675]

Mr. Fatchett: I met representatives of the following Iraqi opposition groups on 23 November: Constitutional Monarchy Movement; Iraqi Democratic Party; Association of Iraqi Democrats; Assyrian Democratic Movement; Patriotic Union of Kurdistan; Turkoman National Democratic Movement; Islamic Accord Party; Kurdish Democratic Party; Ahl al-Bayt; Iraqi Reform Movement; Iraqi National Movement; Mr. al-Rubaie (Independent); Iraqi National Congress; Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq; Iraqi National Accord (Wifaq).

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to introduce freedom of information legislation on St. Helena. [61466]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: This is a matter for the St. Helena Government which have no plans to introduce such legislation.

SOCIAL SECURITY

National Insurance

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has yet completed his review of National Insurance contributions for 1999–2000. [62006]

Mr. Darling: We have completed the annual review under Section 141 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992. Proposals will take effect from 6 April 1999 alongside the structural changes to National Insurance contributions announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget on 17 March 1998, Official Report, columns 1097–112, and re-affirmed in his Pre-Budget report on 3 November 1998, Official Report, columns 681–702.

Full details of the changes to the structure of employees and employers National Insurance contributions (NICs) from April 1999 are as follows:

(i) the NICs "entry fee" currently payable by employees once earnings reach the lower earnings limit (currently £64 a week) will be abolished, so that employees will not pay NICs on the portion of earnings at or below the lower earning limit;

(ii) employers will also no longer pay NICs on the portion of earnings at or below the lower earnings limit once earnings reach that level. The point at which employers start to pay NICs will be further increased to the level of the personal tax allowance. In practice, this will mean no employers' contributions will be payable on earnings up to and including £83 a week;

(iii) the 3 per cent., 5 per cent., 7 per cent. and 10 per cent. rates of employers' NICs for different levels of employees' earnings will be abolished and replaced with a single 12.2 per cent. rate of employer NICs payable on earnings above the level of the personal tax allowance;

(iv) to ensure employers with Contracted-out Salary Related Pension Schemes (COSRS) or Contracted-out Money Purchase Pension Schemes (COMPS) are entitled to the same level of NIC rebate, they will continue to be entitled to a rebate on earnings between the lower earnings limit and the personal tax allowance.

Employers and Employees

In line with the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, the lower earnings limits for Class 1 contributions is to be raised to £66 a week. It is set at the level of the basic Retirement Pension rate for a single person from April 1999, rounded down to the nearest pound.

The upper earnings limit is to be raised to £500 a week which is slightly less than 7½ times the new basic pension rate as provided by the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act. These new earnings limits will replace the current ones of £64 and £485 respectively.

Employees will pay a standard rate contribution of 10 per cent. on that portion of their earnings which exceeds the lower but not the upper earnings limit.

As announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his 3 November Pre-Budget Report, the Earnings Threshold from which employers will start to pay secondary Class 1 contributions will be £83 a week.

The multiple contribution rates for employers will be replaced by a standard contribution rate of 12.2 per cent. on all earnings which exceed the earnings threshold.

Not Contracted Out Employees and their Employers

Employees will not have to pay any contributions on earnings at or below £66 a week. Employees whose earnings do not exceed £485 (the former upper earnings limit) will pay £1.48 a week less in contributions than at present. This is because the 2 per cent. entry fee on earnings up to the LEL has been removed and a further £2 of their weekly earnings will not be subject to any contributions rather than 10 per cent. For employees with earnings above £485 the maximum possible increase will be £0.02 a week.

Employers will not have to pay contributions on earnings below £83 a week.

Contracted Out Employees and their Employers

Employees whose earnings do not exceed £485 (the former upper earnings limit) will pay £1.44 a week less in contributions than at present. This is because the 2 per cent. entry fee on earnings up to the LEL has been removed and a further £2 of their weekly earnings will not be subject to any contributions rather than 8.4 per cent. For employees with earnings above £485 there will be no increase in contributions and the minimum possible reduction will be 18p a week.

Employers who operate a Contracted-Out Salary Related Scheme (COSR)

Where earnings are between £66 and £83 employers contributions will be reduced by £1.92 a week. This is due removal of the entry fee. Employers will pay a reduced rate of 9.2 per cent. on employee's earnings which exceed the Earnings Threshold.

Employers who operate a Contracted-Out Money Purchase Scheme (COMP)

Where earnings are between £66 and £83 employers contributions will be reduced by between £1.95 and £2.20 a week. This is due to the removal of the entry fee and the introduction of the Earnings Threshold which means that a further £19 of earnings is not subject to any contributions. Employers will pay a reduced rate of 11.6 per cent. on all earnings which exceed the Earnings Threshold.

Self-Employed People

The flat rate Class 2 contribution will be raised by 20p to £6.55 a week.

Self-employed people with profits less than a specified amount, known as the small earnings exception limit, can apply to be excepted from paying Class 2 contributions. This limit will be raised by £180 to £3,770.

There will be no change to the rate of Class 4 contributions which will remain at 6 per cent. The annual limits of profits between Class 4 contributions are paid will be raised to £7,530 and £26,000 from £7,310 and £25,220 respectively.

Self-employed people who pay only Class 2 contributions will pay an extra £10.40 a year in 1999–2000.

For people with profits between £7,530 and £25,220 (the former upper profits limit) Class 4 contributions will be reduced by £13.20 a year assuming an unaltered level of profits. For those self-employed people with profits at or above the new upper profits limit the annual charge for Class 4 contributions will be £33.60 higher.

Class 3 (Voluntary) Contributions

The rate of Class 3 contributions will be raised by 20p to £6.45 a week.

National Health Service Allocation

The allocation to the National Health Service is unchanged at 1.05 per cent. from employees and 0.9 per cent. from employers.

Treasury Grant

Although benefit expenditure from the National Insurance Fund will broadly match income, we need to ensure that the Fund can maintain a prudent working balance throughout the coming year. In accordance with Section 2(2) of the Social Security Act 1993, we propose to do so by prescribing that the maximum Treasury Grant which may be available to the Fund in 1999–2000 shall not exceed 2 per cent. of the estimated benefit expenditure from the Fund for that year.

NIC Holiday Scheme

Finally, we also propose to restrict the employers' NIC Holiday scheme to employments which begin on or before 31 March 1999. This will effectively close down the scheme from 1 April 1999, except for Holidays which are already in place and may therefore run on for up to a year after that date.

The NIC Holiday was introduced by the previous administration to encourage employers to take on long-term unemployed people. It has had no appreciable effect on employers' recruitment practices. Our New Deal for the long-term unemployed now provides employers with better and more substantial incentives to recruit long-term employed people. This, together with the reduction that employers will see in their National Insurance contributions for almost all employees earning up to about £450 a week from April 1999, means that it is time for the NIC Holiday to go.

Regulations to give effect to this proposal will be laid before Parliament in due course. We shall be laying a Draft Re-rating Order before Parliament together with a report by the Government Actuary describing the effects of the re-rating proposals on the National Insurance Fund.

Benefit Integrity Project

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many life awards have been found to be unjustified by the Benefit Integrity Project; and how many were later upheld on appeal. [60916]

Mr. Timms: The administration of the Benefit Integrity Project is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mrs. Maria Fyfe, dated 27 November 1998:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many life awards have been found to be unjustified by the Benefit Integrity Project (BIP); and how many were later upheld on appeal.

Such information as is available regarding the changes made to life awards following BIP action is shown in the table. The data includes changes to the rate of benefit in addition to changes to the length of the award.

Where evidence of change does become available, as it may well do through BIP enquiries, a life award is reviewed in the normal way and benefit may increase or decrease. People do, of course, have full rights of review and appeal as they do with any change to benefit entitlement.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Changes made to life awards

	Total
Life award changed to:
Award still for life but rate changed	7,191
Awarded for a limited period and rate changed	316
Award remains at same rate but for a limited period	233
Benefit disallowed altogether	14,987
Total	22,727
Decision maintained on review	9,118
Decision not maintained on review	6,517
Decision maintained on appeal	483
Decision not maintained on appeal	816

1. Figures are up to and including 30 September 1998
2. The figures are provisional and subject to change

Lone Parents

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether sanctions will be imposed on lone parents if, under the proposed single gateway to benefit, they agree to have an interview in order to qualify for benefit, but then fail to attend that interview; and what form those sanctions will take. [61693]

Angela Eagle: As part of the process for claiming Social Security benefits, people of working age will be required to attend a Single Gateway interview. A person who does not attend the interview will not have completed the claim process, and benefit will not be payable. For certain categories of people the requirement to attend an interview will be deferred, and benefit will be awarded in the normal way.

Widows' Benefits

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what savings the Government expects as a result of the transfer of the SERPS element of the widow's pension to payment under the widowed parent's allowance. [61457]

Angela Eagle: Under our proposals, there would be no transfer of SERPS additional Pension between different categories of widows.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his Department will provide a breakdown of the savings expected as a result of the changes to widows' benefits. [61456]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Breakdown of the estimated costs and savings associated with the proposed reforms of bereavement benefits

£ million (1998–99 benefit rates)

	2001–2	2002–3	2003–4	2020
Increase widow's payment to £2,000 and extend to men	70	70	70	50
Introduce Bereavement Allowance and extend to men	*	−50	−100	−600
Extend Widowed Parent's Allowance to new widowers	*	10	20	50
Extend Widowed Parent's Allowance to existing widowers	50	40	40	0
£10 disregard of Widowed Parent's Allowance in means-tested benefits	10	10	10	**
Premium for older widows in means-tested benefits	*	10	10	0
Total	140	100	50	−500

Notes:

1. + cost; − saving
2. Estimates are presented net of means-tested benefit offsets, in line with those in "A new contract for welfare: support in bereavement". Means-tested benefit offsets were estimated using the 1995–96 Family Resources Survey and the Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiries. They assume a constant offset ratio in order to provide illustrative estimates for 2020.
3. The underlying contributory benefit effects have been provided by the Government Actuary's Department.
4. Estimates for the first three years are rounded to the nearest £10 million. * denotes negligible i.e. less than +/− £5 million.
5. Estimates for 2020 provide broad orders of magnitude and are rounded to the nearest £50 million.  denotes less than £25 million.
6. Total may not sum due to rounding.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the total payment in widow's benefits to a woman, without dependent children, widowed at the age of 45 years who claims the benefits until she becomes eligible for the state pension, including the widow's payment, the graduated widow's pension between 45 and 54 years and the full widow's pension. [61691]

Angela Eagle: A 45 year old woman without children who was widowed in 1998–99 would receive a one-off Widow's Payment of £1,000 and an age-related Widow's Pension of £19.41 a week (1998–99 benefit rates) for 18 years until she reached State pension age in 2016. The total would be £19,200. In addition, she may be entitled to SERPS which would be based on her late husband's NI contribution record.

Notes:

1. The estimate assumes that the contribution record of the husband meets the relevant contribution conditions, and that the woman continues to meet the qualifying conditions for receipt of Widow's Pension.
2. The estimate is in 1998–99 benefit rates and is rounded to the nearest £100.
3. Between 2010 and 2020 female State pension age will be raised until it is in line with male State pension age.

Benefits (Expenditure)

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what factors underlie the forecast reduction in social security spending in the pre-Budget report. [61455]

Mr. Darling: The forecasts of Social Security expenditure published in the Pre-Budget Report were revised to reflect new economic assumptions and the effects of more active management of the caseload.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what account he has taken of any rise in unemployment in forecasting expenditure on social security benefits over the next three years. [61454]

Mr. Darling: Forecasts of Social Security benefit expenditure in the Pre-Budget Report take into account a number of relevant economic assumptions provided by the Treasury, including the level of unemployment set out in paragraph B9 of the Report.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many parents with care on means tested benefits are currently subject to a reduced benefit direction of 40 per cent. as a result of a non co-operation with the Child Support Agency. [61444]

Angela Eagle: All children have the right to the support of both their parents wherever they may live. Where the taxpayer is providing substantial support for children who live in lone parent families, it is right that the parent with care should normally seek child support.

Parents with care in receipt of a relevant benefit who fail to co-operate with the Child Support Agency without good cause are subject to a benefit penalty, known as a reduced benefit direction, worth 40 per cent. of the adult Income Support personal allowance. This penalty lasts initially for three years and it may be renewed immediately if the parent with care continues to fail to co-operate.

The latest available information is from the May 1998 Income Support Statistics Quarterly Enquiries which show that 7,000 parents with care on Income Support were subject to a 40 per cent. reduction.

Figures for parents with care in receipt of Family Credit or Disability Working Allowance who are subject to a benefit reduction are not available.

The number of parents with care in receipt of Jobseeker's Allowance who have a reduced benefit direction is too small to measure accurately.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children in families where the parent with care receives means tested benefits are in receipt of maintenance from the non-resident parent, for each region. [61451]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

On 31 August 1998 we estimated that 491,400 parents with care with a full child support assessment were receiving a means tested benefit. Of these cases 108,920 received maintenance paid through the Child Support Agency (CSA) in the quarter ending 31 August 1998 and a further 71,160 had maintenance arranged for payment direct from the non-resident parent.

Income Support

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate what the lower and upper capital limits for income support would be in April 1999 if they had been uprated by (a) prices and (b) the higher of earnings or prices since introduction. [61460]

Angela Eagle: The value of the lower capital limit was set at £3,000 in April 1988. In April 1999 it would be £4,825 if it had been uprated by the RPI and £4,610 if it had been uprated by the ROSSI.

The value of the upper capital limit was set at £8,000 in April 1990. In April 1999 it would be £11,291 if it had been uprated by the RPI and £11,160 if it had been uprated by the ROSSI[1].

If the limits had been uprated by the higher of prices and earnings, in April 1998[2] the lower capital limit would be £5,426 and the upper capital limit would be £12,124.

[1] This uprating has been carried out from the respective start dates of the capital limit rates up to September 1998 (which corresponds with April 1999 benefit rates).

[2] The publication of the Average Earnings Index for September 1998 has been delayed by ONS while they conduct a review of the Index. Uprating has therefore been calculated up to April 1998.

Notes:

1. The figures have been rounded to the nearest pound.

2. The figures exclude residential care and nursing home cases, for which the capital limits are £10,000 and £16,000.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the average payment is per week for a lone parent on income support with (a) one child, (b) two children and (c) three children. [61730]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Average weekly amount of Income Support to lone parents on Income Support by number of dependants—May 1998

Family size	Number	Average amount £ per week
All families	961,000	79.67
1 dependant	434,000	69.63
2 dependants	318,000	81.85
3 dependants	143,000	92.48

Notes:

1. Lone parents are defined as those single people with dependants who are not in receipt of a disability or pensioner premium
2. Includes dependants aged 16–18
3. Figures are based on a 5 per cent. sample and as such are subject to a degree of sampling error
4. Numbers of lone parents are rounded to the nearest thousand
5. Families with 1 to 3 dependants do not sum to the total for all families as there are also families with 4 or more dependants in receipt of Family Credit

Disability Benefits

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many new claims for disability living allowance and attendance allowance were made in each month between September 1996 and September 1998. [61692]

Mr. Timms: The information is in the table.

New claims for disability benefits

	Disability Living Allowance	Attendance Allowance

Family Credit

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families are in receipt of family credit with (a) one child, (b) two children and (c) three children. [61734]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Family Credit families by number of children

	Number receiving Family Credit

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many babies were born in families which were (a) already in receipt of family credit and (b) qualified for family credit as a result of the baby's birth in each of the last three years. [61732]

Angela Eagle: Information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Children born into families with Family Credit 1995–98

	Children born into families in receipt of Family Credit	New Family Credit claimants with a child aged under one
1995–96	23,000	70,000
1996–97	28,000	75,000
1997–98	29,000	71,000

Notes:
1. It is not possible to identify families who qualify for Family Credit as the result of the birth of a baby; however, information is available on the number of families who make a new claim to Family Credit and who have a child aged under one.
2. The number of children born into families may include a number who are adopted. It is not possible to identify whether a child entering a benefit unit is the natural child of the parents, or an adopted child.
3. Estimates of the number of children born into families whilst they are in receipt of Family Credit may be subject to an undercount as it has not been possible to accurately identify the number of multiple births children. It is not anticipated that this would greatly increase the estimates.
4. Numbers are rounded to the nearest thousand and may not sum due to totals.
5. Each year is representative of the period June to May inclusive.

Social Fund Maternity Grant

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the total amount paid out in social fund maternity grant was in the last year for which figures are available; and how many people received the social fund maternity grant. [61731]

Angela Eagle: During the year ending March 1998, 197,000 Maternity Payments were made at a total cost of £20 million.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pork Products

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received calling for pork and pork products sold in United Kingdom stores from 1 January 1999 to conform to UK standards set by his Department, with particular reference to (a) bacon, (b) ham, (c) gammon, (d) pork pies, (e) sausages and (f) other cooked and processed meats. [61160]

Mr. Rooker: We have received a number of representations, both from representative organisations and from individual pig producers. At a meeting earlier this month, the major retailers voluntarily gave the following assurances on sourcing to my right hon. Friend the Minister:

- own label fresh pork, bacon, ham, sausages and pork pies will come from stall and tether and MBM free systems. This assurance already applies to fresh pork and bacon, and is in the process of being extended to cover ham, sausages and pork pies; and,
- they will not sell imported fresh meat processed or packaged in the UK under a British label.

The major retailers also told my right hon. Friend that they were doing further work to develop their policies.

I am sure that these undertaking will be welcomed by the British pigmeat industry.

Pesticides

Mr. Flight: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the comparative costs of achieving label approval and registration of pesticides in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other EU countries; and what assessment he has made of the factors underlying the differences. [61181]

Mr. Rooker: All European Union countries regulate the safety and efficacy of agricultural pesticides on the basis of scientific data. For the most part, these data are provided by the companies concerned. The cost of generating data will therefore differ between countries according to the standards of safety and efficacy applied in each. EU countries also differ in their policy on charging companies for the costs of the work done by the regulatory authorities. Of the two sources of costs to industry, the cost of generating the data will normally be much greater than the fee.

The UK is thorough in its evaluation and recovers its full costs, mostly by means of fees which vary from £10 to £65,700 depending upon the type of application. Where regimes are less rigorous or do not recover the full costs of evaluation, the total cost to companies may be lower.

Under the framework of Council Directive 91/414, regulatory standards are being harmonised at a high level very similar to that presently applying in the UK. At present, Directive 91/414 does not require countries to recover their costs but the UK has pressed for such a requirement to be introduced.

Dairy Products

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the ban on dairy products to be lifted by the Saudi Arabian Government; and if he will make a statement. [61422]

Mr. Rooker: The Saudi Arabian ban on United Kingdom dairy products was introduced in June 1996. The Government are making strenuous efforts to get the ban lifted.

Artificial Inseminators

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to regulate unqualified artificial inseminators. [60919]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 27 November 1998]: Discussions are continuing with the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons about a number of issues in relation to veterinary surgery, including the insemination of livestock by unqualified lay people.

Oilseed Rape

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce guidelines on the cultivation of oilseed rape in relation to its proximity to domestic dwellings. [61510]

Mr. Rooker: A report by the Institute for Environment and Health in 1997, based on the most recent scientific research, found that oilseed rape may cause respiratory problems in certain people who already suffer from other allergy and respiratory problems. Currently available data suggest that allergic responses to oilseed rape make very little contribution to the burden of allergy in the United Kingdom. On the basis of its size and very limited distribution into the air, oilseed rape pollen does not contribute greatly to the total amount of pollen present in the general environment at the time oilseed rape flowers. We are, however, considering areas for further research suggested by the report but at present have no plans to introduce guidelines on the cultivation of the crop.

Beef Bones

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to receive further scientific advice on the public health risk from beef bones from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee. [61834]

Mr. Nick Brown: The Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee (SEAC) reviewed its assessment of the risk of bovine spongiform encephalopathy infectivity in the dorsal root ganglia and bone marrow of cattle when it met on 9 November. I have now received the Committee's scientific report, which is being published today.

The report is now being considered within Government and in particular by the Chief Medical Officer who will advise Ministers shortly. In addition, we need to take account of the potential effects of the EU Commission's recent proposal for Community-wide controls on Specified Risk Materials. Once this process of consideration is complete, there will be a further announcement about UK controls on bone in beef.

Copies of SEAC's scientific assessment are being placed in the Libraries of the House and are being made widely available, including on the Ministry's Internet website, with the purpose of informing debate.

Agricultural Wages Board

Mr. Flight: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what effect the introduction of (a) the Working Time Directive and (b) the minimum wage will have on the role of the Agricultural Wages Board, [illegible]tural Growers. [61178]

Mr. Rooker: The Agricultural Wages Board cannot set wage rates or terms and conditions of employment that are less generous than provided for in wider employment law such as the Working Time Regulations and the National Minimum Wage Act 1998. The changes from these two new pieces of legislation will impact on all employers of agricultural workers but are likely to be of most significance to those sectors, such as horticulture, which employ large numbers of casual workers.

Equine Dentists

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to regulate equine dentists. [60920]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 27 November 1998]: Those equine dental procedures that are considered to be acts of veterinary surgery may be undertaken only by a registered veterinary surgeon or by a registered dentist at the request of a veterinary surgeon.

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to protect horses from unqualified people acting as equine dentists and supervising artificial insemination; and if he will make a statement on the regulation of this area. [60970]

Mr. Rooker: Discussions are continuing with the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons about a number of issues in relation to veterinary surgery, including the insemination of livestock and the practise of equine dentistry, by unqualified lay people.

Genetically Modified Food

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the activities of the United States Government in promoting the interests of the genetically modified food industry based in the United States of America; what pressure has been applied by the United States Government to his Department directly or indirectly in this respect; and if he will make a statement. [60931]

Mr. Rooker: No specific assessment of the United States' trade promotion activities relating to genetically modified (GM) foods has been made by this Department. However, the US is a major exporter of agricultural commodities and food, which include GM crops and foods containing ingredients derived from genetically modified organisms, and it is known that the US Government, like all governments, engage in trade promotion activity.

Any organisation which wishes to market GM crops or foods in the EU must meet the rigorous safety assessment requirements established under EC regulatory frameworks governing market approval for such crops and food. No pressure of any sort has been applied by the US Government on this Department in respect of GM crops or foods.

Kent and Essex Sea Fisheries Committee

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what support he will give to the Kent and Essex Sea Fisheries Committee to replace their sea fisheries protection vessel; and if he will support their application for EU funding. [61630]

Mr. Morley: Council Decision 95/527/EC provides for Community funding of certain expenditure incurred by Member States in monitoring the application of the Common Fisheries Policy. Applications for funding are routed through the Ministry but decisions on eligible expenditure, the rate of Community financial contribution, and the conditions to which contributions may be subject are determined by the Commission in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 18 of Council Regulation (EEC) No. 3760/92.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Planning Inspectors (Charges)

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent percentage increases there have been in the daily rates charged for planning inspectors conducting inquiries into local plans and other planning inquiries; and if he will make a statement. [61188]

Mr. Raynsford: I have asked the Planning Inspectorate's Chief Executive, Mr. Chris Shepley, to write to the right hon. and learned Member.

Letter from David Hanchet to Sir Nicholas Lyell, dated 1 December 1998:

The Secretary of State has asked Chris Shepley to reply to your Question about the daily rates charged for Planning Inspectors. I am replying in his absence today on official business.

The Planning Inspectorate makes charges for two categories of inquiry held by our Inspectors. The fee for conducting local plan inquiries was set at £340 per day in February 1996, and the fee for conducting other planning inquiries under various items of legislation was set at £350 per day in October 1994.

A review of the fees has shown that under our previous methodology the full costs of the service were not being recovered. As a result, new fees of £430 per day for local plan inquiries and £492 for the other recoverable inquiries are now planned (increases of 26.5% and 40.6% respectively).

Although these are significant it is important to remember that a. the service was effectively being subsided in the past;

b. there have been no increases for nearly 3 years in one case and over 4 in the other;

c. although the daily rate has increased, the service provided has become steadily more efficient through a variety of management measures taken by the Planning Inspectorate. As a result, the actual duration of inquiries, and therefore the number of chargeable days, has reduced.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the policies applied by English Partnerships when deciding whether to fund development proposals affecting sites of special scientific interest are to be reviewed following the release of the consultation paper on better protection and management of SSSIs. [61006]

Mr. Meale: English Partnerships is currently reviewing all aspects of its environmental policy, including that on development proposals affecting SSSIs. This review is taking account of the commitments set out in my department's consultation document "Better Protection and Management of SSSIs", that Government Departments and agencies publish statements of commitment, or sign appropriate memoranda of understanding with DETR, in relation to the obligation to secure the protection and positive management of special sites for which they are responsible.

The review will result in the production of new internal guidance, which will include more specific advice on how the Agency operates on land close to, or within, SSSIs and other environmentally sensitive areas. A copy of this will be placed in the Library of the House when available.

Housing Sounding Board

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many tenant representatives there are on the Housing Sounding Board. [61427]

Ms Armstrong: I established the Housing Sounding Board in December last year to discuss a number of housing issues. Members of the Board have a wide range of experience in housing and related issues and serve in a personal capacity. The current members are:

Chris Holmes, Shelter

Alan Kilburn, formerly of Home Housing Association

Steve Mycio, Manchester City Council

Mike Ockenden, Barclays

Anne Power, London School of Economics

Heather Rabbatts, Lambeth Borough Council

Steve Wilcox, University of York and HACAS

Neale Coleman, Paddington Consultancy Partnership

Steve Hilditch, Paddington Consultancy Partnership.

As the Board nears the end of its first year, I am reviewing its future purposes and membership. As part of that review, I will be considering tenant and other representation.

Council Tax

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what would have been the additional increase in the council tax at Band D of each local authority in 1998–99 if the proposed council tax limitation scheme had been introduced this year, assuming the limit had been set at five per cent. over 1997–98. [61666]

Ms Armstrong: We have abolished crude and universal capping and have not proposed a council tax limitation scheme for 1999–2000 or subsequent years. We will be taking reserve powers to limit council taxes in the Local Government Bill published on 1 December 1998.

Local Government (Honorary Freedoms)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will confer upon charter trustees and town councils the powers contained in section 249 of the Local Government Act 1972 in respect to the conferring of honorary freedoms. [61833]

Mr. Raynsford: No. I am advised that for my right hon. Friend to extend the powers in section 249 of the Local Government Act 1972 to include charter trustees and town councils would be unusual, unexpected and inappropriate. We have no plans for further legislation in this field.

Train Operating Companies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the outcome of his meeting with train operating companies. [61938]

Dr. Reid: The Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister for Transport in London and I met representatives from the rail franchisees and Railtrack on November 26. The meeting was frank and constructive. It represented a significant first step aimed at delivering improvements to passengers.

The Government believe, and the industry accepts, that the target must be progressive, year-on-year improvement in performance. Measures identified to improve service in the short term included the recruitment and training of 800 drivers and the introduction over the next year of 500 new vehicles, of which about half will be additional to the current fleet. There will be a wider-ranging National Railways Summit next February to build on measures and actions identified at this first meeting.

Aircraft Noise

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the research on the effect of aircraft noise on sleep disturbance which his Department has commissioned, indicating sites chosen for noise trials. [61974]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have commissioned a research trial on the effect of aircraft noise on sleep disturbance. This trial is to assess analytical techniques and methodology, and their limitations, to help us decide whether to proceed with a full-scale study either of sleep prevention or of total sleep loss, and to determine what should be included in any such study. The trial will involve taking measurements of people sleeping in their own homes and will be based at Manchester Airport, which provides a suitable combination of densely populated communities close to the airport with a spread of aircraft noise throughout the night. It may be extended to Heathrow if actual noise levels in the early morning at Manchester prove insufficient for the purposes of the trial. No specific sites have been selected yet. The steering group for the study includes representatives of the consultative committees from Manchester, Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted, along with the airport management, airlines and environmentalists.

Tourism

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to include provision for spending on tourism in the Standard Spending Assessment. [61086]

Ms Armstrong: The element of the Standard Spending Assessments for Environmental, Protective and Cultural Services (formerly known as "Other Services"), makes allowance for spending on a group of services which includes tourism.

Small and Medium Businesses

Mr. Singh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps the Government are taking to help small and medium businesses improve their environmental performance. [62215]

Mr. Meacher: By setting up a single environment and energy helpline (0800 58 57 94), the Government are making it very much easier for SMEs to find out how they can improve their environmental performance. The Helpline, which will be run under the auspices of the Government's Energy Efficiency and Environmental Technology Best Practice Programmes, will come into operation today. It will provide callers with free access to:

- impartial best practice information
- up to two hours telephone assistance from an energy or environment expert; and, where it would be beneficial
- on-site technical advice, where this would be beneficial and worthwhile.

Small and medium businesses are an important part of the UK economy. There are about 3M firms, 80,000 of which employ 20 to 250 people. They employ around 4 million people and have a turnover of £4 billion. They are also responsible for one-third of the carbon dioxide emissions from business and a significant proportion of other waste. Smaller companies therefore have a significant role to play to help meet our climate change targets.

There can be significant benefits in improving environmental performance for companies of all sizes. On average, a fifth of energy and a quarter of a company's waste can be avoided cost-effectively. Saving resources saves money and improves competitiveness—gain, not pain. The Government's two Best Practice Programmes provide authoritative advice on how to improve environmental and energy efficiency performance. For business, there are competitiveness advantage. And, for everyone, there are environmental advantages. The Energy Efficiency Best Practice Programme, for example, has helped to save energy worth around £650 million a year and consequently 3.25 million tonnes of carbon—across the nation.

To ensure this new initiative is a success, the helpline will be closely co-ordinated with Government Office Regional Energy and Environmental Management Contacts (REEMCs), Business Links, green business clubs, the Energy Saving Trust's Energy Efficiency Advice Centres, the Environment Agency's regional offices, Training and Enterprise Councils and local authorities.

Millennium Dome (Transport)

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has held with (a) Greenwich Council, (b) London Underground and (c) the Port of London Authority over contingency plans for transport to the Millennium Dome. [61980]

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London, through her Millennium Access Co-ordination Group, asked London Underground Limited to lead the production of contingency plans for transport to the Millennium Dome, and keep the group informed of progress. Progress was presented to the group in October, at which time there was discussions on how the work was progressing and next steps.

My hon. Friend has had no discussions with the Borough of Greenwich or the Port of London Authority on contingency planning. The Borough of Greenwich has, however, recently become a member of the Millennium Access group and will therefore participate in future discussions on this work.

Connex

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps the Franchise Director has taken to involve the train rolling stock companies in supplying Connex's rolling stock replacement needs. [61877]

Dr. Reid: The two train operating companies franchised to Connex will have to replace or modify certain trains to meet their commitments to the Franchising Director and any requirements of the Health and Safety Executive. How they achieve this is a matter for the companies.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Silent Suspects

Mr. Savidge: To ask the Attorney-General what approach prosecutors take to reliance on inferences which may be drawn from silence during police questioning at a time when the suspect is denied access to legal advice, having regard to the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in John Murray v United Kingdom. [62217]

The Attorney-General: The Government intend to introduce the necessary legislation in the forthcoming Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Bill and this legislation will be extended to Northern Ireland, by way of negative resolution Order in Council, to ensure that the domestic law which was at issue in Murray v United Kingdom is fully compatible with our obligations under the European Convention on Human Rights. As an interim measure, I have today promulgated to prosecuting authorities guidance about the handling of cases where the evidence available to the prosecution would include such inferences as might be drawn from the accused's silence in the circumstances covered by Sections 34, 36 and 37 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 (and corresponding provisions in Northern Ireland) when the suspect has been denied access to legal advice at the time of questioning.

A copy of the guidance has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Its effect is that the prosecution should not seek to rely on inferences drawn from silence before access to legal advice had been granted. In the event that a court, of its own volition, indicates an intention to draw any such inferences, its attention would be drawn to the judgment in the John Murray case.

DEFENCE

Security Activities (Expenditure)

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much expenditure in 1996–1997 can be associated directly with security activities in (a) Northern Ireland, (b) the Falklands and (c) the remaining United Kingdom dependent territories. [61696]

Mr. George Robertson: Expenditure directly associated with security activities cannot be distinguished from that on other activities. The following costs of the military presence provide a broad guide to the overall level of commitment in 1996–97:

(a) Northern Ireland £505 million.

This figure relates to the costs incurred by the General Officer Commanding, Northern Ireland. It thus excludes related elements of expenditure, incurred elsewhere within Class I Votes, which are not separately identified.

(b) Falklands £81 million.

This figure relates to the costs incurred by the Commander, British Forces Falkland Islands (CBFFI) only. It does not thus include the costs of the RAF airbridge to the Falkland Islands, nor the cost of naval deployments to the South Atlantic. These costs fall to other budgets and are not separately identified.

(c) UK dependent territories (excluding Falkland Islands) Gibraltar £63 million.

Costs incurred in the support of the remaining dependent territories are not separately identified and are relatively small. Expenditure is principally on the operation of the West Indies Guardship which supports UK dependent territories throughout the Caribbean, among other tasks. Otherwise, support generally relates to the provision of a small number of Loan Service Personnel to assist with training. The cost of the military presence in South Georgia and the Sandwich Islands is included in CBFFI's budget.

Territorial Army

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the approved complement was of the Territorial Army Reserve in (a) May 1979 and (b) May 1997. [60859]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The Territorial Army established as of 1 May 1997 was 59,000 posts, excluding Non Regular Permanent Staff. Establishment figures for the year 1979 are not available as records of that time only detail the strength of the TA, which was 59,400 in May 1979.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the impact his announcement on the future of the TA will have on manpower levels in Chelmsford. [61887]

Mr. Doug Henderson: There are currently 136 Territorial Army posts in Chelmsford. The restructuring of the TA will reduce this figure to 120.

Hepatitis A

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what precautions are available to (a) forces personnel, (b) officials and (c) Ministers in his Department travelling overseas and facing the risk of hepatitis A infection; [61053]

(2) what advice is offered to (a) forces personnel, (b) officials and (c) Ministers in his Department travelling overseas and facing the risk of hepatitis A infection, with regard to deciding whether to receive (i) y- (gamma-) globulin or (ii) the alternative hepatitis A vaccine. [61054]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 27 November 1998]: Members of the Armed Forces, Defence Ministers and officials travelling overseas and facing the risk of hepatitis A infection are offered immunisation against the disease in accordance with advice issued by the Department of Health. Gamma globulin (Known as human normal immunoglobulin) would be offered, in addition to hepatitis A vaccination, for short notice visits to areas of significant risk when protection is required within 10 days of the first dose of hepatitis A vaccine. Advice on appropriate immunisation is available from MOD medical staff.

Defence Industry Seminar, Rome

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the British participants in the defence industry seminar organised by the Italian presidency of the Western European Union in conjunction with the Rome ministerial meeting; and if he will make a statement. [60978]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 27 November 1998]: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, accompanied by officials from the MOD and one from the Department of Trade and Industry, attended the seminar in Rome on 17 November. Representatives of the British defence industry were also present. The seminar considered the issues surrounding the restructuring of European defence industry, both within Europe and in relation to the global market. Among those present were members and observer countries of the Western European Armaments Group and representatives of the European defence industry and European Commission.

Faslane and Coulport

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) civil and (b) military personnel are employed at (i) the Clyde Submarine Base, Faslane and (ii) the Royal Naval Armaments Depot, Coulport. [61844]

Mr. Doug Henderson: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Trident

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate how many (a) direct and (b) indirect civilian jobs rely upon the Trident programme currently; and how many will in (i) 2000, (ii) 2010 and (iii) 2020. [61846]

Mr. George Robertson: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Atomic Weapons Establishments

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people are employed by the atomic weapons establishments at (a) Aldermaston, (b) Burghfield and (c) Blacknest. [61845]

Mr. Spellar: AWE plc currently employ 4,055 staff at Aldermaston, 544 at Burghfield and 13 at Blacknest. These figures exclude Hunting-BRAE staff, contractors and sub-contractors, Ministry of Defence Police and other MOD employees.

Royal Dockyards

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) civilian and (b) military personnel are employed at (i) the Royal Dockyard, Rosyth and (ii) the Royal Dockyard, Devonport. [61847]

Mr. Spellar: The Royal Dockyards at Rosyth and Devonport were privatised in January 1997 and are now owned by Babcock Rosyth Defence Limited and Devonport Management Limited, respectively.

In addition to the Dockyard companies' workforce, the following Ministry of Defence employed personnel also work at the Royal Dockyards (based on the latest information available):

	Civilian	Military
Rosyth Royal Dockyard	459.5	50
Devonport Royal Dockyard	208.5	15

PRIME MINISTER

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the statement by Mr. Denis Halliday, the former United Nations Humanitarian Co-ordinator in Iraq, in Middle East International of 13 November, a copy of which has been given to him, that the policy of the United Kingdom and United States of America towards Iraq is incompatible with the Charter of the United Nations. [61694]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 30 November 1998]: Sanctions on Iraq were imposed under and in accordance with the UN Charter.

The latest report by the UN Secretary General on the "oil for food" programme, published on 19 November, notes that the programme continues to have a positive effect on the living conditions of the Iraqi people.

Cabinet Committee

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Prime Minister what the composition and terms of reference are of the Cabinet Committee on Productivity and Competitiveness mentioned in the Pre-Budget report. [62254]

The Prime Minister: I have asked my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to chair a new Cabinet Sub-Committee on Productivity and Competitiveness. The composition and terms of reference for this Committee are:

Ministerial Sub-Committee on Productivity and Competitiveness EA(PC)

Composition

Chancellor of the Exchequer (Chair)

Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions

Secretary of State for the Home Department

Secretary of State for Education and Employment

Minister for the Cabinet Office

Secretary of State for Scotland

Secretary of State for Northern Ireland

Secretary of State for Trade and Industry

Secretary of State for Wales

Terms of Reference

"To consider measures to improve the productivity and competitiveness of the United Kingdom economy".

Closed-list System

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Prime Minister when the Government first announced that they planned to introduce a closed-list system in respect of elections to the European Parliament. [61841]

The Prime Minister: When the European Parliamentary Elections Bill was published and introduced on 29 October 1997, it set out the precise nature of the proposed system.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fisheries (Licensing)

Mr. Quinn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements are being made for the registration and licensing of the maximum continuous engine power of fishing vessels; and if he will make a statement. [62219]

Mr. Morley: On 17 December 1997, Official Report, columns 345–46, I announced that Fisheries Departments planned to introduce from 1 January 1999 phased arrangements for recording maximum continuous engine power on fishing vessel licences.

Following that announcement, the arrangements for the recording of maximum continuous engine power have been the subject of detailed consideration by Fisheries Departments, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, and the Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA). Since the fishing vessel licensing regime operated by Fisheries Departments is dependent on vessel characteristics as registered by the Registrar of Shipping and Seamen, part of MCA, parallel changes will be introduced in the arrangements for registering fishing vessel engine power. These changes have also been discussed with representatives of the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations, the Northern Ireland Fishermen's Federation and the Scottish Fishermen's Federation as part of a wider review of UK fishing vessel licensing.

We are now writing to advise all fishing vessel owners and licence holders of the new arrangements.

From 1 July 1999, new registrations, re-registrations, and changes in existing registrations affecting ownership or vessel characteristics (engine power, length or breadth), and the licensing of such vessels, are to be based on the declaration and recording of maximum continuous engine power. The permanent derating of engines will be permitted but vessel owners will have to provide a signed statement or certificate from the engine manufacturer or a suitably qualified marine engineer setting out the steps that have been taken to achieve such a modification. De-rated engine power will be registered and licensed only where the MCA and Fisheries Departments are satisfied that the modifications are permanent.

The Merchant Shipping (Registration of Ships) Regulations 1993 will be amended to provide specifically for the registration of maximum continuous or permanently modified engine power.

From 1 January 2000, the maximum continuous or permanently derated engine power of vessels registered before 1 July 1999 will be taken to be that declared on the Certificate of Registry and shown on the fishing vessel licence. When vessels are registered between 1 January and 30 June 1999, owners will wish to take appropriate action to ensure that they declare the full power of their vessels (maximum continuous or permanently derated engine power) because this is the basis on which subsequent enforcement will take place.

Checks will be undertaken from 1 January 2000 to ensure that the apparent installed engine power of fishing vessels is consistent with the registered and licensed engine power. Where the apparent installed power is greater than the registered and licensed power, a fishing vessel's licence will become invalid and a new licence will not be issued until the owner acquires additional vessel capacity units (VCUs) to cover the deficit in engine power or undertakes permanent de-rating of the vessel's engine. However, the owners of vessels registered before 1 January 1999 will have until 31 December 2004 to rectify any anomalies in their registered engine power if they provide a written undertaking specifying the steps they are taking.

To assist the implementation of the new arrangements, a capacity penalty will be payable only on the additional VCUs needed to cover the discrepancy between apparent installed and registered engine power provided no other changes are made to the characteristics of the vessel. A 20 per cent. capacity penalty will operate unless the adjustment to engine power is made before 31 December 2001 in which circumstances the penalty will be 10 per cent. For this purpose, it will be permissible for vessel owners to split VCUs and licences between two or more vessels.

The arrangements will apply to the licensing of fishing vessels wherever they operate. However, from 1 January 1999, vessels applying for licences for the first time in respect of fishing opportunities in external and other waters will be expected to satisfy Fisheries Departments that the maximum continuous or permanently derated engine power has been declared and appropriately licensed.

Finally, as announced last December, the current licensing arrangements for fishing vessels are being reviewed jointly by Fisheries Departments and representatives of the fishing industry. This announcement is, therefore, without prejudice to any further changes that are recommended in licensing including capacity penalties for licence transfers and aggregations.

Mr. Quinn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what changes he proposes to make in the arrangements for the licensing of pelagic freezer trawlers and pair trawling; and if he will make a statement. [62218]

Mr. Morley: In July 1998, Fisheries Departments issued a consultation document seeking comments on proposals to assist pelagic freezer trawling including the aggregation of whitefish with pelagic licences and pair trawling with vessels from other Member States. The proposals attracted wide-ranging comments from the fishing industry.

After careful consideration, it has been decided to introduce a time-limited scheme for the introduction or replacement of pelagic freezer trawlers. Any person may introduce a pelagic freezer trawler into the UK fleet by aggregating Category A whitefish licences and/or category A pelagic trawler licences with existing Category A pelagic freezer trawler or purse seine licences or licence entitlements, provided:

(i) proposals to introduce or replace a pelagic freezer trawler are notified in writing to Fisheries Departments by 28 February 1999;

(ii) at least 40 per cent. of the vessel capacity units (VCUs) of the incoming vessel are covered by licences or licence entitlements from pelagic freezer trawlers or purse seiners;

(iii) the tonnage and engine power of any incoming vessel must be no greater than the total tonnage and the total engine power of the vessels from which its licence entitlements derive;

(iv) the incoming vessel is registered by the Registrar of Shipping and Seamen and licensed by one of the Fisheries Departments by 30 June 2001.

A capacity penalty will be payable only on that part of the capacity of the incoming vessel which is not covered by Category A pelagic freezer or purse seine licences: that penalty will be 20 per cent.

In submitting proposals to introduce or replace a pelagic freezer trawler, the prospective owner will have to demonstrate, to the satisfaction of Fisheries Departments, a genuine intention to pursue pelagic freezer trawling and access to sufficient fishing opportunities to support the operation of the incoming vessel. Any effort expended by the new vessel would count towards existing effort targets. Consequently, any pelagic effort allocated to producer organisations or other groups to cover an incoming vessel's activities could amount only to the allocation for the existing freezer vessel it replaced and/or the fishing opportunities linked to any other pelagic licences used in the licence transaction. No additional effort would be available as a result of the aggregation of whitefish licences.

For the time being, the prohibition on pair trawling with vessels from other Member States will remain in place. The prohibition will, however, be reviewed in the light of the new rules to regulate transhipment and joint fishing operations which the Commission are expected to draw up following changes in the EU's control regulation for fisheries.

These arrangements, which take effect immediately, are being notified to all holders of pelagic freezer trawler and purse seine licences.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Arms Trade

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to ensure that the European Code of Conduct on the arms trade is adopted into UK law; and what plans he has to make arms brokering to arms embargoed countries a crime. [61492]

Mrs. Roche: The EU Code of Conduct on Arms Exports, which was an Anglo-French initiative, was adopted by the EU General Affairs Council on 8 June. However, as our own national arms export criteria are not legally binding, the UK Government felt that it would not have been appropriate or realistic to press our partners to sign up to a legally binding instrument to give effect to similar criteria at the EU level.

The Government already impose controls on trafficking and brokering under the United Nations Act 1946 where this is necessary to implement a binding United Nations decision. In addition, the White Paper on Strategic Export Controls, which was published on 1 July, contains proposals to extend controls on trafficking and brokering in several areas, including to countries subject to other types of embargo, whether as a result of non-binding decisions of the UN or decisions of the EU, Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe or the UK Government. This would mean that, as is already the case for binding UN arms embargoes, it would be an offence for persons in the UK or UK persons abroad to be involved in trafficking or brokering in controlled goods to countries subject to these other types of embargo, without a valid licence. The use of a licensing system, rather than imposing an outright ban, would enable the Government to sanction such transfers on the rare occasions that they are desirable (e.g. the transfer of equipment to peacekeeping forces in an embargoed destination).

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he intends to take to ensure that the Council of Ministers Working Group on arms exports agrees a common list of items be controlled by the EU Code. [61495]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.

The CFSP Working Group on Conventional Arms Exports is taking forward work to agree a common list of military equipment covered by the EU Code of Conduct on Arms Exports. The UK is playing an active role in this work with a view to ensuring its successful conclusion.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he intends to take to ensure that there is clear and transparent annual reporting of the different types and amounts of weapons covered by arms export licences granted and denied by (a) the UK and (b) other European Union countries. [61493]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.

The Government are preparing a report on UK strategic exports, which we will publish as soon as is possible. On the question of the content of the report, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) on 14 July 1998, Official Report, column 149.

Most other EU Member States already publish annual reports on their own defence exports. Once our own report has been published, we will consider how best to achieve similar levels of transparency in the information released by other Member States.

Afro-Caribbean Businesses

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what initiatives he has taken to encourage the start-up and growth of Afro-Caribbean-owned businesses. [61177]

Mrs. Roche: The Government seek to provide a stable economic environment which encourages the start-up and growth of businesses from all sectors of the population.

Business Link Services are aimed at the needs of the local business community. In areas where there is a high proportion of Afro-Caribbean businesses, issues of particular concern to them must be addressed.

As part of the Enhanced Accreditation Criteria (launched April 1998) Business Link partnerships must now demonstrate that Business Link advisers have the appropriate background for dealing with their client base and that the Business Link Board is representative of the business community.

Internet Sales

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he proposes to ensure future participation by United Kingdom companies in the projected market increase for software and other digital product sales over the Internet. [61832]

Mrs. Roche: The department is building on existing mechanisms such as the Software Business Network (SBN), Trade UK and the Northern Ireland Growth Challenge (NIGC) which currently support companies in these emerging areas. Our intention is to create in the UK the best environment in the world in which to trade electronically by 2002. We will introduce legislation during this session of Parliament to help to build confidence in electronic commerce.

Further measures will be announced in the forthcoming White Paper on Competitiveness.

Dual-use Goods (Exports)

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements are in place to authorise the export of controlled dual-use goods by the United Kingdom Government. [62290]

Mrs. Roche: On 27 November, the Export Control Organisation of my Department issued an Open Licence which permits the export to any destination, subject to the conditions of the licence, all dual-use goods specified in any entry in Annexe I to Council Decision 94/942/CFSP or in Schedule 2 to the Dual-Use and Related Goods (Export Control) Regulations, where the export is by the Crown. A copy of the licence has been placed in the Library of the House.

Minewater Pollution

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress the Government have made in reviewing their policy on minewater pollution from abandoned mines. [62291]

Mr. Battle: The Government have reviewed their policy on water pollution from abandoned coal mines. I have written to the Chairman of the Authority setting out my views, and my commitment to the Authority's programme of preventing and treating significant water pollution from long-abandoned mines.

The Authority should also give a high priority to carrying out appropriate research, monitoring and preventive work and early treatment into pollution from more recently abandoned mines. These activities will be carried out in close collaboration with the Environment Agency and the Scottish Environment Protection Agency. The Coal Authority will have a separate minewater budget within its Grant-in-Aid to ensure that the Authority's other activities do not adversely affect its minewater programme, and that any emergencies can be dealt with.

The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, the Welsh Office and the Environment Agency, and the Scottish Office and the Scottish Environment Protection Agency are monitoring recently abandoned non-coal mines where there is a risk of pollution, with a view to taking appropriate action where no private operator is legally liable.

Copies of my letter to the Chairman of the Authority have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Information Warfare

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to introduce security standards to meet the challenge posed by information warfare techniques to United Kingdom telecommunications. [61671]

Mrs. Roche: Information warfare, like all criminal behaviour, impacts upon any organisation or business which makes use of information technology. The development of a British Standard BS 7799, which focuses on the Code of Practice for Information Security Management, introduced in 1994 was spearheaded by the Department to promote good information security management. The DTI is currently developing, with BSI/DISC and industry, c:cure, a scheme which will allow organisations, of all sizes and sectors, to measure and demonstrate that their information security management system is compliant against BS 7799.

Standards will also be an integral part of the EU's Electronic Signature Directive, and of the proposed UK legislation to support our policy on cryptography, but, of course, no matter what is made available, the use of these standards and the adoption of appropriate security controls is a commercial decision for businesses to make.

Petroleum Licensing

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what awards have been made in the 18 Seaward Round of Petroleum Licensing; and what plans he has for future licensing rounds. [62292]

Mr. Battle: Creative and innovative proposals are key features in the award of licences on 78 of the 82 blocks applied for in the 18th Round of Seaward Petroleum Licensing. The awards are made to a total of 44 companies, of which 22 are operators of one or more of the blocks.

The applications received showed that companies are still thinking creatively and generating innovative proposals to identify significant new prospects in the North Sea. Despite more than 30 years of exploration activity in the area, there was strong competition for attractive blocks and clear evidence that companies are prepared to look beyond traditional areas and the tested strata to find new resources.

The willingness of companies to test innovative thinking with both further technical analysis and early drilling where appropriate confirms that the industry still sees the North Sea as an exploration area with significant potential in undiscovered reserves. I believe that the open basis of this round—the first to allow companies to bid for almost any unlicensed blocks in mature areas of the United Kingdom Continental Shelf—encouraged companies to develop innovative ideas and bring them forward as licence applications.

When the 18th Round was launched in June this year, our expectation was that most applications would focus on acreage close to existing developments or infrastructure, where any discoveries were likely to be brought on stream as rapidly as possible in order to prolong the life of current assets.

In the event, a majority of the applications received reflected this pattern, and there was strong competition for several blocks, but an unexpected—and very pleasing—number of other applications were received which identified strata and structures with previously unrecognised hydrocarbon potential.

Some of these concepts were developed in blocks which have been licensed and explored for conventional targets before. Twelve of the blocks awarded have not previously been licensed. Eight of these are granted to the Shell/Esso partnership whose application stood out for its creative approach.

Two of the blocks applied for—48/19d and 210/20c—have been divided between competing applicants. This will allow presumed extensions of adjacent fields—Anglia and Otter respectively—into the new acreage to be appraised and brought into production as soon as possible, while at the same time maximising exploration of the remaining area.

I look forward to seeing the successful applicants moving forward to explore their new holdings, and to develop any new reserves they may discover.

I expect to make a further announcement about a 19th Seaward Round next year.

Euro

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the cost of the current advertising campaign urging business to prepare for the euro. [61017]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

The Euro Preparations Unit's communication campaign on the euro is specifically targeted at ensuring that UK businesses especially small and medium enterprises (SMEs), are aware of the implications of the introduction of the single currency from 1 January 1999. The campaign involved press advertising in July, direct mailing to 1.6 million SMEs, supported by TV commercials in September, and further press and radio advertising in October.

The television, press and radio elements of the campaign cost approximately £4.75 million. This figure does not include VAT.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the number of people likely to benefit from the introduction of the national minimum wage in each parliamentary constituency. [61804]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Chris Ruane, dated 1 December 1998:

As the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the number of people likely to benefit from the introduction of the national minimum wage.

It is ONS policy to reply to statistical PQs, where possible, by referring to published results. Information from the 1998 New Earnings Survey (NES) required to answer this question is not comprehensively published, but is included in special tables recently placed in the House of Commons Library.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Zimbabwe

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much the United Kingdom's contribution is to multilateral donor projects in Zimbabwe in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000. [61852]

Clare Short: The total multilateral official development assistance received by Zimbabwe in 1996, the last year for which figures are available, was £61.6 million. The UK's imputed share was £6.9 million.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the projects sponsored by her Department in Zimbabwe for (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000, giving their value and expected expiration date. [61851]

Clare Short: Projects where the Department for International Development's commitment is over £0.5 million are listed. Figures for expenditure in 1998–99 and 1999–2000 are not available.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the IMF's decision to suspend aid to Zimbabwe. [61853]

Clare Short: We understand that the IMF are seeking clarification of the Government of Zimbabwe's budget commitments before the IMF Board considers release of further tranches of the Standby Arrangement.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with the Foreign Secretary concerning the provision of aid to Zimbabwe. [61858]

Clare Short: I have regular meetings with the Foreign Secretary on a range of issues including events in Zimbabwe.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the good governance criteria the Government have for assessing Zimbabwe's eligibility for assistance from her Department. [61854]

Clare Short: Our approach to good government is set out in the White Paper 'Eliminating World Poverty', and embraces democratic accountability, the protection of human rights and the rule of law.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the Zimbabwe Government's land reform programme up to 1 December 1997. [61855]

Clare Short: The Government of Zimbabwe's land reform programme began after Independence in 1980. So far, the programme has benefited some 70,000 families. An evaluation by the then ODA in 1988 showed that the resettlement had shown a good rate of return, but had little impact on the poverty in the communal areas. Poverty also exists in the new resettlement areas. The Government of Zimbabwe established a Commission of Inquiry into Appropriate Agricultural Land Tenure Systems (the 'Rukuni Commission') which in 1994 made recommendations on tenure, subdivision, administrative decentralisation, and land taxation, among other issues. These recommendations are for consideration as part of the second phase of the Government's Land Reform and Resettlement Programme. In November 1997, the Government of Zimbabwe notified 1,471 landowners of their intention compulsorily to acquire further land.

Her Majesty's Government have made it clear since May 1997 that there is a strong case for land redistribution in Zimbabwe but that we will provide support only if the programme is part of a wider poverty reduction strategy, is transparent and pro-poor and complies with Zimbabwean law on land acquisition and compensation.

Mozambique

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much the United Kingdom's contribution is to multilateral donor projects in Mozambique in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000. [61857]

Clare Short: The total multilateral official development assistance received by Mozambique in 1996, the last year for which figures are available, was £236 million. The UK's imputed share was £18.6 million.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the projects sponsored by her Department in Mozambique for (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000, giving their value and expected expiration dates. [61856]

Clare Short: The details requested are as follows:

Project	Commitment (£ million)	Expiry date
Zambezia Agricultural Development Project	7.75	2001
Zambezia Feeder Roads	7.06	2000
NGO '70:30' Scheme	2.00	2000
Programme Aid	20.00	1999
Assistance for Customs	9.30	1999
Secondary English Teaching	2.36	2002

Figures for expenditure in 1998/9 and 1999/2000 are not available. I will send the hon. Member a copy of DFID's recently published Country Strategy Paper for Mozambique.

Hurricane Mitch

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the progress of the emergency relief operation in the countries affected by Hurricane Mitch. [61417]

Clare Short: The immediate life-saving phase of the emergency operation is over. However, there are continuing relief needs. We are helping with the response as part of the internationally co-ordinated relief effort. Our contribution to date has been well received.

We will continue to monitor closely the situation in the region through our Embassies and the United Nations. We are also keeping in touch with the UK based representatives of those countries affected by Hurricane Mitch and with the non-governmental organisations providing assistance. I have sent an expert team from my Department to the region to review the relief effort and consider what further support we might provide for continuing emergency assistance. They will report back to me later this week.

The needs of the region for immediate and medium-term reconstruction will be discussed at an emergency Consultative Group meeting, convened by the Inter-American Development Bank in Washington on 10–11 December, involving all the key donors, both multilateral and bilateral. My Department will be represented. We are currently considering how to refocus our development assistance programme for Central America to address the needs of recovery and reconstruction.

Kosovo

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the current humanitarian situation in Kosovo. [61414]

Clare Short: A Department for International Development mission visited Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Albania between 16–26 November to assess conditions on the ground and the state of aid co-ordination. A humanitarian disaster has been averted, but the situation remains serious and must be monitored carefully. The internally displaced persons who were living out of doors are now back under shelter. The international response is generally adequate to meet current emergency needs of displaced people and refugees for food, blankets, stoves, mattresses and fuels. It is vital that the current level of humanitarian operations is maintained over the winter.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Protection of Wrecks Act 1973

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will encourage the use of designated police liaison officers to complement the provisions for the protection of sites of wrecks under the Protection of Wrecks Act 1973. [60867]

Mr. Alan Howarth: As a result of recent allegations of offences under the Protection of Wrecks Act 1973, my Department will be writing to all relevant local constabularies clarifying the legal position in relation to the 1973 Act, and giving details of existing designated sites within their area of responsibility.

We welcome the proposal for local constabularies to set up designated police liaison officers, and are examining how this can best be taken forward.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what changes he is planning to the Protection of Wrecks Act 1973. [60866]

Mr. Alan Howarth: There are no plans to amend the Protection of Wrecks Act 1973 before the proposed transfer of responsibility for underwater archaeology to English Heritage announced in my Department's Departmental Spending Review. English Heritage may carry out a review of the operation of the 1973 Act after the transfer of responsibility has been carried out.

HOME DEPARTMENT

John Murray

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce the Government's response to the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of John Murray v. the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [62171]

Mr. Straw: In the case of John Murray v. the United Kingdom, the European Court of Human Rights held that it was a breach of Article 6 of the Convention to deny the applicant access to legal advice in circumstances where inferences could be drawn from his silence during questioning. The Government have concluded that the only sure way to prevent a repetition of the circumstances which prevailed in the Murray case is to amend the relevant legislation and the Codes of Practice made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, the Police and Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1989 and the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, so as to prohibit the drawing of inferences from silence when a suspect is questioned at a police station while denied access to legal advice. The Government therefore intend to introduce the necessary legislation in the forthcoming Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Bill, and this legislation will be extended to Northern Ireland by way of Negative Resolution Order in Council.

In the interim, the Government will take such steps that are possible, without legislation, to ensure that no one is put in the same position which arose in the Murray case. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General will shortly be issuing guidance to prosecutors and, in parallel, my Department and the Northern Ireland Office will shortly be issuing a circular to the police. This guidance will seek to ensure that the usual practice will be for suspects to have access to legal advice before being interviewed at a police station. Where access to legal advice is denied, the police will be encouraged to put inference-bearing questions again after the suspect has been given the opportunity to obtain such advice. Additionally, prosecutors will be advised not to seek reliance on inferences drawn from silence before access to legal advice was granted. I am arranging for a copy of the guidance to the police to be placed in the Library.

Immigration

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many cases since his appointment he has exercised his discretion to grant leave to remain in the United Kingdom to foreign nationals resident in the United Kingdom on the grounds of compassionate circumstances. [61992]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I regret that information on this particular reason for granting leave to remain is not collected separately. Applications for leave to remain on compassionate grounds are considered in the light of the particular circumstances at that time and of any concessionary policy under which the original leave may have been given.

Passports and Visas

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to (a) speed up his Department's handling of applications for passports and visas and subsequent appeals and (b) to improve the handling of related complaints from hon. Members. [61085]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The UK Passport Agency provides passport services for British nationals in the United Kingdom, and I have set the following service standard target for 1998–99:

> To process properly completed straightforward applications within a maximum of 15 working days in April, and 10 working days for the remainder of the year.
> In seeking to meet this target, the Agency will give priority to customers' travel needs, aiming to meet declared travel dates for at least 99.99 per cent. of passports issued.

The Agency's turnround times have slipped beyond this target on a number of occasions this year, but customers' urgent travel needs have been met.

The Passport Agency has an internal target of dealing with correspondence, including complaints from hon. Members, in a maximum of 10 working days, and this target has been met on 90 per cent. of occasions.

As regards applications for British citizenship, these are currently taking longer to consider than I would wish. Unfortunately, the spending plans we inherited from the previous Government, together with the increased pressures on the Immigration and Nationality Directorate, arising from increased passenger numbers arriving at our sea and airports and the numbers claiming asylum, mean that we do not have the financial resources to devote greater effort to citizenship work. This will change next year when we start to put into effect our plans for immigration and nationality work, which should result in twice as many decisions being taken and waiting times coming down significantly.

In relation to immigration appeals, the Immigration and Nationality Directorate published a consultation paper on the appeals system on 13 July. We are now considering responses and will bring forward our legislative proposals for accelerating procedures in the current session of Parliament.

On visas, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, which is responsible for the operation of the Entry Clearance service overseas, is committed to providing a fair, fast and firm entry clearance service to all visa applicants. Entry clearance officers in overseas posts are required to take decisions on as many straightforward non-residence visa applications as they can within 24 hours. The target set for this in 1998–99 is 87 per cent. rising to 90 per cent. by 2001–2.

Within the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Migration and Visa Correspondence Unit (MVCU) handle complaints from hon. Members about visa matters. I understand that the staffing of MVCU has been reinforced over the last year, and improvements made to their procedures, in an effort to provide a better service.

Extradition

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations, other than those made by or on behalf of a person awaiting a decision, he can take into account in the exercise of his discretion in extradition cases. [61866]

Mr. Straw: Section 13(4) of the Extradition Act 1989 places a duty on the Secretary of State to consider any representations made to him by a person who has received notice that the Secretary of State is contemplating making an order for his return to a foreign state under section 12 of the Act.

There is no equivalent provision in the Act for representations before the issuing of an Authority to Proceed: I shall be guided in my handling of representations, made for and against the issue of an Authority to Proceed, by general principles of fairness.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his role in extradition procedures; and what factors he takes into account in deciding whether or not to exercise his discretion. [61848]

Mr. Straw: Section 7(4) of the Extradition Act 1989 provides that, on receipt of an extradition request:

"the Secretary of State may issue an authority to proceed unless it appears to him that an order for the return of the person concerned could not lawfully be made, or would not in fact be made, in accordance with the provisions of this Act".

Factors which the Secretary of State takes into account when deciding whether to issue an authority to proceed are therefore the relevant extradition arrangements with a foreign state, the general restrictions on return provided for in section 6 of the 1989 Act in respect of his discretion as to whether he would ultimately make an order for the return of any person who has been committed by the court under section 9 of the Act.

Senator Pinochet

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what requests he has received for the exercise of his discretionary powers in the case of Augusto Pinochet; and when he received them. [61865]

Mr. Straw: On 21 October, the Extradition Section received a request from Senator Pinochet's legal representatives to exercise my discretion under section 8(4) of the Extradition Act 1989. Since 25 November, the Extradition Section at the Home Office has received a number of representations, for and against the issuing of an Authority to Proceed.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has made to the Bow Street Magistrates regarding the timetable of proceedings in the case of Augusto Pinochet. [61863]

Mr. Straw: One of my officials wrote to the Deputy Chief Clerk of Bow Street Magistrates' Court on 20 November and on 26 November. The letter of 26 November asked the Magistrate, when setting a date for receipt of an Authority to Proceed, to take into account the fact that I had received notice that I would be receiving representations for and against the issue of an Authority to Proceed.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the timetable for the exercise of his discretion in the case of Augusto Pinochet. [61864]

Mr. Straw: The Bow Street Magistrate, under section 9(5) of the Extradition Act 1989, has fixed Friday 11 December as the date by which I should decide whether to issue an Authority to Proceed.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding Augusto Pinochet following the judgment of the House of Lords in Regina v. Burtle and Commissioner of Police on 25 November. [61867]

Mr. Straw: By the end of Monday 30 November, the Extradition Section at the Home Office had received a number of representations, for and against the issue of an Authority to Proceed.

Mental Illness

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions he has consulted the Secretary of State for Health on the issue of mentally disordered offenders and mentally ill patients who are a potential threat to the community and themselves; and if he will make a statement. [61156]

Mr. George Howarth: My right hon. Friend and I discuss this matter regularly and our Departments have together been closely examining the opportunity for developing a new framework of law and management for both the mentally ill and those with personality disorders. This is a complex and difficult area, but we hope to make an announcement shortly.

Campsfield House

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions the contract points requirements have been exceeded at Campsfield House detention centre in each year since its establishment; and if fines (a) have been imposed and (b) are currently being considered. [61158]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Unlike contracts between the Home Office and the private sector for the management of some prisons, neither the present contract nor previous contracts for the management and operation of Campsfield House immigration detention centre contain any provision relating to the award of points for contractual performance. Therefore, there has not been, and presently cannot be, any question of exceeding a points requirement at Campsfield House, nor has there at any time been any question of points-related financial penalties.

Dancing (Sundays)

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reform the law relating to dancing on Sundays. [60998]

Mr. George Howarth: I am considering proposals, put to me on behalf of the industry concerned, for relaxing the constraints imposed by the Sunday Observance Act 1780 on commercially organised dancing on Sundays. I hope to be able to announce the outcome before too long now.

Prison Mother and Baby Units

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women were refused admission to a mother and baby unit in (i) 1998, (ii) 1997 and (iii) 1996; and if he will list the prisons and the racial origin of the women. [61020]

Mr. George Howarth: The information requested is given in the table.

Women prisoners refused admission to a mother and baby unit

Refused	1998	1997	1996
Holloway	6 (3 white, 2 black, 1 unknown	7 (4 black, 3 white)	8 (racial origin not known)
New Hall	2 (1 black, 1 white)	Not known[1]	Not known[1]
Styal	2 (1 black, 1 white)	0	0
Askham Grange	0	1 (white)	0

[1] Records not available

Criminal Cases Review Commission

Mr. Singh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases are awaiting determination by the Criminal Cases Review Commission. [61488]

Mr. Boateng: I understand that, at the end of October, 1,015 cases were awaiting review by the Criminal Cases Review Commission, and 456 cases were under active review.

WALES

Fluoridation

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the impact on young children's dental health of introducing water fluoridation in Wales. [61479]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The Welsh Office is well aware of oral health benefits conferred by topping up the existing fluoride levels in public water supplies to 1 part per million. The dental decay rate of children aged five years in Anglesey was reduced by 50 per cent. after fluoridation was introduced there in the mid fifties. However, since withdrawal of the last of the Anglesey fluoridation schemes in 1991, there has been a 168 per cent. increase in tooth decay.

Dental decay is increasingly recognised as a disease of childhood and deprivation, and water fluoridation is an ideal and simple way in which to improve oral health.

The recent consultation on the Green Paper 'Better Health, Better Wales' drew considerable support for fluoridation and the Welsh Office is considering the responses in conjunction with other UK Health Departments.

New Deal (Drop-out Rates)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the drop-out rate for participants in the New Deal in Wales. [61471]

Mr. Hain: The New Deal offers a flexible package of support which can last from a few days to over a year, according to individual need. The latest revised information provided by the Employment Service shows that 10,800 young people joined the New Deal in Wales between January and September, of whom nearly 2,700 had left by the end of September.

Almost 1,600 young people left the New Deal to take up unsubsidised jobs (59 per cent. of all leavers). Just under 500 others had left for a range of other reasons (for example to transfer onto other more appropriate benefits; to move from their localities; or to enter other training programmes or full-time education). The remaining 590 left for initially unknown destinations, although follow-up surveys by the Employment Service have revealed that many of these young people have actually found work without informing their New Deal Personal Advisers.

Agri-environment Scheme

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what his plans are for the new Welsh agri-environment scheme, Tir Gofal. [62216]

Mr. Michael: I am submitting a formal application to the European Commission for approval by the Rural Structures Committee. This contains the technical details of the scheme and budget projections for the first five years.

In the light of the Comprehensive Spending Review (CSR), I have made provision of £1.4 million in 1999–2000, £4 million in 2000–01 and £7 million in 2001–02. This allows for 600 new agreements each year at an average cost of just over £5,000 a year per agreement. Payments to farmers are expected to begin in 2000–01.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

New Deal (Public Information Campaign)

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what were (a) the target number and (b) the actual number of responses to his Department's New Deal public information campaign; and if he will make a statement. [61689]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The marketing campaign is designed to raise employer awareness of New Deal and their willingness to take on unemployed people rather than to achieve a given number of responses. Neverthelesss, the New Deal Information Line and Website have received almost 150,000 responses as well as many more directly to local Jobcentres. Employer awareness of New Deal has been driven up from 34 per cent. pre-campaign to 83 per cent. now.

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what has been the total expenditure and the breakdown of expenditure on (a) public opinion research, (b) television, radio and newspaper advertising and (c) direct mail incurred by his Department and agencies on the New Deal Public information campaign; and if he will make a statement. [61688]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Expenditure on the national New Deal advertising campaign to 30 November 1998 totalled £11,854,032. Of that, £203,738 has been spent on public opinion research, £9,376,206 on television, radio and newspaper advertising and £325,890 on direct mail.

New Deal (Television Companies)

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate his Department has made of the number of jobs provided under the New Deal arrangements by (a) the BBC, (b) the ITV companies and (c) S4C. [61613]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Specific information concerning individual employers' job vacancies and recruitment practices is a matter for those employers; but we are actively encouraging television and radio companies, like others, to recruit through the New Deals.

New Deal (Claimant Representatives)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many claimant representatives there are on each of the New Deal task forces and advisory groups. [61428]

Mr. Andrew Smith: There are no claimants on the national New Deal Task Forces or the Advisory Group to the UK Task Force, but there are representatives of bodies who have campaigned on behalf of claimants and unemployed people.

There are claimant representatives on some local New Deal strategic partnerships but comprehensive information on the people involved is not held centrally.

Service Development Fund

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the purpose of the Service Development Fund included in the Comprehensive Spending Review. [61878]

Mr. Blunkett: Within the total Comprehensive Spending Review settlement for DfEE and local government Education Standard Spending, the Government have created the Service Development Fund to ensure the right balance of funding between the existing agenda and those areas where policy is still being developed. Allocations from this Fund will be conditional on agreement to initiatives which build on essential reforms and offer the best value for money.

Education Standards

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance he has given to local education authorities on the relative merits of three tier and two tier systems; and if he will make a statement. [61660]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have not given any guidance to local education authorities on the relative merits of three tier and two tier systems. Schools should be organised to deliver the highest possible standards of education and to reflect parental preference. Local Education Authorities and school governing bodies are best placed to decide on the most effective pattern of provision within their areas, taking account of local circumstances.

Special Educational Needs

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list those local education authorities which are failing to process draft statements of SEN within the legally required period; and if he will set out the action taken by his Department with each such authority and list the responses of each authority. [61975]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Figures showing the time taken by all education authorities to produce draft statements in 1996–97 were published by the Audit Commission in March this year. These showed that most LEAs were failing to produce a significant proportion of their statements within the statutory time limits. The Government's Programme of Action for meeting special educational needs, published last month, made it clear that we are committed to achieving a substantial improvement in LEAs' performance and will continue to challenge under-performing LEAs; and that we intend to require LEAs to publish information about the time taken to complete statutory assessments and statements. In addition, we will shortly be providing LEAs with guidance on good practice in this area.

Disability Task Force

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people have accessed the Disability Task Force web page since its launch. [61876]

Ms Hodge: Since the Disability Rights Task Force web page was launched in February this year, it has been visited by just over 7,000 people.

Lone Parents

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the expenditure on the New Deal for lone parents in each employment service region. [61963]

Ms Hodge: The total regional expenditure that has been brought to account for the delivery of the New Deal for lone parents up to 31 October 1998 is £4.94 million. This is broken down by the nine ES regions as follows:

Employment Service regions	£
Northern	311,364
Yorkshire and the Humber	436,657
East Midlands and Eastern	394,299
London and South East	1,194,803
South West	565,457
Office for Wales	424,430
West Midlands	433,962
North West	691,453
Office for Scotland	491,717
Total	4,944,142

Scottish Fee Support Review Committee

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will announce the full membership and terms of reference of the Scottish Fee Support Review Committee to be appointed under the Teaching and Higher Education Act 1998. [62172]

Mr. Blunkett: Further to my reply of 23 July 1998, Official Report, column 658, I and my right hon. Friends, the Secretaries of State for Scotland for Wales and for Northern Ireland are pleased to announce the membership of the Scottish Fee Support Review Committee.

The Chairman will be Sir George Quigley, as already announced. Lord Burns, Professor Michael Hamlin and Sir Philip Jones have also agreed to serve as members. Terms of reference for the Committee have been placed in the Library.

The evidence on admissions this year shows an increase in the number of students from England, Wales and Northern Ireland entering Scottish institutions this autumn.

Scottish Fee Support Review: Terms of Reference

In fulfilment of the statutory requirements in section 25(4) of the Teaching and Higher Education Act 1998 and Article 6(4) of the Education (Student Support) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998:

to review the arrangements for England, Wales and Northern Ireland for paying grants for students' fees for the final honours year of first-degree courses at higher education institutions in Scotland, which are generally one year longer than comparable courses elsewhere in the UK; to consider the impact of those arrangements, taking into account the evidence on admissions in 1998 and applications in 1999 to Scottish higher education institutions, and to consider the need for any change; and to report to the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales, the Scottish Ministers and the Department of Education for Northern Ireland by summer 1999, bearing in mind that the Committee's report is to be laid before each House of the Westminster Parliament and before the Northern Ireland Assembly not later than 1 April 2000.

The Committee's report will be placed in the National Assembly for Wales and the Scottish Parliament at the same time as it is laid before the Westminster Parliament and the Northern Ireland Assembly.

The Committee should take evidence from:

the Committee of Scottish Higher Education Principals, the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, and the Committee of Heads of Welsh Higher Education Institutions; such other bodies as the Secretaries of State for Education and Employment, for Wales and for Scotland and the Department of Education for Northern Ireland may invite to make representations; and any others who may wish to offer evidence.

Scottish Fee Support Review: Membership

Sir George Quigley (Chairman)—Chairman of Ulster Bank (since 1989) and Member of the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority; formerly Permanent Secretary to the Department of Finance and Personnel for Northern Ireland (1982–88), Chairman of the Northern Ireland Economic Council, and member of the National Committee of Inquiry into Higher Education (1996–97).

Lord Burns—formerly Permanent Secretary to HM Treasury (1991–98), and Chief Economic Adviser to the Treasury and Head of the Government Economic Service (1980–91).

Professor Michael Hamlin—formerly Principal and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Dundee (1987–94), Vice-Principal of the University of Birmingham (1986–87) and President of the British Hydrological Society (1995–97); Fellow of the Royal Academy of Engineering.

Sir Philip Jones—Chairman of the Higher Education Funding Council for Wales; formerly Chairman of Total Oil Holdings (1991–98) and Chairman of the Electricity Council (1983–90).

Dyslexia

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish information held by his Department on the number of (a) further education and (b) university students, broken down by institution, who are diagnosed as dyslexic. [60959]

Mr. Mudie: The available data for higher education students in each higher education institution in the UK are shown in the table. These data are based on self-assessment by students and may differ from the number of students diagnosed as dyslexic. Information on further education students, broken down by institution, who are diagnosed as dyslexic is not held centrally.

SCOTLAND

Retirement Flats

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland for what reasons his Department is proposing a voluntary code of practice for the management of complexes of retirement flats owned by their occupants. [61083]

Mr. Macdonald: Following representations to Ministers about the management of some owner occupied sheltered housing developments, the Scottish Office convened a meeting of interested parties in July 1996. At the meeting, representatives of developers, management companies, owners and other organisations such as Age Concern Scotland and the Scottish Consumer Council, agreed that a working group should be established to consider a voluntary code that would set out a framework for good practice in the management of owner occupied sheltered housing developments.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the voluntary code of practice for the management of complexes of retirement flats owned by their occupants will include provisions relating to (a) major repair funds, (b) complaint procedures, (c) terms in deeds of conditions, (d) adherence to these conditions and (e) the implementation of an arbiter's award by managing agents. [61084]

Mr. Macdonald: The detailed provisions of the proposed voluntary code of management practice are still under consideration by the working group established by the Scottish Office. However, it is currently envisaged that there would be clauses relating to major repair funds and complaints procedures. The terms of deeds of conditions, adherence to these conditions and the implementation of awards by arbiters are essentially legal matters to be resolved between the parties concerned.

Groundwater Regulations

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact upon crofters and other small producers of the costs of disposing of spent sheep dip as proposed under the Groundwater Regulations; and if he will make a statement. [61849]

Mr. Macdonald: A copy of the Regulatory Impact Assessment in respect of the Groundwater Regulations 1998 was placed in the Library of the Houses of Parliament on 11 November. The Assessment notes that, in England and Wales, compliance costs for a typical farmer are likely to be £100 recurring costs per annum with non-recurring costs of £85. Broadly similar costs are expected for Scotland.

On 26 November, the Scottish Environment Protection Agency issued for public consultation their proposals for charges under the Regulations. Under the terms of section 42 of the Environment Act 1995, the approval of the Secretary of State must be obtained before a charging scheme is made. In determining whether or not to approve the scheme the Secretary of State must consider any representations or objections duly made to him and not withdrawn. He must also have regard to the desirability of ensuring that the amounts recovered by the Agency by way of the prescribed charges are the amounts which taking one year with another, need to be recovered by the Agency to meet such of the costs and expenses which it incurs in carrying out its functions as he may consider appropriate.

Dornoch Academy

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions the Government have had with (a) Highland Council and (b) Dornoch Academy about bringing the school back into local authority control; and if he will make a statement. [61850]

Mrs. Liddell: The Scottish Office has had continuing constructive discussions with both Dornoch Academy and Highland Council, particularly in relation to the school's annual grant. The Government remain committed to repealing the self-governing schools legislation. This, however, will now be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Student Hostels

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding the transfer to Moray House College of Education of the East Suffolk Road student hostels; what investigation he has made of the events surrounding this transfer and the accounting procedures involved; and if he will make a statement. [61703]

Mrs. Liddell: I have received representations concerning the transfer to Moray House College of Education of the East Suffolk Road student hostels. A comprehensive reply has already been provided. In October, the Scottish Office Education and Industry Department received further representations, on the issue that the transfer of the student hostels to Moray House in 1979 was not correctly undertaken. Since then, officials have received numerous further representations from the same person, as have the Scottish Higher Education Funding Council.

Officials are looking into the matters raised in the recent allegations. I shall write to the hon. Member when their consideration of this is complete.

Housing Partnerships Initiative

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland for what reasons the new Housing Partnerships Initiative precludes local authorities in Scotland from investing the funding available in local authority owned stock without transferring ownership of this stock outside the local authority. [61678]

Mr. Macdonald: The new Housing Partnerships Initiative aims to promote community ownership and secure private sector finance for affordable housing. Local authorities receive separate capital allocations for works to their own stock.

Tuition Fees

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how his figure for the cost of abolishing tuition fees in Scotland was arrived at; over what period it applies; what the annual figures are; and what assumptions underlie the calculation. [61710]

Mrs. Liddell: I am not entirely clear which figure is the subject of the question. The Scottish Office Education and Industry Department has commissioned independent research on the long term savings arising from the recent changes in policy on student support, including the introduction of a means-tested private contribution towards the cost of tuition and the replacement of grants by loans. I have arranged for a copy of an abstract of the results to be placed in the House of Commons Library.

Nitrates Directive

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to implement the Nitrates Directive in respect of water bodies, rivers and their catchments which exceed the limit of 50mg/l of dissolved nitrates; and if he will make a statement. [61699]

Mr. Macdonald: This Directive is being implemented and we already monitor at all surface water and groundwater locations used for drinking water abstraction.

The Scottish Environment Protection Agency is extending this monitoring network to be representative of all Scottish inland surface waters. This will be used to identify where there are exceedances of the 50 mg/l concentration limit value for nitrate. From this information SEPA will undertake a further review to determine if revised or new Nitrate Vulnerable Zones should be designated.

Before an extended network can be identified for groundwater monitoring it will be necessary to carry out a preliminary study of existing abstraction. I am asking SEPA to set up a groundwater monitoring network by the end of 1999.

Barnacle Geese

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice he has received from Scottish Natural Heritage in respect of applications for licences for the killing of barnacle geese on the Island of Islay; and if licences will be issued for land within areas designated as special protection areas under EU Directive 79/409/EEC. [61700]

Mr. Macdonald: Advice has been given by Scottish Natural Heritage on the likely effect of limited licences to shoot barnacle geese in specified areas on Islay. Two licences to prevent serious agricultural damage have been issued for a limited period where no other satisfactory solution was available. These licences allow a maximum of 50 barnacle geese to be shot in areas designated as Special Protection Areas under EU Directive 74/409/EEC. The effect of the licensed shooting on the farms and the goose populations will be carefully monitored, and the results will be taken into account before any further licences are issued to farmers on Islay.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recommendations he has received from the National Goose Forum relating to geese on Islay. [61701]

Mr. Macdonald: None. The National Goose Forum is not due to report on a national policy framework for managing potential conflicts between geese and agriculture until Summer 1999.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefit Integrity Project

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if the actual and estimated savings quoted by his Department for the Benefit Integrity Project are savings that incorporate the full costs of the investment and running costs of the Project; [60982]

(2) if he will make a statement on the accounting procedures used by his Department in calculating the savings generated by the Benefit Integrity Project. [60981]

Mr. Timms: The administration of the Benefit Integrity Project is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mrs. Theresa May, dated 30 November 1998:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions asking if the actual and estimated savings quoted by his Department for the Benefit Integrity Project (BIP) are savings that incorporate the full costs of the investment and running costs of the Project, and if he will make a statement on the accounting procedures used by his Department in calculating the savings generated by BIP.

Estimates of benefit savings from BIP assume that cases with a changed award would have remained on their original level of benefit for 32 weeks. This is an assumption common to Benefits Agency activity. A proportion of total savings for cases reviewed in any particular year are allocated to the two subsequent years. This takes account of some benefit recipients being reviewed towards the end of the financial year, and the variation in the length of time recipients with a changed award would have remained on their original level of benefit. Estimated benefit savings relate solely to programme expenditure and is accounted for in the annual Vote 1 Appropriation Accounts.

The estimate includes the cost of reviews and appeals. It also takes account of additional savings from some cases losing premiums in the income related benefits, some carers losing Invalid Care Allowance, and losing access to free road tax through the loss of entitlement to the Disability Living Allowance Higher Rate Mobility Component. The cost of investment and the running costs for the project are not included in the estimate of benefit savings but form part of the Agency's overall running costs, set out in the Vote 3 Appropriation Accounts.

I hope you find this reply useful.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what (a) the original assumptions were and (b) the current savings assumptions are for the Benefit Integrity Project in (i) 1997–98 and (ii) 1998–99; what factors were taken into account in the revision of savings assumptions for the Benefit Integrity Project for 1997–98 and 1998–99; and if the costs of the Benefit Integrity Project include the costs of appeals following decisions made under the scheme. [60983]

Mr. Timms: The administration of the Benefit Integrity Project is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mrs. Theresa May, dated 27 November 1998:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what (a) the original assumptions were and (b) the current savings assumptions are for the Benefit Integrity Project (BIP) in (i) 1997–98 and (ii) 1998–99; what factors were taken into account in the revision of savings assumptions for BIP for 1997–98 and 1998–99; and if the costs of BIP for 1997–98 and 1998–99 include the costs of appeals following decisions made under the scheme.

The original estimate of benefit expenditure savings from BIP was £20m in 1997–98 and £30m in 1998–99. It was based on the results of the Disability Living Allowance Benefit Review, published February 1997. The current estimate of savings are £8m in 1997–98 and £30m in 1998–99. It is based on monitoring information from BIP and reflects the delayed start of the project in 1997 and subsequent changes to the range of people included in the exercise. The estimate takes account of the cost of reviews and appeals. It also takes account of additional savings from some cases losing premiums in the income related benefits, some carers losing Invalid Care Allowance, and losing access to free road tax through the loss of entitlement to the Disability Living Allowance Higher Rate Mobility Component.

Both estimates assume that cases with a changed award would have remained on their original level of benefit for 32 weeks. This is an assumption common to Benefits Agency activity. A proportion of total savings for cases reviewed in any particular year are allocated to the two subsequent years. This takes account of some benefit recipients being reviewed towards the end of the financial year, and the variation in the length of time recipients with a changed award would have remained on their original level of benefit.

I hope you find this reply useful.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what are the achieved levels of accuracy of the CSA for each region; [61449]

(2) for each region, what are the levels of outstanding debt in the CSA; and what percentage of that debt is classed as unrecoverable; [61448]

(3) for each region what is the current backlog of cases at the CSA; and how many of those have been outstanding for over one year; [61446]

(4) what percentage of debt balances calculated by the CSA contain errors, for each region; [61450]

(5) what is the average amount of time taken between the referral of a case for assessment by the CSA, the making of a maintenance assessment, and the first maintenance sum paid, for each region; [61452]

(6) when the current backlog of cases within the CSA is expected to be cleared, for each region; [61447]

(7) what is the current rate of non-compliance with payment of maintenance assessments by the CSA, for each region; [61445]

(8) what is the average time taken to transfer collected maintenance to parents with care, for each region. [61453]

Angela Eagle: We expect the Child Support Agency to provide a consistent, fair and efficient service to all its clients. We have set out proposals for radical reform in our Green Paper "Children First: a new approach to child support" (Cm 3992).

The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Faith Boardman to Mr. David Rendel, dated 30 November 1998:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security about the Child Support Agency.

I cannot provide precisely all the information that you have requested, but have provided as much as possible from the most recent information available.

The Agency has six front-line Business Units; each of these consists of a Child Support Agency Centre and associated Field Offices. Information has been provided for each Business Unit.

The Agency measures the accuracy of maintenance assessments against targets set by the Secretary of State. For 1997/98, the target was for the cash value of all maintenance assessments checked in the year to be correct to the last penny in at least 85% of cases. The Agency met this target scoring an accuracy rate of 86%.

In 1998/99, the Agency is measuring the accuracy more stringently by examining the last full assessment rather than just the last work carried out, which could have been a simplified review not requiring a full assessment. The revised methodology is closer to that used by the National Audit Office. The checks will be more reliable, measuring accuracy of assessments to the last penny in earlier years as well as more recent changes to assessments. However, this may result in a larger number of inaccurate assessments being identified in the short term because it will reflect earlier periods in which the accuracy of assessments was lower than it now is. As a result the accuracy target is lower for 1998/99, and requires the cash value of all assessments checked in the year to be correct in at least 75% of cases. The Agency will be looking to improve on the accuracy target in 1999/2000 and following years.

At 31 October 1998 the accuracy level (against this revised criteria) achieved by the Agency was 75%. The levels achieved by each Business Unit are shown in the attached table.

The report of the Comptroller and Auditor General to the House of Commons which was published as part of the Agency's Annual Report for 1997/98 noted that when examining non-resident parents' maintenance balances, National Audit Office staff had identified that some error had occurred at some point in the history of the account in 79% (85% in 1996/97) of the cases examined. In the large majority of cases these inaccuracies had a relatively small monetary effect, and need to be put in the context that on average cases require to be worked at about 3 times a year. This assessment was based on a sample of cases going back to the start of the Agency, but it is a matter of public record that during its first two years the Agency frequently made errors when assessing maintenance. We recognise the legacy of this problem and aim to tackle this by getting cases right first time and will review older cases as the opportunity arises. We estimate that by the end of 1998/99 we will have had the chance in our normal course of work and through periodic reviews to look at many of those individual accounts which stem from the start of the Agency.

The Agency has been concerned that the full maintenance debt reported previously was not a true reflection of the amount ever likely to be collected. Following a Debt Analysis Exercise we have therefore identified that part of the debt which is probably uncollectable and removed it to show a more realistic debt position. This change was introduced in the Agency's Annual Report and Accounts for 1997/98. This revised format is in response to the Committee of Public Accounts recommendation that the Agency "... examine the scope for eliminating a significant amount of this debt, since it is unlikely ever to be collected ...".

At 31 October 1998 the amount of child support full maintenance assessment debt was £480,340,622. This can be broken down further to £280,038,583 (58.3%) collectable debt, £186,852,502 (38.9%) possibly uncollectable debt and £13,449,537 (2.8%) deferred debt. Deferred debt is where the Agency has deferred the debt indefinitely, provided non-resident parents meet certain conditions on payment of regular maintenance and any remaining debt. Where appropriate the parent with care will be compensated for the loss of this money. Details for each Business Unit are shown in the attached table.

To further increase the flow of maintenance and to help non-resident parents pay the arrears that they owe, wherever possible the Agency makes every effort to re-schedule debts; re-scheduled debts are those where the Agency has negotiated a closely monitored agreement with the non-resident parent to pay arrears by instalments. The amount of debt re-scheduled included in the £480,340,622 at 31 October 1998 was £374,392,076.

The Agency does not collect information on average processing times for the clearance of maintenance assessments. The Agency measures the clearance of maintenance assessments against targets set by the Secretary of State. The age at clearance is measured from the date of the initial application. In Income Support cases where the Benefits Agency have conducted a pre-adjudication visit as part of the Closer Working arrangement, the date of initial application is the date of the visit.

The Agency does not currently measure the time between application and payment due to the several factors that have an influence on when a payment is due (the payment preferences of the parent with care and the non-resident parent, and the non-resident parent's pay frequency) and in turn actually made. The speed with which assessments can be cleared is constrained by the complexities of the current legislation which can require up to 104 separate pieces of information to be collected and verified before an assessment can be made, however the Agency is steadily reducing the time taken and is clearing the backlog of applications from the early years.

For 1997/98, the Secretary of State target required 525,000 maintenance applications to be cleared; 60 per cent. of new applications to be cleared within 26 weeks and on 31 March 1998 no more than 5 per cent. of all maintenance applications to be over 52 weeks old. The Agency met this target with 595,000 clearances (13 per cent. above target), 72 per cent. of new applications cleared within 26 weeks and reduced the maintenance assessment backlog (i.e. cases which are over 52 weeks old and have not yet been assessed) to less than 5 per cent of applications received.

The 1998/99 target is even more challenging; 65 per cent. of cases to be cleared within 22 weeks and on 31 March 1999 there to be no application outstanding over 52 weeks old. At 31 October 1998 the Agency was clearing 65 per cent of cases within 22 weeks. The levels achieved by each Business Unit are shown in the attached table.

At 31 March 1998 the Agency had approximately 306,900 maintenance assessment cases on hand; approximately 110,000 of these were over 52 weeks old. To achieve the target to have no applications outstanding over 52 weeks old at 31 March 1999 all these 306,900 cases need to be cleared during 1998/99. At 31 October 1998 108,695 of these cases are outstanding; it is not possible to state how many of these cases are currently outstanding over 52 weeks, however we are ahead of profile to achieve the target by March. Details for each Business Unit are shown in the attached table. From 1 April we expect to have no applications outstanding over 52 weeks old.

As the older cases are cleared some non resident parents will inevitably be assessed as owing arrears for periods dating back a number of years. As recently announced by Ministers, the temporary scheme limiting the collection of initial payment period arrears to six months as long as the non resident parent is fully compliant for a period of 12 months has recently been extended.

Additionally, from Monday 30 November, the scheme will be extended to include cases where arrears have arisen due to delays in reviews carried out on change of circumstance and in the periodic reviews carried out every two years.

The Agency currently has a nil-compliance rate of 20.38%. Details of each Business Unit are shown in the attached table.

We do not collect average processing times to transfer collected maintenance to parents with care. We measure the speed of payment to parents with care against a Secretary of State Target. The Agency exceeded the 1997/98 target which required that 97% of payments be passed to the parent with care within ten working days of receipt from the non-resident parent. At 31 October 1998 97%. of payments made to the parent with care were made within 10 working days of receipt from the non-resident parent. Details for individual Business Units are included in the attached table.

1997/98 saw a significant improvement in the Agency's performance. Through the hard work and dedication of the Agency's staff, for the first time in our five year history we met or bettered all of our Secretary of State targets. Letters of complaint to the Agency and to MPs continued to fall as a percentage of our caseload. But we accepted the need to improve our all-round performance in line with concerns expressed by Parliamentary Committees and Stakeholder Groups, rather than just our performance against formal targets.

In the short term, we are looking at the ways that we can change the way we deliver our service to address customers immediate concerns; to this end we have reviewed the way that we handle complaints and we have increased resources for our Client Helplines and the National Enquiry Line, extended our hours of opening to cover 8.00am to 8.00pm Monday to Friday and 9.00am to 5.00pm on Saturdays and begun pilots to greatly improve and increase clients' opportunities to secure a face to face service. For the longer term, we are looking at the ways that we measure our performance to ensure that our focus is on providing a service that meets our clients' qualitative needs as well as achieving formal numerical targets.

I hope this is helpful.

[1] The Agency is measuring the accuracy more stringently by examining the last full assessment rather than just the last work carried out, which could have been a simplified review not requiring a full assessment—as a result the accuracy target is lower for 1998/99.
[2] The Agency forecast there will be no maintenance assessments over 52 weeks old by 31 March 1999 and are ahead of profile to achieve this.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when his Department intends to publish the draft Bill on reform of the Child Support Agency. [61962]

Angela Eagle: The consultation period on the Green Paper finished on 30 November 1998. Final decisions on the shape of the reformed child support scheme and the associated legislative process will be announced in due course.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the length of time taken in issuing housing benefit for each local authority in the United Kingdom. [61869]

Angela Eagle: The latest available data on local authority performance are for 1996–97. This is published in "Council Services Compendium" by the Audit Commission for England and Wales, and "Comparing the Performance of Scottish Councils" by the Accounts Commission for Scotland. These publications are available in the Library.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans his Department has to prevent local reference rent rules resulting in landlords refusing to let to claimants of housing benefit. [61870]

Angela Eagle: We are currently reviewing the Housing Benefit rules with the Local Authority Associations to ascertain what changes, if any, are necessary to improve the way the benefit is administered and remove anomalies from the system. The impact of the rent restriction rules is part of that review which is due to end early next year.

Pensioners' Incomes Series

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security for what reasons there has been a delay in the publication of the Pensioners' Incomes Series for 1996–97; and when he expects to publish the report. [61873]

Mr. Denham: The Pensioners' Incomes Series 1996–97 will be published on 10 December 1998, rather than 26 November. The delay was caused by further work being necessary to ensure the accuracy of the publication.

Habitual Residence Test

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to publish the review of the Habitual Residence Test. [61875]

Angela Eagle: Work on the review of the Habitual Residence Test is ongoing. However, we wish to take account of all relevant evidence and information before drawing any conclusions. This clearly needs to include the outcome of litigation which could have a significant impact on the scope for reform of the test, such as the case of Mr. Robin Swaddling currently under the deliberation of the European Court of Justice. We will therefore bring forward our recommendations once we have received and considered the judgment of the European Court in this case.

Benefits Agency Medical Services

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the current operating difficulties in the Benefits Agency Medical Services. [61874]

Angela Eagle: The provision of Medical Services was contracted out to Sema Group on 1 September 1998. One of the objectives of contracting out medical services was to improve service provision. With this in mind the targets that have been set in the contract reflect the improvements the Department is seeking. Sema, however, are not yet achieving the targets that have been set for Incapacity Benefit, Disability Living Allowance, and Industrial Injuries. The contract recognises that service improvements cannot be achieved overnight and allows a six month period before remedies are applied for failure to deliver to contract levels.

Sema Group have developed a Service Improvement Plan which demonstrates how continuous improvements will be made to the service. This is being closely monitored by the Contract Management Team and we are regularly apprised of progress.

In addition there have been some difficulties in respect of payment of fees to doctors for the work they have performed since 1 September 1998. As a result of new procedures some payments have been delayed or wrongly calculated. Sema have acted quickly and made additional payments where errors have been identified. They are also improving procedures to ensure that errors do not occur in the future.

We are monitoring the situation closely.

Disability Benefits

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many of the representations from disability groups received by the Government during the consultation period before they proposed their changes to disability benefits advocated the abolition of severe disablement allowance. [61695]

Mr. Timms: [Holding answer 30 November 1998]: The Green Paper "New ambitions for our country: a new contract for welfare" set out the general principles for welfare reform rather than specific proposals for reforming individual benefits.

We consulted widely following the publication of the paper in March. Over 1,050 responses were received from numerous organisations including organisations of and for disabled people, most of which welcomed our approach.

In October we published a consultation Paper "A new contract for welfare—Support for Disabled People" which contains proposals for the reform of Severe Disablement Allowance. We are consulting on these proposals and we will consider all comments and alternative proposals made as part of the consultation process. The consultation period ends on 8 January 1999.

TREASURY

Euro

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has for a public information campaign on preparing for the euro; and if he will make a statement. [61685]

Ms Hewitt: The Euro Preparations Unit's (EPU) communication campaign on the euro is not a general public information campaign but is specifically targeted at ensuring that UK businesses, especially small and medium enterprises (SMEs), are aware of the implications of the introduction of the single currency from 1 January 1999 and have the information they need to address the issues arising from this.

The EPU's business communication campaign on the euro has proved highly effective in reaching its target audience of SMEs. Since the beginning of May, there have been requests for over 300,000 "business preparations for the euro" factsheet packs from businesses and key intermediary bodies.

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total expenditure and the breakdown of the expenditure on (a) public opinion research, (b) television, radio and newspaper advertising and (c) direct mail by the Euro Preparations Unit; and if he will make a statement. [61687]

Ms Hewitt: The Euro Preparations Unit's (EPU) business communication campaign on the euro has proved highly effective in reaching its target audience of small and medium enterprises (SMEs). Since the beginning of May, there have been requests for over 300,000 "business preparations for the euro" factsheet packs from businesses and key intermediary bodies.

The EPU received Summer Supplementary Estimate provision of £7.5 million for 1998–99. Spend to date has been approximately £0.5 million for direct mailing to 1.6 million UK SMEs, and £4.75 million for the costs of the television, press and radio elements of the campaign. The EPU has not conducted any public opinion research, but has conducted two statistical business survey reports costing approximately £75,000. These surveys track overall euro awareness and preparations amongst UK SMEs as well as measuring the success of the EPU's communications campaign. These figures do not include VAT or postage.

Petroleum Products (Cross-border Smuggling)

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the smuggling of petroleum products into Northern Ireland from the Irish Republic. [61925]

Ms Hewitt: Both the Government and Customs are aware of the situation with the illegal importation of road fuel into Northern Ireland for resale and recognise that it is a serious problem which disadvantages legitimate traders. Customs are deploying resources and actively mounting investigations against those involved to counter the threat posed to the revenue and to the Northern Ireland business community. Customs are taking the lead on this issue but are acting in conjunction with other authorities, including the Royal Ulster Constabulary, to make seizures of oil tankers and vehicles carrying oil tanks filled with illegally imported fuel for resale. Whenever possible, cases are progressed with a view to criminal prosecution of the individuals involved.

Developing Countries (Debt)

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent discussions he has had with the World Bank and the IMF about the debt problems of developing countries; and if he will make a statement. [61720]

Ms Hewitt: The Chancellor spoke about debt relief at the Annual Meetings of the IMF and World Bank in October, calling for: a comprehensive review of the HIPC initiative to take place prior to the 1999 Annual meetings; the IMF and World Bank to take forward urgently work on how to help post-conflict countries, especially those with large arrears to the IFIs; the international community to aim to ensure that 22 countries could have reached their decision points by the end of 1999. The first two issues have now been agreed by the IMF and World Bank.

Following the devastation caused in Central America by hurricane Mitch, the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for International Development wrote to the IMF, World Bank and Inter-American Development Bank on 10 November, urging these institutions to consider various measures for reducing the debt burdens of the countries worst hit, especially Honduras and Nicaragua. Amongst other things, they suggested setting up a Trust Fund to help pay the debt service that these countries owe the IFIs. The UK has donated £10 million to the Trust Fund, which is presently being set up by the World Bank.

At a recent meeting in London with the President of the World Bank, the Chancellor discussed how the HIPC initiative could be used to help secure further debt relief for Honduras and Nicaragua—the poorest countries in the region.

Budget Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the outcome of the Budget Council held in Brussels on 24 November; and if he will make a statement. [61650]

Ms Hewitt: On 24 November, the Budget Council gave its second reading of the draft 1999 EC budget setting commitments at some 97 billion euros (£67 billion) and payments at 85 billion euros (£59 billion). This represents an increase of some 6.6 per cent. in commitments and 2.5 per cent. in payments compared to the 1998 budget, almost all of which is accounted for by unavoidable increases in structural funds appropriations required under the terms of the Edinburgh agreement of 1992. The Council's second reading leaves a margin of some 6.4 billion euros below the ceiling on the financial perspectives. A detailed description of the Council's second reading of the budget is given in an explanatory memorandum which the Government are submitting to the European Scrutiny Committee.

Individual Savings Accounts

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those consulted and the comments made by them in the consultation process, on the basis of which the Inland Revenue estimated that the start up costs of ISAs would be £250 million. [61184]

Ms Hewitt: The Revenue received almost 300 responses to the original ISA consultation, and over 100 to the later consultation on the draft ISA regulations, from trade bodies or firms. Officials attended a large number of meetings with industry bodies, and took part in several industry conferences between January and July. Detailed questions about compliance costs were followed up with a number of organisations. Details of these discussions cannot be released for reasons of commercial confidentiality.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information is required by his Department to provide a breakdown of the costs incurred for new computer installation, staff and sales force re-training and administration for the start-up of ISAs; and what steps he intends to take to (a) acquire that information and (b) make such estimates. [61183]

Ms Hewitt: We shall monitor the ISA scheme as it develops, and this will include compliance cost issues.

Alcohol Smuggling

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made in reducing the amount of alcohol illegally imported into Britain. [61535]

Dawn Primarolo: In July 1997, the Government announced a review of alcohol and tobacco smuggling and fraud, which was carried out by Customs & Excise in consultation with the trade. Customs & Excise has been allocated an extra £35 million over the next 3 years to tackle this problem. Over 100 additional frontline staff are currently being appointed. In the first 6 months of the current financial year, the revenue detected has been more than the amount for the same period last year.

National Debt

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the current United Kingdom national debt was built up over the period 1978–79 to 1994–95; and what proportion of the current interest payments on debt are associated with the debt built up over that period. [61704]

Ms Hewitt: The National Debt rose by £270.3 billion between 31 March 1978 and 31 March 1995, and stood at £419.2 billion at 31 March 1998. Hence the proportion built up over this period is 64.5 per cent. Net public sector debt rose by £206 billion between 31 March 1978 and 31 March 1995 and stood at £352 billion at 31 March 1998. The proportion built up over the period is 58.5 per cent. The proportion of total debt interest payments incurred over the period can be estimated precisely but should be roughly similar to the proportion of debt.

Labour-intensive Services (VAT)

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions his Department has held on a reduced VAT rate on labour intensive services; and if he will make a statement. [61886]

Dawn Primarolo: The European Commission's suggestion that Member States should be allowed to apply a reduced VAT rate on an experimental basis to certain local labour-intensive services was discussed at the Council of Finance Ministers on 16 February 1998. It has also been discussed in meetings of the Council Working Party on Financial Questions. However, the Commission has not yet brought forward any formal proposals on this subject.

Electronic Commerce (Taxation)

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy on the taxation of electronic commerce; and if he will make a statement. [61881]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise published a joint policy paper setting out the UK's policy on the taxation of electronic commerce on 6 October 1998.

Pre-Budget Report

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he asked the National Audit Office to audit the key assumptions and conventions underpinning the fiscal projections in the Pre-Budget report; [61035]

(2) for what reason no Audit of Assumptions for the Pre-Budget report was published. [61034]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 27 November 1998]: The Code for Fiscal Stability requires the Treasury to invite the National Audit Office to audit any changes to the key assumptions and conventions underpinning the fiscal projections. The assumptions and conventions used for the projections in the Pre-Budget Report were unchanged from those used in the March Budget.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government have asked the National Audit Office to review the change of assumptions in unemployment from 1.65 million as set out in the Audit of Assumptions for the July 1997 Budget Projection to 1.3 million in the 1998 Pre-Budget report. [61036]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 27 November 1998]: In its report to Parliament dated 19 June 1997 (Cm 3693), the National Audit Office audited a flat planning assumption for unemployment. The use of a flat assumption is a long-standing convention that has been used in all subsequent published Treasury forecasts.

Shamrock Case

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Shamrock case. [61043]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 27 November 1998]: If the hon. Member would let me know what aspect of this case concerns him, I will reply as soon as possible.

Commercial HP Leasing

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the total value was of commercial HP leasing arrangements in (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97 and (c) 1997–98. [61044]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 27 November 1998]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Nick Gibb, dated 1 December 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on commercial HP leasing arrangements.

The information sought is not available from official statistics. Information collected by government statisticians on lending by financial institutions to businesses in the UK does not distinguish between products, except to the extent that these coincide with aggregates used in national accounting or other systems. In official statistics finance leasing is separate from other forms of credit extended to business but no distinction is made between hire purchase loans and other loans and advances.

The Finance and Leasing Association, the trade association of the industry, publishes comprehensive data on business transacted by its member firms, analysed inter alia by product type (including lease/hire purchase). These data are compiled by a private organisation and are not used in official statistics. The Association is at 15–19 Kingsway London WC2B 6UN; telephone 0171 836 6511.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for (a) each delivery unit for which the figures are available and (b) for each month from January to April 1998, the rate at which 18 to 24 year olds ceased jobseeker's allowance claims and went into jobs in non-pathfinder areas broken down by (i) men, (ii) women, (iii) people with disabilities and (iv) those from ethnic minority groups. [61080]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 30 November 1998]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Don Foster, dated 1 December 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the rate at which 18 to 24 year olds ceased jobseeker's allowance claims and went into jobs in non-pathfinder areas.

ONS does not collect data on the disability or ethnicity of claimants, or the location of jobs people take up on leaving the claimant count. Delivery Units are not standard geographies, but from early in the New Year, best-fit data for delivery units for the number of claimants split by age and sex will be available from the Nomis database that can be accessed by the House of Commons Library.

Wages

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many workers in the United Kingdom currently (a) earn under £8,000 per annum, (b) earn between £8,000 and £10,000 per annum, (c) earn between £10,000 and £12,000 per annum and (d) earn over £12,000 per annum. [61933]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Tim Boswell, dated 1 December 1998:

As the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on earnings.

The latest available information, from the New Earnings Survey April 1998, is contained in the following table.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Agenda 2000

22. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the completion of the Agenda 2000 proposals. [61401]

Ms Quin: At the Cardiff European Council in March this year, Heads of State or Government agreed that political agreement to the Agenda 2000 package should be reached no later than March 1999. Both Austria, who hold the Presidency now, and Germany, who will hold the Presidency for the first 6 months of 1999, have expressed their commitment to that timetable.

25. Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about progress on Agenda 2000. [61404]

Ms Quin: Steady progress has been made in the past month or two. The Vienna European Council on 11–12 December will not take final decisions, but the Presidency are preparing a report identifying the key political issues that need to be resolved as part of the overall agreement, and also a compendium of negotiating texts reflecting the current state of discussion. Agreement no later than March 1999, in line with the Cardiff European Council conclusions, is achievable.

Canada

23. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will visit Canada to discuss the creation of the new territory of Nunavut. [61402]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We have no plans to visit Canada to discuss the creation of the new territory of Nunavut.

UN Finances

24. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last addressed the General Assembly of the United Nations; and what aspects of reform of United Nations finances were covered. [61403]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: In his address to the General Assembly on 23 September 1997, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary argued for reform of UN finances to put them on a sound and equitable basis. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told this year's General Assembly that all parts of the UN system needed secure funding.

Iran

26. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications for regional and international security of recent Iranian tests of long-range missiles. [61405]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We were extremely concerned by Iran's flight test of its Shahab 3 ballistic missile in July. Although the system is still in its development phase, its approximate range of 1300km means that the possibility of its future deployment threatens the stability of the whole of the Middle East.

Whilst we understand Iran's legitimate security concerns, we have repeatedly urged the Iranian authorities to refrain from developing ballistic missiles. It is in nobody's interest for an arms race to develop in this already volatile region.

29. Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Iran on the funding of (a) Hezbollah and (b) Hamas. [61408]

Mr. Fatchett: We and our EU colleagues have frequently raised with the Iranians our concerns about their support for groups who use violent methods to oppose the Middle East peace process, and will continue to do so.

However, during my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary's meeting with the Iranian Foreign Minister on 24 September, Dr. Kharrazi reaffirmed his Government's strong condemnation of terrorism in all its forms. Iran has strongly condemned terrorist attacks in Egypt and Algeria and rejected attacks upon civilians anywhere. We welcome these positive developments.

Middle East Peace Process

27. Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet the Prime Minister of Israel to discuss the middle east peace process; and if he will make a statement. [61406]

Mr. Robin Cook: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier in the House today to my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Quinn), Official Report, column 656.

Burma

28. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on UK relations with Burma. [61407]

30. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his policy in respect of Myanmar. [61410]

Mr. Fatchett: We deplore the Burmese authorities' disregard for human rights and democracy. We are working for an end to these abuses and the start of substantive political dialogue with NLD, including Aung San Suu Kyi, and ethnic minority groups.

Cyprus

31. Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action is being taken to sponsor dialogue between the two communities in Cyprus. [61411]

Ms Quin: We remain committed to supporting the UN Secretary-General's efforts to reach a comprehensive political settlement in Cyprus through direct negotiations between the leaders of the two communities.

We and international partners continue to promote activities at all levels which foster dialogue between the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities in Cyprus.

Iraq

32. Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of Iraq's compliance with United Nations resolutions. [61412]

Mr. Fatchett: It is the unanimous view of the Security Council that Iraq has not fulfilled its obligations under the relevant UN resolutions.

34. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his meeting with the 16 dissident Iraqi groups on 23 November. [61415]

Mr. Fatchett: I met London representatives of various Iraqi opposition groups on 23 November.

Lockerbie

33. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in resolving the issue of the proposed trial in The Hague of the alleged Lockerbie suspects. [61413]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We have provided comprehensive clarification on issues raised by Libya through the UN on the terms of the initiative. These answers demonstrate that we are acting in good faith. We are in close touch with the UN Secretary-General, who is mandated by the UN Security Council resolutions to seek Libyan compliance. We now look to Libya for a prompt and positive response.

Democratic Republic of Congo

35. Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in the Democratic Republic of Congo. [61416]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Britain is working hard for peace. We are actively encouraging all states involved in the fighting in the Democratic Republic of Congo to pursue a negotiated settlement. We have made it clear that there can be no military solution. Only a process of dialogue and negotiation can bring about a settlement that will last.

China

36. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current relations between China and the United Kingdom. [61418]

Mr. Fatchett: As the visit to China of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in October demonstrated, a new chapter has opened in our bilateral relations. We are working for a broader relationship, including increased political, commercial, educational and cultural contacts. We will continue to address difficult subjects, such as human rights, through an approach based on dialogue.

EU Enlargement

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of EU enlargement. [61397]

Ms Quin: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary gave earlier in the House today to the hon. Member for North Essex, (Mr. Jenkin), Official Report, column 660.

St. Helena

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to restore full British citizenship to residents of the island of St. Helena. [61399]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The issue of British citizenship for residents of all UK Overseas Territories who do not already have it is a complex one. It is being considered sympathetically in the context of the current Review of UK Overseas Territories and the result will be published in the White Paper. We expect to publish the Paper early in the current session of Parliament.

European Elections

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the remit is of the working group concerning proposed common principles for European elections; and if he will place in the Library the documentation relating to it. [61719]

Ms Quin: The General Affairs Group is the standing Council working group responsible for institutional affairs. It was given a mandate to consider the European Parliament's proposed common principles for European parliamentary elections by the Committee of Permanent Representatives on 10 September 1998. I have placed a copy of the European Parliament's proposal in the Libraries of the House.

Gibraltar

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last discussed with his Spanish counterpart the claim by Spain for sovereignty over Gibraltar. [61641]

Ms Quin: The Brussels Process Communiqué of 27 November 1984 provides for the discussion of sovereignty over Gibraltar. The last Brussels Process talks took place in December 1997. The next meeting is due to be held early next year.

Falklands

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from Argentina concerning its claim for sovereignty over the Falklands. [61640]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Government of Argentina have repeatedly asserted their view that Argentina has a claim to sovereignty over the Falkland Islands, and have called on us to enter into negotiations. In response, we have made it clear that the United Kingdom has no doubt about its sovereignty over the Falklands and does not regard this as negotiable. It remains our position that there will be no change in the status of the Falklands unless that is the wish of the Islanders themselves.

Arms Embargoes

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government have taken in the last year to strengthen the implementation and enforcement of existing arms embargoes. [61484]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: In his statement to the House on 27 July 1998, Official Report, columns 19–22, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary announced the establishment of a Sanctions Enforcement Unit in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, with responsibility for co-ordinating FCO action with respect to the enforcement of all sanctions, including arms embargoes. The Sanctions Enforcement Unit also issues guidance to FCO departments and overseas missions on the scope of UN sanctions resolutions and the Orders in Council implementing them in UK legislation.

Defence Exports

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the next annual report on defence exports will contain a breakdown of licences refused. [61470]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) on 14 July 1998, Official Report, column 149.

North Korea

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the talks between the United States and North Korea concerning the latter's nuclear programme. [61860]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The United States and North Korea meet regularly to discuss a range of issues, including North Korea's nuclear programme. The details of their discussions are a matter for the governments concerned.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Governments of (a) North Korea, (b) South Korea and (c) the United States concerning North Korea's nuclear programme. [61859]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We regularly discuss North Korean nuclear issues with the US and South Korea, at both Ministerial and official level, bilaterally and collectively at meetings of the Korean Peninsula Energy Development Organisation. The UK does not have diplomatic relations with North Korea and no Ministerial talks have been held. Nuclear issues were discussed at official level in November 1997. The UK also intends to raise them in EU Troika and bilateral talks with North Korea on 2 and 3 December respectively.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance the United Kingdom has offered to monitor the North Korean nuclear programme. [61861]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) is responsible for monitoring North Korea's adherence to its obligations under the Non-Proliferation Treaty. The UK fully supports the work of the IAEA through its contribution to that organisation.

In addition, the UK, through the EU, is strongly committed to the Korean Peninsula Energy Development Organisation (KEDO), as the best means of resolving the issue of nuclear proliferation on the Korean Peninsula. The EU is a member of the KEDO Executive Board, making a substantial contribution of 15 million ecu a year for five years, of which the UK share is some £1.7 million a year.

Zimbabwe

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for International Development concerning the continued provision of aid to Zimbabwe. [61862]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has regular meetings with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development on a range of issues of mutual interest to our departments.

Pakistan

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of Pakistan concerning the status of Christians in that country. [61409]

Mr. Fatchett: We and our EU partners regularly raise the status of Christians in Pakistan with the Government of Pakistan, most recently at a meeting of the EU Troika and Pakistan on 25 November. I raised our concerns for all religious minorities in Pakistan with the Interior Minister when I visited Pakistan last year, as did my noble Friend the Under Secretary in January of this year. As EU Presidency, we led a demarche on Pakistan's blasphemy laws on 14 May, and participated in a further demarche on 19 October.

Alcoholic Drinks Purchases

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much was spent on the purchase of alcoholic drinks by the United Kingdom embassy in France in 1996–97. [61698]

Ms Quin: The Embassy itself does not purchase alcoholic drinks: they are bought by Embassy staff on an individual basis. Annual expenditure by individual members of staff on official entertainment does not distinguish between alcoholic and non-alcoholic drinks and food. It is therefore not possible to say how much was spent on alcoholic drinks in any one year.

Chile

Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice on security measures he intends to give to British Scouts, Guides and leaders who are to attend the World Scout Jamboree in Chile starting on 20 December. [61880]

Mr. Fatchett: As of 1 December 1998 we advise against all non-essential travel to Chile. Our advice is intended for all British nationals.

British nationals making essential visits to Chile for more than a brief period are advised to register at the British Embassy, Santiago (tel: 231 3737, fax: 2342566) on arrival.

British nationals in Chile should keep a low profile, avoid crowds, meetings, demonstrations and areas where the English-speaking community usually gather.

Travel advice is reviewed daily.

Nigeria

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to restore full diplomatic relations with Nigeria. [61384]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier in the House today to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith), Official Report, columns 670–71.

HEALTH

Condoms (Homeless People)

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make free provision of condoms to homeless people. [60995]

Ms Jowell: There are no plans to introduce a separate condom distribution service for homeless people. Homeless people can obtain free condoms from open access family planning and genito-urinary medicine clinics.

Hospital Admissions

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what percentage of the population aged between 16 and 65 years use the accident and emergency departments at least once a year; [61012]

(2) what percentage of the population aged between 16 and 65 years was admitted to hospital on at least one occasion in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [61011]

Mr. Hutton: The information is not available centrally in the form requested.

It is not currently possible to provide a count of the number of occasions an individual is admitted to hospital, although development work is under way to enable such counts to be made in the future. In 1997–98, there were 10,368,844 hospital admissions, of whom 5,720,065 were aged between 16 and 65.

Information on the number of new and follow-up attendances at accident and emergency departments is not broken down by age groups. The most recent information is set out in the Departmental publication, "Outpatients and ward attenders, England, Financial Year 1997–98", copies of which are available in the Library.

Royal Commission on Long-term Care of the Elderly

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many pensioner representatives there are on the Royal Commission on Long-term Care of the Elderly. [61426]

Mr. Hutton: The membership of the Royal Commission on Long-Term Care of the Elderly includes people with knowledge of the public and independent sectors, health and social care, housing, finance and consumer affairs. They were chosen for their skills and experience, rather than to represent particular interests. Age Concern, Help the Aged and the National Pensioners Convention are members of the commission's reference group, which includes charities and other organisations representing people who may find themselves in long-term care; the financial services sector; the NHS; local government and other service provider bodies; and representatives of the major faiths in the United Kingdom. By this means, the commission is drawing on the most up-to-date experience of users and carers.

Women's Boxing

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the risks associated with women's boxing. [61007]

Ms Jowell: Although the Department has not conducted specific research into the hazards associated with women's boxing, the health risks of the sport in general are well documented. These risks are highlighted in "The Boxing Debate" published by the British Medical Association in 1993, and include acute and chronic brain damage, and injuries to the eye.

Food Poisoning

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to publish statistics on the rates of food poisoning in the constituent parts in the United Kingdom. [61192]

Ms Jowell: Food poisoning notification data for England and Wales are published each week by the Public Health Laboratory Service Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre in "Communicable Disease Report Weekly", copies of which are available in the Library.

Information for Scotland and Northern Ireland is the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Northern Ireland.

Health Statistics

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the population aged between 16 and 65 years have (a) asthma, (b) eczema, (c) abscesses, (d) hepatitis C, (e) hepatitis B and (f) HIV. [60992]

Ms Jowell: The available information is summarised in the table.

Condition	Estimated prevalence in adults in the general population
Asthma	[1] Asthma is estimated to affect about 4 per cent. of adults sufficiently severely to require medical supervision
Eczema	[2] The Health Survey for England 1996 reported that 13 per cent. of adults stated that a doctor had at some stage in their life diagnosed them as having eczema
Abscesses	The information requested is not available
Hepatitis C	Studies suggest that the prevalence of chronic carriage may be around 0.5 per cent.
Hepatitis B	Available data indicate that the prevalence of chronic hepatitis B infection is around 0.3 per cent.
HIV	[3] The current best estimate for diagnosed and undiagnosed HIV infections in England and Wales for 16–65 year olds is 0.07 per cent.

[1] This estimate is drawn from Asthma: An Epidemiological Overview published by the Department of Health in 1995.
[2] The Health Survey for England 1996 was carried out on behalf of the Department of Health by the Joint Health Surveys Unit and published earlier this year.

Traffic Levels (Health Effects)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the relationship between increases in traffic levels and health costs; and if he will make a statement. [61489]

Ms Jowell: The Department of Health funds, jointly with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and the Medical Research Council, a programme of research into the effects of air pollutants on health. A study looking at the effects on health of relieving traffic congestion by building a bypass has been funded. This study is being done in Queensferry. Results are expected in 1999. The Department has assessed the impact of air pollution on health and has published a report: Quantification of the Effects of Air Pollution on Health in the United Kingdom. Copies are available in the Library. The Department has been examining the costs associated with these effects as a part of the accelerated review of the National Air Quality Strategy. A report will be published early in the new year.

Hospitals (Felixstowe)

Mr. Gummer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will request Suffolk Health Authority to reconsider their proposals to close the Bartlett Hospital, and to review the provision of hospital care in (a) Felixstowe and (b) the surrounding area; [61973]

(2) when he will announce a decision on the Bartlett Hospital in Felixstowe. [61972]

Mr. Dobson: I shall announce my decision about the future of the Bartlett Hospital in Felixstowe shortly.

Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will announce changes in membership of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority. [62173]

Ms Jowell: I am pleased to announce the following appointments made on behalf of the United Kingdom Health Ministers:

Mrs. Jane Denton—Nursing Director of the Multiple Births Foundation, reappointed as Deputy Chairman until 6 November 2001;

Dr. Anne McLaren—Principal Research Associate, Wellcome Cancer Research Campaign Institute, reappointed as a member until 6 November 2001;

Mr. John Williams—Dean at the Faculty of Economic and Social Studies at the University of Wales, Aberystwyth, reappointed as a member until 6 November 1999;

Ms Sara Nathan—until recently Editor Channel 4 News, appointed as a member until 6 November 2001;

Professor Brenda Almond—Professor of Moral and Social Philosophy at the University of Hull, appointed as a member until 6 November 2001;

Ms Sharmila Nebhrajani—Head of Corporate Planning at the British Broadcasting Corporation, a Chartered Accountant and former Management Consultant, appointed as a member until 6 November 2001;

Professor Henry Leese—Professor of Biology at the University of York, appointed as a member until 6 November 2001;

Dr. Sadia Muhammed—General Medical Practitioner in York and Forensic Medical Examiner to the North Yorkshire Police, appointed as a member until 6 November 2001.

I am very grateful to Ms Elizabeth Forgan, Mr. Richard Jones, Mr. David Greggains and Professor Anthony Thiselton who are retiring from the Authority this year. I also wish to thank Dr. Ruth Chambers who left the Authority on 6 November at her request.

These appointments were made in accordance with the guidance issued by the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

Local Authorities (Co-operation)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evaluation his Department has made of the effectiveness of section 22(1) of the National Health Services Act 1977. [61868]

Mr. Hutton: A number of studies looking at the effectiveness of joint working have been commissioned by the Department in recent years. This is in addition to the joint monitoring undertaken by the regional offices of the National Health Service Executive and Social Services Inspectorate.

Intensive Care

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Government's review of the number of NHS beds needed satisfactorily to treat patients will also assess whether there are sufficient intensive care beds. [61534]

Mr. Hutton: Action is already in hand to address this issue. We have commissioned the health care needs assessment of intensive care and will be carrying out a census of intensive care beds next spring. This work will run in parallel with and, where appropriate, feed into, the national beds inquiry.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Education Expenditure

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of the £19 billion allocated to education as a result of the Comprehensive Spending Review will be (a) direct Government grant and (b) a permission for LEAs and other sector providers to borrow or raise funding from other sources; and if he will make a statement. [61806]

Mr. Blunkett: The £19 billion figure relates to the UK. The table gives the resources for my Department's areas of responsibility as published in the Comprehensive Spending Review White paper, split between central government and Education Standard Spending, which is the support for recurrent spending on education by local authorities in England.

£ billion

	1999–00	2000–01	2001–02
DfEE and OFSTED	15.5	17.3	18.6
Education Standard Spending	20.5	21.7	23.1

Of the central government resources, credit approvals to local authorities for schools capital work will be set at £454m in 1999–00, compared with £376m in 1998–99. These will be supplemented by PFI credits of £350m in 199–00, compared with £130m in 1998–99. Decisions on the deployment of schools capital resources between grant and credit approvals for 2000–01 and 2001–02 will be taken during 1999 in the light of consultation on the schools capital strategy and on decisions by schools on their status within the new schools framework.

Tuition Fees

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice he has given to principals and vice-chancellors during the current academic year on the collection of fees from non-UK EU students. [61811]

Mr. Mudie: No specific advice has been given to principals and vice-chancellors on the collection of fees from non-UK EU Students.

Research Funding

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will change the system of funding research at universities to encourage more co-operation between different institutions. [61544]

Mr. Mudie: The funding of research at universities by the higher education funding bodies is informed by ratings of research quality through the Research Assessment Exercise (RAE). I welcome the recognition by the higher education funding bodies, in their planning for the next RAE to be held in 2001, of the importance of ensuring that the arrangements for making submissions do not deter research collaboration. The funding bodies are currently considering further how to facilitate the submission of collaborative research in the RAE in the light of recent consultation on this and other issues.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what assessment his Department has made of the effectiveness of the (a) Investors in People Standard, (b) Management Charter Initiative, (c) Management Standards and (d) Management NVQs for SMEs; and if he will make a statement; [61549]

(2) what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) reviewed into the take up of competence-based management qualifications within SMEs; [61550]

(3) what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) reviewed into the link between management training and performance in SMEs. [61551]

Mr. Mudie: DfEE commissioned a three-year evaluation of the effectiveness of Investors in People which was carried out by the Institute for Employment Studies at the University of Sussex. The following reports were published: "Evaluation of Investors in People in England and Wales" (1994); "Evaluation of Investors in People in England and Wales, 1994–1995" (1995); and "The Return on Investors" (1996). All are available in the House of Commons Library. A review of the Management Charter Initiative was carried out for DfEE by DTZ Pieda Consulting and published as DfEE Research Report 67 in July 1998. It is also available in the Commons Library. Management Standards and NVQs were included in a review of all NVQs and SVQs which took place from 1996 to 1998 and identified improvements needed for SMEs which will be fed back to the relevant lead bodies and awarding bodies.

DfEE has not commissioned any research specifically into the take-up of competence-based management qualifications in SMEs, although gaining of qualifications by owner-managers of SMEs was included in a report for the Department on small firms' training needs, practices and difficulties by Professor James Curran et al. This was published in 1996 in DfEE's Research Studies series and is available in the House of Commons Library.

MCI (on behalf of DfEE and DTI) commissioned a review of research by Durham University Business School into the role of management development in the growth of high growth SMEs which was published in 1997. SMEs were also included in two research studies published by DfEE: "The business benefits of competence-based management development" by J and R Winterton (Research Studies 16, 1996) and "Evaluation of the business benefits of management development" by DTZ Pieda Consulting (Research Report 66, 1998). Both reports are in the Library.

TREASURY

Exchequer Income

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated current net income to the Exchequer for the operation of (a) National Air Traffic Services, (b) student loans, (c) residual debt in British Energy plc, (d) the radio spectrum, (e) Belfast Port, (f) the Commonwealth Development Corporation, (g) the Royal Mint and (h) the Tote. [61424]

Mr. Byers: Details of the income and expenditure of the five public corporations listed (National Air Traffic Services; Belfast Port, one of the Northern Ireland Public Trust Port Authorities; Commonwealth Development Corporation; Royal Mint; and the Tote) can be found in the relevant annual report.

Information on loans to students and repayments of them can be found in Chapter 2 of the Department for Education and Employment's departmental report (Cm 3910), and details of the income and expenditure of the Radiocommunications Agency in Chapter 14 of the Department of Trade and Industry's departmental report (Cm 3905).

Details of interest income from the Government's residual debt holdings in British Energy plc are published annually in the Appropriation Accounts (Volume 16: Class XVI, Vote I).

Self-assessment

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total expenditure and what was the breakdown of the expenditure on (a) public opinion research, (b) television, radio and newspaper advertising and (c) direct mail incurred by his Department and agencies on the self-assessment public information campaign; and if he will make a statement. [61686]

Dawn Primarolo: Since the launch of the Self Assessment public information programme in June 1995 about £21 million has been spent informing taxpayers of changes. Within this expenditure, £718,000 has been spent on public opinion research, £13 million on television, radio and newspaper advertising and £750,000 on direct mail. All these figures are exclusive of VAT and are costs to date (30 November 1998).

EU Tax Harmonisation

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what powers he has over veto of the harmonisation within the European Union of (a) company taxes, (b) personal taxes and (c) excise duties; and if he will make a statement. [61714]

Dawn Primarolo: Decisions on these matters are subject to unanimity.

Tax Policy Co-ordination

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to seek to co-ordinate savings and corporate taxation across European Union nations; and if he will make a statement. [61071]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 30 November 1998]: The UK is taking an active part in discussions on the draft Directive on taxation of savings, but we have made it clear that we will not agree to any course of action which would seriously damage the UK and other European financial markets. There are no proposals for the coordination of corporate taxation in the European Union.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy to promote an OECD-wide approach to tax policy co-ordination; and if he will make a statement. [61072]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 30 November 1998]: The UK takes an active part in the work of the OECD which is consistent with our aims of promoting economic growth through the development of international trade and investment.

EU National Budget Deficits

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy that there should be reporting of European Union national budget deficits to distinguish between (a) borrowing for net investment purposes and (b) borrowing to fund current expenditure; and if he will make a statement. [61068]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 30 November 1998]: Council Regulation 3605/93 sets out the budgetary reporting requirements for Member States. In assessing the national budget deficits, Article 104c(3) of the Maastricht Treaty states that the level of government investment expenditure should be taken into account.

European Growth and Stability Pact

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy to oppose amendments to the (a) interpretation and (b) implementation of the European Growth and Stability Pact promoting greater flexibility towards budget deficits which result from high levels of net public sector investment; and if he will make a statement. [61066]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 30 November 1998]: The Government are not aware of proposals by Member States to amend the Stability and Growth Pact. The Pact supports sound public finances which are vital for macroeconomic stability and the success of EMU.

Duty Free

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions have taken place at Ministerial level over the last six months about the future of duty free and the tax regime following its abolition. [61882]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 1 December 1998]: I discuss these questions regularly both with colleagues in Government and in Europe.

Dividend Tax Credit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how much it would cost to exempt pensioners from the abolition of the dividend tax credit for the years (a) 1999–2000, (b) 2000–01 and (c) 2001–02; [61839]

(2) if he will list by region in Great Britain the number of pensioners who will lose money, and the amounts involved, as a result of the abolition of the dividend tax credit. [61842]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 1 December 1998]: It is estimated that the cost of exempting those aged over 65 from the abolition of payable tax credits on dividend income would be about £25 million in each full year. I regret that no estimates are available on a regional basis for either the number of pensioners affected or the amounts of money involved.

Defence Expenditure

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of total taxation went towards military expenditure in the last year for which figures are available. [61737]

Mr. Byers: Defence spending in 1997–98, the last year for which figures are available, amounted to 6.64 per cent. of the government's current receipts.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will seek to introduce a right conscientiously to object to paying taxes for military spending. [61740]

Dawn Primarolo: I have no plans to do so.

Universities and Colleges

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce tax incentives for companies giving money to fund universities and colleges. [61543]

Dawn Primarolo: A number of tax reliefs are already available for companies giving money to universities and colleges.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Modernising Justice White Paper

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if his Department intends to publish a White Paper on modernising justice. [62352]

Mr. Hoon: The Lord Chancellor has today laid before Parliament a White Paper on Modernising Justice. Copies of the White Paper and accompanying Press Notice have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Rights of Audience

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what responses the Government have received to their consultation paper, Rights of Audience and Rights to Conduct Litigation in England and Wales: the Way Ahead. [62353]

Mr. Hoon: The Government received 100 responses to the consultation paper. Of these 64 were in favour of the Government's proposals, 12 were opposed, 11 were neutral or did not comment, and 13 were mixed. Copies of the responses have today been placed in the Libraries of both Houses, and the Supreme Court Library, with the exception of 6 responses which were made in confidence. The responses were carefully analysed and taken into account in the development of our proposals on rights of audience which are contained in the Modernising Justice White Paper published today.

The Respondents are listed (those who responded in confidence are not listed):

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Concessionary Television Licences

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many pensioners currently receive a concessionary television licence under each criterion for each region in Great Britain. [61152]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 27 November 1998]: Regional statistics on the concessionary television licence scheme do not distinguish between pensioners and other beneficiaries, or according to the criteria under which individuals qualify. The number of concessionary licences currently on issue in the United Kingdom, by country, is (to the nearest thousand):

	Number
England and Wales	555,000
Scotland	53,000
Northern Ireland	12,000

Television Licence Evasion

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on what plans there are in place to reduce the level of television licence evasion in Chelmsford. [61889]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: The BBC has statutory responsibility for the administration and enforcement of the television licensing system. TV Licensing, which carries out the day to day administration and enforcement as agent for the Corporation, adopts all appropriate measures to minimise evasion throughout the United Kingdom. Standard enforcement procedures are complemented by targeting pre-determined areas for higher levels of enforcement activity. It is contrary to TV Licensing's policy to publish details of areas due to be targeted; to do so would give comfort to evaders in other parts of the country.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mine Clearance

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list Government expenditure on mine clearance for each year since 1992, broken down by country. [61794]

Clare Short: Government expenditure on mine clearance projects, including integrated mine awareness activities, is set out in the table.

	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99 up to 30.11.98

Expenditure by Department for International Development unless otherwise stated

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the organisations to which the Government have given money for the purpose of mine clearance in each year since 1992; and in each case the amount received by each organisation. [61793]

Clare Short: The Government have provided grants for humanitarian mine clearance activities to the following organisations:

	1991–92	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the amount spent on (a) humanitarian mine clearance, (b) commercial mine clearance, (c) military initiative mine clearance, (d) mine awareness and (e) research and development for mine clearance by Her Majesty's Government in each year since 1992. [61792]

Clare Short: Disbursements are set out in the table.

Expenditure by Department for International Development (DFID) unless otherwise indicated.
[1] Includes clearance of anti-personnel landmines and other unexploded ordnance.
[2] DFID has not funded commercial mine clearance. There are no records of UK commercial demining activities currently available in Department of Trade and Industry.
[3] Activities funded from Ministry of Defence (MOD) budget. Military initiative Mine Clearance since 1992 has taken place only in Bosnia, where it is a part of the wider military operation since November 1992. Activities have including training and supervision of mine clearance programmes (conducted by the Entity Armed Forces) as well as the provision of Mine Awareness training to over 15,000 school children. The MOD has also continued to monitor and maintain the minefields in the Falkland Islands. Again, this work is one part of the duties of those involved and it would not be possible to cost it.
[4] MOD-funded applied research into military clearance technology has increase significantly over the past three years and is expected to remain high for the next five years at least. The department currently spends approximately £3m per annum on research into counter-mine technologies. The MOD does not have a remit to fund research into purely humanitarian demining, as opposed to operation de-mining (which has differing requirements); however, it is only comparatively late in a programme that the specific utility of a technology is identified. A separate focal point of post-conflict mine clearance research has been established at the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency's (DERA) facilities at Chertsey in Surrey to complement the research being conducted in support of operational mine clearance.
[5] Includes integrated mine awareness activities.
[6] Payment made from Foreign and Commonwealth Office funds.
[7] Value of surplus equipment re-deployed to mine clearance projects.

DFID also commission DERA direct for specific advice and assignments.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Walter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the impact of recent development in Zimbabwe's land resettlement programme on the provision of aid by her Department. [61891]

Clare Short: The land resettlement programme is one of the factors being considered in the development of a New Country Strategy for Zimbabwe. We are consulting widely in the preparation of the Strategy. I will place a copy of the Country Strategy Paper in the Library of both the Houses when it is published.

Sustainable Development and Environmental Protection

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department has taken to develop its approach to sustainable development and environmental protection. [62355]

Clare Short: We published a policy statement on the environment "Eliminating World Poverty: Why The Environment Matters" on 1 December. This follows up the White Paper on International Development and explains our approach to environmental protection and sustainable development. The statement invites comments on our approach. I will place copies in the Library of the House.

PRIME MINISTER

United Kingdom Delegations (WEU and COE)

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister what changes there are in the composition of the United Kingdom Delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and the Assembly of the Western European Union. [62511]

The Prime Minister: The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) has been appointed as a Substitute representative in place of Lord Steel of Aikwood.

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his most recent discussions with President Clinton on Iraq, in relation to the precise objectives of potential military action. [61461]

The Prime Minister: No.

David Shayler

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister who appointed David Shayler to the Security Services; and if he will make a statement on the procedure by which he was recruited. [61940]

The Prime Minister: Mr. Shayler was recruited by the Security Service, using its normal selection and vetting procedures. These were similar to the procedures in use throughout the Civil Service at the time.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

ENTRUST

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) waste minimisation projects and (b) projects to help with the remediation of contaminated land have been supported by ENTRUST; and at what value. [60872]

Mr. Meale: According to ENTRUST, the relevant figures to date are:

(a) Waste Minimisation Projects

134 projects have been approved by ENTRUST, with a total value of £14,573,200. Of these, 35 projects have been implemented, with a value of £2,069,740.

(b) Projects to help with the Remediation of Contaminated Land

139 projects have been approved by ENTRUST, with a total value of £21,388,140. Of these, 33 projects have been implemented, with a value of £1,252,400.

Recycling

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to encourage the development of secondary markets for recyclables; and if he will make a statement. [61497]

Mr. Meale: The Government believe recycling is critical to the task of making our waste management more environmentally acceptable, and we are committed to a substantial increase in the role it plays in this country. We are currently reviewing our national waste strategy and will publish a draft in Spring 1999, at which point further comments will be invited from all parties. The final version of the new waste strategy will be published as a Command Paper, and adopted by the Government, before the end of 1999.

My Department is considering the measures that could be taken to enhance the markets for recycled materials, including new or extended use of economic instruments, and whether Government and other high profile organisations should take more of a lead in specifying high recycled content and environmental standards for the products they purchase.

As part of this work, we have commissioned a research project to investigate market failures in the demand for secondary materials. In addition, we have set up a Market Development Group to identify the barriers to expanding the markets for recycled materials and to develop practical proposals to help overcome them. Advice from the research project and the report of the Market Development Group will feed into the draft new waste strategy in Spring 1999.

Razor Wire Fencing

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what studies his Department has commissioned into the safety of the use of razor wire as a fencing material and its possible dangers to humans and animals; and if he will make a statement. [61480]

Mr. Meale: The Health and Safety Executive (HSE) has not commissioned any studies into the safety of the use of razor wire.

Countryside Agency

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has engaged recruitment consultants to advise him on suitable candidates for appointment as Chair of the new Countryside Agency; and what criteria will be employed to assess potential candidates. [61648]

Mr. Meacher: My Department employed recruitment consultants primarily to ensure that details of the post were made known as widely as possible. Their work supplemented advertisements in the national press and requests for nominations from a wide range of public and private sector organisations. The consultants also dealt with the issue and receipt of application forms, and made an initial categorisation of applications.

The sift of applicants was carried out in accordance with the Nolan procedures by a panel comprising officials from my Department and an independent member. Advice from the recruitment consultants was also available to them. In carrying out the sift, the panel were looking principally for a knowledge of, and demonstrated commitment to, countryside and rural issues, excellent communication skills, and managerial ability, both to lead and motivate the commissioners and staff of a large organisation and to ensure that the two existing agencies were successfully brought together.

Synthetic Riding Surfaces

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will prohibit the use of PVC waste for synthetic riding surfaces and its importation for such purposes. [61485]

Mr. Meale: The import and export of waste are governed by European Council Regulation (EEC) No. 259–93, the 'waste shipments' Regulation. PVC is included on the Regulation's Green list of wastes which do not require prior authorisation when traded for recovery, providing they are not contaminated with hazardous substances. There is no evidence that either clean, uncontaminated PVC waste or recovered PVC products are harmful to human health or the environment. There are therefore currently no plans to prohibit the import of such waste or products recovered from it.

Landfill Tax

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will assess the advantages of enabling receipts from landfill tax to be invested in the recycling infrastructure in the United Kingdom. [61835]

Mr. Meale: The review of landfill tax by Customs and Excise for the 1998 Budget revealed strong support for the Environmental Bodies Credit Scheme. Following this, the Government are currently considering if the Environmental Bodies Credit Scheme, which is funded from receipts from the landfill tax, might be enhanced, in particular with a view to encouraging recycling. A decision on the extent of any changes to the existing arrangements has yet to be made.

Train Operating Companies

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the incentives available to train operating companies to provide services above the minimum standards set by their franchise. [61896]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The minimum level of service an operator must plan to provide is set out in the Passenger Service Requirement (PSR), which forms a key part of the contract. Train operating companies have commercial incentives to operate additional services and attract more passengers. The Franchising Director has powers to enforce compliance with the PSR and failure to comply could lead to termination of the franchise.

Air Pollution

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the levels of air pollution around United Kingdom airports which can be ascribed to pollution from (a) aircraft and (b) motor vehicles. [61893]

Mr. Meale: Detailed estimates of polluting emissions have been prepared for 11 areas of the United Kingdom (London, Manchester, West Midlands, Merseyside, Glasgow, Bristol, West Yorkshire, Southampton, Portsmouth, Swansea and Port Talbot and Middlesbrough). Emissions from a wide range of sources are calculated for each 1km by 1km grid square within the areas for which these inventories have been produced. The sources examined include both aircraft and motor vehicles. The emissions estimates are available in a series of reports prepared by the London Research Centre on behalf of my Department. Copies of the reports will be sent to the hon. Member shortly.

Further information on emissions from aircraft and road transport is available from the National Atmospheric Emissions Inventory, which can be accessed through the Department's web site at http://www.environment.detr.gov.uk/airq/aqinfo.htm. The web site also includes links to the London Research Centre's site which contains some of the relevant information from the local inventories.

Railways

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the companies which currently discharge responsibilities undertaken by British Rail prior to privatisation. [61899]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Ownership of many of the successor companies has changed since they were franchised or sold, and the information requested is no longer collected on a comprehensive basis.

Strategic Rail Authority

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what responsibilities the shadow Strategic Rail Authority will have in respect of (a) train path allocation and (b) national timetables. [61895]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Railtrack allocates train paths in accordance with access rights which the operators hold and with the operators' bids for paths. Railtrack is also responsible for the national timetable. Railtrack will retain these responsibilities when the shadow Strategic Rail Authority is established next Spring. However, we envisage that the new organisation will assess at a strategic level network capacity, future demand and the balance between passenger and freight operations.

Animals (Illegal Trafficking)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he is taking to help prevent the extinction of (a) the Tibetan antelope and (b) the gold snub-nosed monkey. [61900]

Mr. Meale: The Tibetan Antelope (Panthalops hodgsonii) and the Golden Snub-nosed Monkey (Pygathrix roxellana) are listed on Appendix 1 of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES) and Annex A of the EC Wildlife Trade Regulation which implements CITES within the European Union. International trade in these species is effectively banned. However, there is evidence that illegal trafficking in Tibetan Antelopes' wool (shahtoosh) is linked to smuggling in products from another Appendix 1, and critically endangered, species—the tiger. Last year the Metropolitan Police seized 138 shahtoosh shawls from a shop in Mayfair, the biggest seizure in the world so far. In October this year, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister received further information about this illegal trade during his visit to China. Next year, as Chair of the CITES Standing Committee, the UK will lead a mission to tiger range states and consumer countries to assist all concerned in their efforts to crack down on illegal trade by strengthening enforcement, raising public awareness of the threats to these species and gathering further information useful in tackling international wildlife crime.

Rail Freight

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he still expects to receive a grant application shortly from Railtrack in respect of the piggyback rail freight scheme. [61634]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Minister of Transport had a useful introductory meeting with the Chief Executive of Railtrack on 15 November. A range of issues were discussed, including the piggyback scheme and other rail freight proposals, all of which, in Railtrack's view, would require significant amounts of Government grant. However, no formal proposals or grant application have been received from Railtrack, and the timing of any application was not discussed.

Waste Exports and Imports

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to amend the United Kingdom Management Plan for Exports and Imports of Waste. [62524]

Mr. Meacher: The UK policies on exports and imports of waste are set out in the "United Kingdom Management Plan for Exports and Imports of waste", which was published on 16 May 1996. The Plan came into effect on 1 June 1996.

Under the Plan, imports of waste from European Community Member States, with the exception of Ireland and Portugal, for disposal by high temperature incineration are being progressively phased out under an annual quota. This arrangement is intended to allow Member States time to develop their own high temperature incineration facilities, and is consistent with the long-standing United Kingdom policy that developed countries should be self-sufficient in disposing of their own waste. The quota is due to expire on 31 May 1999.

The Government have received a request from the high temperature incineration industry to extend the quota by at least a year. After careful consideration of the industry's representations, the Government have decided not to extend the quota. Any such extension of the quota would undermine the UK policy on self-sufficiency in waste disposal by developed countries.

However, it has become apparent that the Plan requires clarification on one minor, but important, point. There is, at present, an apparent inconsistency over whether waste imported under the quota needs to be disposed of, or simply imported into the UK, by 31 May 1999. The Government intend to clarify the situation by confirming that the waste must arrive at the appropriate disposal facility by 31 May 1999. This carries no cost implications.

My Department has therefore today published, for consultation, details of the proposed change. Copies of the consultation paper have been placed in the Library of both Houses.

Orton Pit

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Government will submit Orton Pit to the European Commission as a candidate special area of conservation. [62525]

Mr. Meacher: The Government have decided that Orton Pit should be submitted to the European Commission as a candidate SAC on account of its important population of Great Crested Newts. This will happen in the next few days.

Composting Development Group

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what response he received to the consultation on the Composting Development Group report; and if he will make a statement. [62526]

Mr. Meacher: The Composting Development Group Report was published in July as a consultation paper. The response was overwhelmingly positive with widespread support for its recommendation.

The Government welcome the Report as a significant step forward in the development and promotion of composting. We consider that its conclusions are sound and we endorse the thrust of its recommendations, which successfully address the major barriers to marketing compost and identify practical ways forward to help overcome them. We broadly accept those recommendations directed specifically at Government Departments, though we need to consider carefully how best to implement them. I commend the other recommendations to the relevant organisations and bodies which the Report identifies and urge them to make every effort to implement them.

The Department received 75 responses. A list of responses received has been placed in the Library of the House; copies of individual responses may be obtained through the DETR Library.

DEFENCE

Defence Council Instructions

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a list of unclassified Defence Council Instructions which have been issued since 1 February. [62044]

Mr. Spellar: I am today placing a copy of this list in the Library of the House.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he intends to oppose German proposals put to the December meeting of the North Atlantic Council that NATO should adopt a policy of no first use of nuclear weapons; and if he will make a statement. [61736]

Mr. George Robertson: No member country has proposed to NATO that it adopt a policy of No First Use of nuclear weapons. In conducting the Strategic Defence Review we concluded that such a policy would be incompatible with our and NATO's doctrine of deterrence, and that it would not further nuclear disarmament. We see no need to change NATO nuclear policy as expressed in the Alliance Strategic Concept.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the figures were for military spending broken down into (a) nuclear and (b) non-nuclear spending in the most recent available year. [61739]

Mr. George Robertson: It is not possible to divide military spending neatly into nuclear and non-nuclear because many force elements have a variety of roles which may include support to nuclear and non-nuclear tasks, as I set out in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Laura Moffat) on 2 November 1998, Official Report, columns 349–50.

Figures have been published in the annual UK Defence Statistics document and in the Strategic Defence Review White Paper, which also contains further detail. Copies are available in the Library of the House.

Chemical Warfare

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much of the defence budget is dedicated to research in chemical warfare in the current financial year. [61738]

Mr. Spellar: The Ministry of Defence funds research into defence against both chemical and biological warfare agents at the Chemical and Biological Defence Sector of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency at Porton Down. The information sought is not readily available in the format requested, but in the current financial year, the total expenditure on chemical and biological defence research is estimated at £33.6m. This research is focused solely towards providing UK armed forces with safe and effective protection against the effects of chemical and biological warfare agents.

Defence Diversification Agency

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much of the Defence Diversification budget was spent on non-military research in the most recent year for which figures are available. [61742]

Mr. Spellar: There has in the past been no Defence Diversification budget as such. Funding for my Department's research programme is provided for military purposes, although the resultant technologies can often have civil benefits. The modest costs arising from the creation of the Defence Diversification Agency at the end of this month will therefore be a departure from past practice, which we hope will enable the more widespread exploitation of our technology in the civil sector.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated cost of the Defence Diversification Agency in the current financial year. [61741]

Mr. Spellar: As we announced on 16 November 1998, Official Report, column 326, the estimated operating budget of the Defence Diversification Agency is expected to be some £2 million a year. Accordingly, a sum of £400,000 has been set aside to cover the costs of the Agency from its creation at the end of this month to the end of the current financial year.

RN Warships (Chile)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what commission has been paid to agents for the sale of Royal Navy warships to Chile in the last 10 years. [62054]

Mr. George Robertson: In line with long-standing Departmental policy, no commissions of any kind were or are paid to agents for Government to Government sales for ex-Royal Navy ships to Chile or any other country.

Equipment Sales

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what examination is made of the credentials of agents of (a) foreign Governments and (b) arms-purchasing companies who deal with the Armed Services over the sale of equipment. [62058]

Mr. Spellar: While they are sometimes called upon to provide foreign buyers with advice on, or demonstrations of, the capabilities of military equipment, the Armed Services do not deal with agents of (a) foreign governments and (b) arms purchasing companies on the sale of such equipment. This applies equally to the sale of surplus defence equipment by the Disposal Sales Agency.

Commemorative Information (Websites)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons the Commonwealth War Graves Commission website search facilities have failed to allow access to inquirers. [62066]

Mr. Spellar: The Commission launched the Debt of Honour Register on the Internet on 9 November to give access to the commemorative information on 1.7 million of the Commonwealth's war dead beyond that provided to 50,000 inquirers annually by letter and telephone.

The Internet site was developed by Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA) and during the first two weeks of operation a technical defect limited access to the site. The defect manifested itself only after the service was experiencing full-load conditions. However, during this period approximately 230,000 of the several million, who have visited the site, have interrogated the database.

As of 1 December the service has been stabilised and its reliability improved. Further diagnosis and rectification work is being urgently undertaken by CCTA.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the contract with CCTA for the construction of a memorial search facilities website, indicating penalty clauses applicable. [62067]

Mr. Spellar: A contract to develop and maintain an Internet site for the Commonwealth War Graves Commission was let to the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA) on 29 July 1998. Penalty clauses were not applicable in the agreement for the development work undertaken.

The Commonwealth War Graves Commission launched the Debt of Honour Register on the Internet on 9 November to give access to the commemorative information on 1.7 million of the Commonwealth's war dead beyond that provided to 50,000 inquirers annually by letter and telephone.

VC10 Fleet

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is (a) the reason for replacement and (b) the cost of the new body panels purchased for the CIK RAF VC10 fleet. [62094]

Mr. Spellar: The original body trim panels, used to convert the interior of the RAF VC10 CMk1 for its passenger carrying role, were over 20 years old, did not conform to current fire, smoke and toxicity regulations and were becoming increasingly difficult to maintain. The precise cost of the interior trim panels is "commercial in confidence" and I am, therefore, withholding it under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the contracts with AIM Aviation (Jecco) Ltd. which included (a) furnishings and (b) other equipment. [62092]

Mr. Spellar: The Ministry of Defence contract database lists 34 active contracts with AIM Aviation (Jecco) Ltd. This does not include local purchase orders, raised by units for items valued at under £5,000, for which no central record is held. Detailed information about the equipment or furnishings ordered under the contracts is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the value was of the contract placed with AIM Aviation (Jecco) Ltd which included bed-settees for the RAF VC10 fleet; how many bed-settees at what cost were included in the order; on what date the order for the bed-settees was placed with AIM Aviation (Jecco) Ltd; and if he will place a copy of the contract in the Library. [62091]

Mr. Spellar: The decision to replace the existing bed settees was made by the RAF under the previous administration in February 1997. A contract for six divan bed-settee units was awarded to AIM Aviation (Jecco) Ltd. on 20 August 1997 following a competition. No other items were included in the contract. The cost of equipment procured from industry under contracts awarded by the Ministry of Defence is "commercial in confidence" and consequently, I am withholding the information under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. I will not be placing a copy of the contract in the Library of the House.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the orders for VIP equipment for the RAF VC10 fleet which have been cancelled since 1 May 1997, indicating the contents of the orders. [62093]

Mr. Spellar: There is no record of any order for VIP equipment for the RAF VC10 fleet being cancelled since 1 May 1997.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what meetings he has had with police concerning levels of policing for New Year's Eve 1999 and the following week; and what assessment he has made of the potential impact of the Millennium Bug on policing needs for that period. [61176]

Mr. Boateng: Police staffing levels are an operational matter, to be determined by individual chief officers. Equally, it is for each force to assess the likely impact of the Millennium Bug, both on policing needs during the celebrations and on their own police Information Technology systems.

Central guidance is being issued by the Association of Chief Police Officers' (ACPO) Millennium Co-ordinating Committee (MCC), chaired by John Evans (Chief Constable of Devon and Cornwall) who will be ACPO president during the Millennium. He has met with the Prime Minister's adviser to discuss the issues. I understand that ACPO are advocating a multi-agency approach to dealing with public order and public safety issues over the Millennium. Forces will be establishing contingency plans and liaising with local agencies and organisations accordingly.

Prison Mother and Baby Units

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women were removed from each of the four prison mother and baby units in (i) 1998, (ii) 1997 and (iii) 1996; and for what reasons. [61019]

Mr. George Howarth: The information is given in the table.

Women prisoners removed from mother and baby units

Extradition

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what facilities there are for arranging the transfer of a person arrested abroad in an EC country to face charges in a United Kingdom court; what legal aid facilities are available to such persons; and if he will make a statement. [61664]

Kate Hoey: There are two ways in which a person may be brought back to face criminal charges. The United Kingdom's extradition arrangements with most European countries are governed by the European Convention on Extradition. Where a person living in a Convention country stands accused in the United Kingdom of an extraditable offence, there is provision for an extradition request to be made. If the request is granted, the person concerned will be surrendered to stand trial in this country.

Provision also exists for the voluntary repatriation to this country of convicted prisoners serving sentences in European Community countries. Such transfers take place in accordance with the provisions of the Council of Europe Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons, and the Repatriation of Prisoners Act 1984. Any outstanding charges could be brought against a prisoner who had consented to be repatriated to this country, once they returned here.

Legal aid is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor. I am advised, however, that it would be open to a person so facing charges to apply in the usual way for criminal legal aid, once he had been returned to the United Kingdom, and that any such application would be considered under Part V of the Legal Aid Act 1988.

Traffic Police

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many traffic police officers were deployed (a) five years ago and (b) at the latest available date in (i) each of the Metropolitan Police divisions, (ii) Surrey, (iii) Thames Valley and (iv) the United Kingdom. [61723]

Kate Hoey: The information for England and Wales is set out in the table. The numbers of traffic police officers in Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively. Within the Metropolitan Police, traffic officers are deployed at an area level, rather than at divisional level.

Traffic policing does not necessarily occur independently of other police work, and the number of officers deployed to the traffic division is not indicative of the money spent on traffic policing. A large part of traffic officers' time is spent dealing with ordinary crime. It is an advantage that traffic officers deal with matters unrelated to traffic and that beat officers will also deal with traffic offences, thus contributing to more efficient ways of policing.

Traffic Offences

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been made by the Metropolitan Police in respect of (a) speeding, (b) dangerous driving, (c) drunken driving and (d) defective vehicles in each of the last five years. [61615]

Kate Hoey: The information is set out in the table:

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many deaths occurred in each of the Metropolitan Police divisions in each of the last five years arising from (a) murder and (b) road traffic accidents. [61724]

Firearms Compensation

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his latest estimate for the total compensation paid under Category C of the Firearms Compensation Scheme. [61684]

Mr. Boateng: Around £11,850,000 has so far been paid to claimants under Option C of the compensation scheme for large-calibre handguns and the ex-gratia payment scheme for small-calibre pistols. No payments have yet been made under Option C of the separate statutory compensation scheme for small-calibre pistols. The final total of Option C payments will not be known until all claims have been examined, but we expect this to be contained within the overall compensation figure of around £120 million previously announced.

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his Department intends to reply to the letters from the hon. Member for Ashford of 16 July, 3 September, 14 October and 22 October on Category C firearms compensation. [61629]

Mr. Boateng: A reply was sent on 27 November. Because the emphasis is on processing compensation claims, I am afraid it is not always possible to respond promptly to inquiries about the progress of individual claims. We have, however, kept the House informed of progress on the compensation schemes generally, most recently in my reply to the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) on 28 October 1998, Official Report, columns 179–80.

Speed Cameras

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many speed cameras have been installed in (a) the Metropolitan Police area, (b) Surrey and (c) Thames Valley in each of the last five years; and how many prosecutions have resulted from evidence from them in each area. [61617]

Kate Hoey: In November 1998, there were 258 sites for speed cameras in the Metropolitan Police area, 15 in Surrey and 250 in Thames Valley. Comparable information for 1993–1997 is not available. Cameras are rotated around a number of sites to maximise their use as a deterrent.

The table gives the figures for prosecutions for speeding where the offences were detected by automatic cameras:

Police authority	1992	1993	1994	1995	1996
Metropolitan Police	283	3,225	1,658	6,075	9,426
Surrey	—	—	—	18	—
Thames Valley	—	1,196	4,102	2,908	2,716

The majority of speeding offences detected by cameras are dealt with by fixed penalty. The table gives the number of fixed penalty notices given, and paid, for speeding where the offences were detected by automatic cameras:

Motoring Accidents

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many motoring accidents resulting in (a) death, (b) serious injury, (c) less serious injury and (d) vehicle damage but not injury were recorded in each Metropolitan Police district in each of the last five years. [61616]

Police Act 1997

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the timetable for implementation of Part V of the Police Act 1997; and if he will make a statement. [61614]

Mr. Boateng: As we have made clear in the past, we have decided to implement Part V of the Police Act 1997 and to establish the necessary arrangements to issue the three forms of certificate provided for under the Act. The timetable for implementation will be influenced by the very large number of certificates likely to be required. We are therefore giving careful consideration to the phasing in of certificates with priority given to the protection of children.

Police (Unclassified Papers)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library a list of unclassified papers produced in (a) the special interest series by the Police and Reducing Crime Unit, and (b) the technical series of papers from the Police Scientific and Development Branch since January 1997, indicating (a) the title of each paper and (b) the date on which it was produced. [62045]

Mr. Boateng: There have been two unclassified special interest series papers published by the Policing and Reducing Crime Unit, and eighteen unclassified papers produced in the technical series of reports by the Police Scientific Development Branch since January 1997. A list of these will now be placed in the Library.

Police Grant

Ms Blears: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to announce the allocations of police grant for individual police authorities in England and Wales for 1999–2000. [62483]

Mr. Straw: I have today put a copy of my proposals for the allocation of police grant for 1999–2000 in the Library. I intend to implement these proposals, subject to consideration of any representations I receive about them.

I announced in July, following the Government's Comprehensive Spending Review, that spending overall on the police service in England and Wales would be increased by £1.24 billion in the years 1999–2002. The increases will be 2.67 per cent. in 1999–2000, up to a further 2.8 per cent. in 2000–01, and up to an extra 4 per cent. in 2001–02. These sums represent a real terms' increase, albeit small, in police spending, as explained in my reply to the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) on 31 July 1998, Official Report, columns 829–30.

The police service has indicated its support in principle for the continued distribution of police grant in accordance with a needs-based formula. I am therefore proposing to continue to allocate the greater part of police grant according to the police funding formula.

I am, however, proposing several changes to the formula to reflect the latest data now available, and in response to the representations I have received. The principal changes I propose are: (a) to reduce from 20 per cent. to 10 per cent. the share of funding allocated on the basis of forces' past establishments; and (b) to increase from 13.2 per cent. to 14.5 per cent. the proportion of funding allocated on the basis of forces' pensions commitments.

I am proposing that the Metropolitan Police should continue to receive additional funding in recognition of its distinct national and capital city functions. It has proved very difficult for the principal formula appropriately to take account of these special circumstances. I have proposed, therefore, that a special payment of grant will be made to the Metropolitan Police over and above that available through the principal formula. I have set the amount of this special payment at £176 million.

In addition, I am proposing to make special payments of grant to the following police authorities in 1999–2000 in recognition of the additional costs which will be incurred in preparation for the proposed changes to the Metropolitan Police District boundaries:

Essex—£2 million

Hertfordshire—£3 million

Surrey—£7 million.

Other police funding proposals within the local government finance system are being announced today by my right hon. Friends the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Wales. These proposals, and mine, would increase Total Standard Spending on the police in England and Wales by 2.67 per cent. or around £186 million over 1998–99.

The settlement also takes account of my commitment to improve police efficiency. I have set a target of 2 per cent. efficiency gains year on year for the police service from 1999–2000. By achieving these targets, police authorities can re-invest the savings to help meet front-line priorities.

Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary and the Audit Commission have published extensive advice to chief officers and to police authorities on many ways in which the efficiency and effectiveness of the police service can be improved within available resources. A detailed circular on this from my Department has recently been issued which, among other subjects, gives guidance on savings to be secured in the areas of training, estate management, procurement, sickness and early retirements on medical grounds.

Over the next three years, the Government will also be spending £250 million on their targeted crime reduction programme, £217 million on tackling drugs and £85 million on the Youth Justice Board's development fund.

The Government have already announced their decision to abolish crude and universal capping of local authorities from April 1999. In previous years, the Government have announced capping limits on police authority spending at the time of provisional funding settlement. No such limits are being set for next year. Nevertheless, I expect police authorities in England and Wales to set budgets which are prudent and reasonable, and which do not impose an excessive increase in council tax next year. We shall be monitoring the position carefully.

The effect of my proposals for each police authority for 1999–2000 is set out in the table. It also shows the allocation approved by Parliament for 1998–99.

Confiscation and Money Laundering Legislation

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the performance of courts enforcing confiscation and money laundering laws. [61553]

Mr. Boateng: The third report of the Home Office Working Group on Confiscation, published on 10 November, identifies significant weaknesses in the enforcement of confiscation orders, including a number relating to the roles of the courts. The Working Group makes recommendations for improving performance in this area, and for remedying perceived gaps in the money laundering legislation. The Government have announced a consultation period until the end of February, and will take account of the responses received before making decisions on the report's proposals.

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the involvement of the police in enforcing current confiscation and money laundering laws; and if he will estimate the cost to each police force in 1997–98 of this activity. [61555]

Mr. Boateng: The police have a specific role under the confiscation legislation in conducting asset tracing investigations, and under the money laundering legislation in receiving reports of suspicious transactions from financial institutions and other sources. Suspicious transaction reports are normally made to the Economic Crime Unit at the National Criminal Intelligence Service, while every police force in England and Wales has a Financial Investigation Unit, responsible for identifying assets for confiscation and investigating suspected money laundering. Information on the cost of this activity to individual forces is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, the costs borne by the police and other relevant authorities in implementing confiscation powers will be one of the factors to be included in the study which the Government plan to initiate of the possibility of establishing a confiscation agency.

Criminal Confiscation Orders

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the value of assets seized from criminals by courts in each year since 1992. [61554]

Mr. Boateng: Information about criminal confiscation orders is set out in the tables.

Working Group on Confiscation

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what responses he has received to the third report of the Home Office Working Group on Confiscation. [61552]

Mr. Boateng: None, but we would not expect to receive responses so soon after the report's publication. The consultation period will continue until the end of February. There have been a small number of letters from the public prompted by press coverage of the report.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what actions he proposes to take on the allocation of visas to child refugees from Albania. [61628]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Applications for entry clearance have been received from Ms Sally Becker of Operation Angel for a total of 91 individuals, a third of which are in respect of children needing medical treatment. They have been referred to the Home Office from the British Embassy in Tirana.

The applications fell to be considered under the Immigration Rules relating to persons seeking to enter the United Kingdom as visitors for private medical treatment or simply as visitors. Under these Rules, we have to be satisfied, among other requirements, that there is satisfactory evidence about the medical condition and its treatment, that the person will be able to maintain and accommodate himself or herself and any dependants without recourse to public funds and that the person intends to leave the United Kingdom at the end of the period of the treatment or visit. In the absence of satisfactory evidence from Operation Angel or any other source, we were certainly not satisfied that these requirements were met in the applications.

We considered whether there were grounds for treating the application son a discretionary basis outside the Immigration Rules, but concluded that it would not be appropriate to do so. In reaching this decision, we took account of the fact that Ms Becker had not taken Government advice and guidance on how to bring such an evacuation within the recognised official procedures: she had not demonstrated the option of local treatment through the international agencies and had not made a proper case on medical grounds. We were also aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development has in place a humanitarian strategy for former Yugoslavia (including Kosovo) and Albania. Furthermore, in the absence of adequate guarantees of funding from Operation Angel, we had to take account of the likely cost to the taxpayer in the almost certain event of recourse to public funds which, for a group of this size, would be of the order of £400,000 a year. We accordingly decided to refuse the applications. Ms Becker was notified of this decision by the British Embassy in Tirana on Friday 13 November.

NORTHERN IRELAND

ME

7. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will grant core funding to the Myalgic Encephalomyelitis Association in Northern Ireland in 1999–2000. [61204]

Mr. McFall: I have received an application for core funding from the ME Association. No decisions have yet been taken in relation to voluntary sector funding for the next financial year. However, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I will look sympathetically at this request.

Decommissioning

9. Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made on the decommissioning of illegally held arms and explosives. [61206]

28. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when she expects the decommissioning of illegally held arms and explosives to begin. [61225]

30. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress is being made in securing the decommissioning of weapons. [61227]

Marjorie Mowlam: I refer the hon. Members to the answer I gave to the hon. Members for Witney (Mr. Woodward), for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) and for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) on 2 December 1998, Official Report, column 865.

26. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make it her policy that prisoner releases and the decommissioning of illegally held arms and explosives should proceed in parallel. [61223]

Marjorie Mowlam: The Government's policy is to implement the Belfast Agreement in full. The accelerated release of prisoners and the decommissioning of illegally held arms are both integral parts of the Agreement and it is essential that they, like every part, are implemented in full. There is no direct linkage in the Agreement and the Government cannot rewrite the Agreement.

29. Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans she has to review the conduct of specified organisations in co-operating with the International Commission on Decommissioning under section 3(9)(d) of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998. [61226]

Marjorie Mowlam: The organisations currently specified under the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 are INLA, Continuity IRA and the Real IRA. None of them are co-operating with the International Commission on Decommissioning.

The conduct of organisations, specified and not specified, is under continual review to ensure that those organisations which have not established or are not maintaining a complete and unequivocal ceasefire remain specified. All relevant factors, including the four factors set out in section 3(9) of the Act, are taken into account.

School Examination Results

10. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment she has made of school exam results in Northern Ireland relative to the rest of Great Britain. [61207]

Mr. McFall: The Department of Education in Northern Ireland routinely compares school performance in examination with those in England and Wales. Comparisons with Scotland are difficult because of the different examination system. Standards in Northern Ireland have been improving each year and compare very favourably with the other regions. I offer my congratulations to pupils and teachers on their achievements.

Industrial Development Board

11. Mr. Ilisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans she has to reform the working of the Industrial Development Board. [61208]

Mr. Ingram: The structure of the industrial development bodies in Northern Ireland, including the Industrial Development Board, are being considered as part of the Economic Development Strategy Review.

Peace Process

12. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the latest position in the peace process. [61209]

20. Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on progress following the Belfast agreement. [61217]

22. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when she expects final implementation of the arrangements contained in the Belfast agreement. [61219]

24. Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made on the Belfast agreement; and if she will make a statement. [61221]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Considerable progress has been made in implementing the Belfast Agreement. Intensive consultations continue with a view to reaching early agreement on the number of Ministerial offices and on areas for North/South co-operation. I look forward to the full implementation of all aspects of the Agreement and to the launch of the various new institutions early in 1999.

Parades Commission

13. Mr. Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will abolish the Parades Commission. [61210]

Mr. Ingram: No.

The Parades Commission retains the complete confidence of the Government in its ability to operate in an independent, impartial and even-handed way in the best interests of all the people of Northern Ireland.

Inward Investment

14. Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action is being taken to encourage inward investment in Northern Ireland from (a) the United States and (b) elsewhere. [61211]

16. Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action is being taken to encourage inward investment in Northern Ireland from (a) the United States and (b) elsewhere. [61213]

Mr. Ingram: During October, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State together with the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) led a major initiative in North America. Through a series of executive briefings they very successfully promoted Northern Ireland as a world class investment location, building on the political progress following the Good Friday agreement. Similar briefings have been undertaken in Europe and are being considered for Asia Pacific.

Farming (Government Support)

15. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what support the Government are giving to farmers in Northern Ireland in the current financial year. [61212]

27. Mr. Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what support the Government are giving to farmers in Northern Ireland. [61224]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Government announced on 16 November 1998 a special aid package for United Kingdom farmers amounting to about £120 million. This package is likely to be worth some £19 million to Northern Ireland farmers. A total of just over £1 million was paid earlier under a one-off Pig Welfare Slaughter Scheme and to suckler cow producers whose herds were badly affected by BSE.

Victims of Violence

17. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what actions she is taking to help people who have been victims of violence in Northern Ireland. [61214]

Mr. Ingram: Following the publication of Sir Kenneth Bloomfield's report "We Will Remember Them", we undertook an extensive consultation to seek the views of those affected by the violence in Northern Ireland. I have already announced a number of significant initiatives to address the needs of victims, and others will be introduced when the outcome of the consultation is assessed.

Public Transport

18. Mr. Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many staff are currently employed by (a) Ulsterbus and (b) Northern Ireland Railways. [61215]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Ulsterbus currently employs 2,151 members of staff and Northern Ireland Railways employs 663.

Prisoners (Early Release)

19. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations she has received concerning the early release of terrorist prisoners. [61216]

Mr. Ingram: I have received a number of representations from various political parties, groups and individual members of the public concerning the early release of prisoners.

Nursery Places

21. Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps she is taking to increase the number of nursery school places. [61218]

Mr. McFall: The first year of our Pre-School Education Expansion Programme has increased pre-school education provision by 20 per cent. and provided places for an additional 2,200 children. We expect to make further substantial progress over the next 3 years towards our long-term aim of providing a year of pre-school education for every child.

Anti-drugs Strategy

23. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on progress with the Government's anti-drugs strategy in Northern Ireland following the appointment of the UK anti-drugs co-ordinator. [61220]

Mr. Ingram: The current strategy for tackling the drug problem in Northern Ireland was published in 1995. With the appointment of the UK anti-drug Co-ordinator and the production of a new 10 year strategy for tackling drug misuse, that strategy is currently being reviewed. A new strategy document is expected early in 1999.

Security Situation

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland. [61222]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Members for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) and for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) on 2 December 1998, Official Report, column 870.

Port of Belfast

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how expenditure incurred by the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland on consultancy advice, to assist in its consideration of Belfast Harbour Commissioner's proposal to transfer the Port of Belfast to the private sector, will be funded. [62345]

Marjorie Mowlam: Belfast Harbour Commissioners have brought forward their proposal to transfer the Port to the private sector under the terms of the Ports (NI) Order 1994. The legislation does not, however, empower the Department to incur expenditure in considering that proposal.

Parliament's approval for expenditure on consultant's fees associated with this proposal in the current financial year will be sought in a Supplementary Estimate for Department of the Environment Vote 1 (Roads, Transport and Ports). Pending that approval, expenditure will be met by repayable advances from the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund.

St. Angelo's Airport

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how planned expenditure incurred by the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland on the runway strengthening and provision of storage facilities at St. Angelo's Airport, Co. Fermanagh will be funded. [62346]

Marjorie Mowlam: This was one of a number of projects to benefit from the Chancellor's Fund announced on 12 May 1998. Parliament's approval for the planned expenditure in the current financial year will be sought in a Supplementary Estimate for Department of the Environment Vote 1 (Roads, Transport and Ports). Pending that approval, expenditure will be met by repayable advances from the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund.

HEALTH

Adoption

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will assess the recommendations of the September report of the British Agencies of Adoption and Fostering; and if he will make a statement. [61028]

Mr. Hutton: We have taken note of the British Agencies for Adoption and Fostering Action Plan which will help inform its own strategic plans for adoption, to be taken forward in the "quality protects" programme to improve children's services, announced on 21 September 1998.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps will be taken to ensure that local authorities implement recent ministerial guidance on adoption practices. [61026]

Mr. Hutton: "Adoption—Achieving the Right Balance" was published on 28 August 1998 under Local Authority Circular (98)20 and addressed to members and directors of local authorities and directors of voluntary adoption societies. The guidance raised a number of important issues for improving the adoption service including better strategic planning, avoiding delay in placing children for adoption and the introduction of measures to avoid children drifting in the care system. This guidance was prepared as part of our initiative "quality protects"; within this context therefore, we will be working closely with local authorities for the improvement of services for children, including adoption. The Department will monitor progress carefully to ensure that effective measures for achieving improvements have been introduced.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance is given by his Department on appropriate maximum charges for home studies for inter-country adoption. [61023]

Mr. Hutton: Fees charged by local authorities and adoption agencies are expected to cover the cost of preparing and assessing prospective adopters, submitting a report on the applicant concerning their suitability to become adoptive parents of children living abroad and any administrative costs. The Department has given no guidance about a maximum fee.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what criteria countries are selected for negotiating bilateral agreements for inter-country adoptions. [61021]

Mr. Hutton: Bilateral adoption agreements are essentially formal arrangements to enable citizens of the United Kingdom to adopt children from countries overseas meeting the requirements of the United Kingdom and the particular country concerned. Agreements are proposed by the Department in regard to countries which have little experience of intercountry adoption, with the aim of ensuring that the Department submits applications only for prospective adopters approved by the proper authorities in the UK. Also, the UK responds to requests for an adoption agreement where a country makes it a condition absolute before UK citizens are permitted to apply to adopt children from that country.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what criteria are employed by the (a) Department of Health and (b) Social Services Inspectorate in cases where they have rejected local authority home study assessments for overseas adoption. [61027]

Mr. Milburn: In its consideration of overseas adoption applications which are supported by a local authority or approved intercountry adoption agency, the Department, acting on advice of the Social Services Directorate, applies the same standards and criteria as are applied for domestic applications. Since 1993, the Department has been unable to support 6 applications out of a total of approximately 1,100. In addition, the Department will not support applications which do not meet the requirements of the applicants' country of choice.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the latest estimate available of the number of children entering the UK for adoption following approval by his Department in the financial year 1997–98. [61025]

Mr. Hutton: Based on the number of adoption applications supported by the Department, the number of children entering the United Kingdom in the financial year 1997–98 for the purposes of adoption was approximately 220.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps (a) have been taken to date and (b) are planned, to involve public interest and advisory groups in discussion of future adoption legislation. [61024]

Mr. Hutton: A comprehensive review of adoption law culminated in the publication in March 1996 of the consultative document "Adoption—A Service for Children". We will consult widely on any proposed adoption legislation which differs substantially from the 1996 proposals.

Food Provision (Homeless People)

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to co-ordinate food provision for, and establish healthy eating initiatives among, homeless people. [61016]

Ms Jowell: Local and voluntary schemes are best placed to meet the needs of this vulnerable but very mobile group.

Proteus Syndrome

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) children and (b) adults are currently suffering from Proteus syndrome; what is their age profile; and what training is given to paediatricians and others in the NHS to recognise and treat the condition. [61619]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not held centrally. Paediatricians are initially in the lead in diagnosing this rare disorder and in working through the options available for treatment—which can range over a number of specialist services depending upon the severity and manifestation of individual cases. Diagnosis and treatment options for Proteus syndrome form part of paediatricians' education and training.

Anti-convulsant Drugs

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment his Department has made of the safety of epilim and other anti-convulsant drugs for use by pregnant women; and if he will make a statement. [61623]

Ms Jowell: Epilim and other anticonvulsant drugs, as for all marketed medicines, are assessed by the Department to determine their safety for use by pregnant women. Available relevant research is assessed at the time of granting a Marketing Authorisation for a product and continues to be evaluated on an ongoing basis by the Medicines Control Agency. Risks to the foetus are recognised for anticonvulsant therapies and information about whether and how to use medicines in pregnant patients can be found in the authorised product information for health professionals and patients. The risks of loss of epileptic control need to be weighed against the risks to the foetus of these treatments. General prescribing advice on the use of antiepileptic therapy in pregnancy can be found in the British National Formulary.

Overhead Power Lines

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the health effects of emissions from overhead power lines, with particular reference to (i) electric and (ii) magnetic fields. [61465]

Ms Jowell: The Department has been supporting, in part, the United Kingdom childhood cancer study, which is expected to report next year. This large study is designed to investigate childhood cancer in relation to various possible causes including exposure to electric and magnetic fields. The Department is also funding a complementary study co-ordinated by the childhood cancer research group, in Oxford, investigating cancer incidence near power lines. Other work being supported by the Department are at Bristol University, on the effect of electric fields on pollutant aerosols, and a laboratory study at Brunel University. The Department is also contributing to the World Health Organisation electromagnetic fields project.

The Department obtains advice on the health implications of exposure to electromagnetic fields primarily from the National Radiological Protection

Board (NRPB). The NRPB's advisory group on non-ionising radiation conducted an extensive review of the subject in 1992 and concluded that there was no firm evidence of a carcinogenic hazard from exposure that might be associated with residence near major sources of electricity supply. The Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment has endorsed the advisory group's report. Supplementary reports in 1993 and 1994 were published by the NRPB to take into account the results of new epidemiological studies from Scandinavia, France and Canada. Copies of the advisory group's report and the supplementary documents are available in the Library. A further comprehensive review by the advisory group is under way and will be published on completion of the UK childhood cancer study.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into aspects of exposure to pollutants under power lines, with particular reference to the work of Professor Henshaw and his colleagues at Bristol University. [61464]

Ms Jowell: The Department is supporting several studies of the possible health effects of electromagnetic fields. One of these studies by Professor Henshaw, investigating aerosol pollutants under power lines, has been under way for a few months. No evaluation has yet been undertaken.

Vitamins and Herbs

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans the Medicines Control Agency has to review the guidance in Medicines Act Leaflet Number 8; and what is the status of that leaflet. [61618]

Ms Jowell: The Medicines Control Agency will review its Guidance Leaflet (Medicines Act Leaflet 8: "A Guide to What is a Medicinal Product") to reflect any changes to medicines legislation which is approved by Parliament following the conclusion of its present consultation exercise on proposals to place the classification process for "borderline products" on a statutory basis. The leaflet is for guidance only.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if a manufacturer of a blend of herbs and vitamins which is assessed by the Medicines Control Agency as medicinal by presentation is given the opportunity to review the presentation of that product prior to enforcement action being taken. [61639]

Ms Jowell: When notifying a manufacturer that it has determined a product is a medicine because it is presented for treating or preventing disease, the Medicines Control Agency requires compliance with the law by withdrawal of the product. The manufacturer may subsequently be able to comply with the law by placing the product on the market in a way which does not present it as treating or preventing disease.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans officials in (a) his Department and (b) the Medicines Control Agency have to meet manufacturers of vitamin and herb blends to discuss the licensing of their products as medicines in the United Kingdom. [61669]

Ms Jowell: Officials of the Medicines Control Agency (MCA), an executive agency of the Department, regularly meet the associations representing manufacturers of these products. When necessary, officials of the MCA also meet individual manufacturers to discuss the licensing of their products.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by what criteria the Medicines Control Agency assesses whether a blend of herbs and vitamins is medicinal by (a) function and (b) presentation; and if a manufacturer whose products are so assessed is given a written statement of the reasons for that decision. [61638]

Ms Jowell: The Medicines Control Agency (MCA) assesses products against the definition of a medicinal product in European Commission and United Kingdom law. It also has regard to legal precedent and its own published guidance (Leaflet MAL 8: "A Guide to What is a Medicinal Product"). Broadly, the assessment of a product's functionality focuses on the pharmacological effect of its ingredient(s) on human physiology, while the assessment of a product's presentation considers a whole range of factors, including any claims made for the product in promotional material or on its labelling and packaging (whether explicit or implied), its name, the form, and the consumers targeted. The MCA also considers the opinion of the product's purpose an averagely well informed consumer would gain from its ingredient(s) and presentation. It is normal practice for the MCA to explain to the manufacturer the grounds for a classification decision.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the Medicines Control Agency consults independent scientific experts when considering whether a herb and vitamin blend is medicinal by function; and if the manufacturer of such a product is able to have access to expert advice obtained by the agency. [61637]

Ms Jowell: The Medicines Control Agency (MCA) generally relies on the objective and expert advice of its own medical and pharmaceutical assessors. However, there are occasions when taking advice from external experts is appropriate. The MCA informs manufacturers of the impact of expert advice when classifying their products.

Vaccines

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what requests he has made to the manufacturers of MR and MMR vaccines for data on the possible side-effects of their products. [61612]

Ms Jowell: Since 1988 the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) has requested information from the manufacturers of measles, mumps and rubella vaccine about aseptic meningitis and idiopathic thrombocytopenic purpura.

Manufacturers have an ongoing obligation to provide to the MCA all serious suspected adverse reactions within 15 days of receipt, and to provide periodic safety update reports at specified intervals.

In addition, manufacturers may be requested at any time to provide further information necessary for the evaluation of the risks and benefits of a medicine.

Medical Negligence

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many medical negligence cases have been settled out of court in each of the last three years; and how many of the medical practitioners who have accepted medical negligence through an out of court settlement have been referred to the General Medical Council. [61799]

Mr. Milburn: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Cardiac Disease

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have been diagnosed with cardiac disease or illness in each of the last five years; and how many of those people have died as a result of that disease or illness. [61945]

Mr. Hutton: The number of people diagnosed with cardiac disease or illness is not available. The Health Survey for England 1994 showed that, overall, 23.7 per cent. of men reported suffering from a cardiovascular disorder, as did 25.7 per cent. of women. However, this could include a wide range of conditions such as raised blood pressure, heart murmurs or irregular rhythms, angina, strokes and heart attacks.

The numbers of Finished Consultant Episodes (which record how many people are admitted to hospital within each specialty) for cardiac illness in 1994–95 were as follows:

Specialty	Ordinary admissions	Day cases	Total
Cardiothoracic surgery	63,224	3,066	66,290
Cardiology	121,212	27,757	148,969
Totals	184,436	30,823	215,259

The first national service framework on coronary heart disease includes the management of patients with all forms of heart disease. The emerging findings report, which was published on 20 November, contains draft standards which include the care of heart patients in hospital and in the community.The numbers of people who have died from heart diseases in the last five years are as follows: The data are presented for persons of all ages, in England (only).

(a) Deaths from coronary heart disease (ICD-9 410–414)

Year	EASR[1]	Deaths
1990	207.4	138,154
1991	206.0	139,961
1992	197.9	136,118
1993	195.5	136,160
1994	179.3	125,962
1995	173.6	123,886
1996	167.3	120,792
1997	157.7	114,849

(b) Deaths from coronary heart disease and stroke (ICD-9 410–414 and 430–438)

Year	EASR[1]	Deaths
1990	292.9	200,728
1991	292.3	204,244
1992	279.9	198,244
1993	270.1	193,423
1994	250.3	180,837
1995	244.2	179,594
1996	237.6	176,884
1997	225.0	168,995

(c) Deaths from all circulatory disease (ICD-9 Ch.VII)

Year	EASR[1]	Deaths
1990	351.7	242,205
1991	348.8	244,778
1992	334.4	237,982
1993	334.0	240,609
1994	310.5	225,561
1995	305.1	225,511
1996	297.7	222,695
1997	283.7	214,104

[1] European Age Standardised Rate per 100,000 population (EASR) is the most meaningful illustration. However it helps to know what this represents in actual bodies so we have included numbers of deaths

Waiting Lists

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will issue guidelines to all health authorities requiring that patients should not be removed from waiting lists at the time that they are booked for an operation. [61843]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 1 December 1998]: Waiting lists should include both patients who have been given a date for admission and those waiting to be notified of one. This is set out clearly in NHS Waiting Times Guidelines for Good Administrative Practice, issued to health authorities and trusts in January 1996. Copies are available in the Library.

Elderly Patients (Emergency Readmissions)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the first and second quarter figures for 1998–99 for the number of patients aged 75 years and over who were readmitted to hospital as an emergency within 28 days of discharge. [61872]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 1 December 1998]: The number of patients aged 75 and over who were readmitted as an emergency within 28 days of discharge in the first two quarters of 1998–99 is shown in the table. The table also shows this figure as a percentage of people over 75 who have been discharged from hospital in the previous 90 days.

The number of patients aged 75 and over who were readmitted as an emergency within 28 days of discharge during 1998–99

	Number of readmissions	As a % of discharges
Q1	29,506	8.6
Q2	29,076	8.4

VAT (Medicines)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the (a) financial and (b) other effects of the VAT order on the supply of certain renal and cancer drugs and on pharmaceutical products by retail pharmacists to residents of nursing homes. [61939]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 1 December 1998]: The financial effect of the Value Added Tax Order on the supply of certain renal and cancer drugs was estimated at £3.5 million per annum. The Order is not being implemented for these items until 1 April 1999, when the increased funding available to the NHS will be in place.

The effect of the VAT Order on the supply of prescribed items by retail pharmacists to residents of nursing homes would be to make such items subject to VAT at the standard rate. However, there would be significant problems in altering NHS systems to comply with the Order and, as a result, Her Majesty's Treasury has decided not to implement this aspect of the Order.

There are no other effects of the VAT Order on the supply of certain renal and cancer drugs and on pharmaceutical products by retail pharmacists to residents of nursing homes.

Electro-convulsive Therapy

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding electro-convulsive therapy; and if he will make a statement. [62012]

Mr. Hutton: We have received a number of representations about electro-convulsive therapy (ECT) and, in conjunction with the president of the Royal College of Psychiatrists, the Chief Medical Officer wrote to all National Health Service trusts and consultant psychiatrists in September reminding them of the need to ensure ECT is properly administered in accordance with the College of Psychiatrists' procedures and guidance described in the ECT handbook.

Personal Social Services

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what capital resources he is making available to local authorities for the personal social services in 1999–2000, 2000–01 and 2001–02. [62351]

Mr. Dobson: Capital resources of £61.9 million will be made available to local authorities as follows:

£ million

	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02
Secure accommodation grant	6.2	6.2	6.2
Basic credit approvals	37.0	37.0	37.0
Supplementary credit approvals:
Mental Health	15.6	15.6	15.6
AIDS/HIV	3.1	3.1	3.1

Note:
The figures shown for 2000–01 and 2001–02 are provisional amounts at this stage

Asthma

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the rates of asthma among people living in the health authority areas covering (a) Gatwick and (b) Heathrow airports, relative to the national average. [61894]

Ms Jowell: There are no comprehensive data on the number of people with asthma. Asthma is estimated to affect 4 per cent. of adults and between 4 and 6 per cent. of children sufficiently severely to require medical supervision. Information is not available centrally on the rates of asthma in West Sussex and Hillingdon health authorities, which cover Gatwick and Heathrow airports respectively.

WALES

Police Authority Spending

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are his proposals for police authority revenue spending in 1999–2000. [62482]

Mr. Michael: I propose to make £359.0 million available from total standard spending in Wales to fund police services in 1999–2000. This sum comprises £180.7 million in cash-limited police grant, to be paid by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and £178.3 million in standard spending assessments (SSA). Excluding capital charges, it represents an increase of £8.8 million. The increase including capital charges is £6.0 million.

The sums for each police authority are set out in the following table.

£ million

Police authority	Police grant	SSA	Total
Dyfed-Powys	25.9	25.6	51.5
Gwent	34.8	34.5	69.3
North Wales	38.0	37.2	75.1
South Wales	82.0	81.1	163.1

Note:
Figures may not add due to rounding

My Department is today writing to each police authority in Wales consulting it on its provisional standard spending assessment for 1999–2000. The figures may alter slightly if the balance of funding between police authorities, which is determined by a joint formula for Wales and England, changes as a result of consultation.

Copies of the consultation letter have been placed in the Library of the House.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

World Trade Organisation

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if reports from representatives of Her Majesty's Government who are members of the United Kingdom delegation to the World Trade Organisation in Geneva are made public. [61167]

Mr. Wilson: No.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to whom the representatives of Her Majesty's Government who are members of the delegation to the World Trade Organisation in Geneva report. [61165]

Mr. Wilson: They report to the relevant Government Department, depending on the issue in question, with my Department having the overall responsibility for the World Trade Organisation.

Lear Corporation Facility, Colne

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to persuade the Lear Corporation to retain its manufacturing facility in Colne. [61643]

Mr. Battle: DTI officials at the Government Office for the North West have been in close touch with the company. I understand that the proposed closure is part of the company's planned reorganisation of its European operations, and that the company intends to retain the production capacity and jobs in the UK. I further understand that part of the plant will be sold to new owners which may safeguard some of the jobs. Officials from the Government Office, the Employment Service and TEC will maintain close contact with the local management to offer advice and assistance, and to work with the new owners.

Textiles Industry

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to respond to the BATC/GMB/KFAT/TGWU action plan for the textiles industry. [61647]

Mr. Battle: I met with representatives of the textiles and clothing industries and unions on 24 November to discuss their Action Plan for the industry. It represents a solid basis upon which the Social Partners can develop a more detailed strategy for addressing the competitiveness of the sector. I offered the services of my Department to facilitate the development of that strategy.

Telecommunications Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the outcome of the Telecommunications Council held in Brussels on 27 November; and if he will make a statement. [62034]

Mrs. Roche: I represented the UK at the Telecommunications Council held in Brussels on 27 November.

The Council reached unanimous political agreement in respect of common positions on two Decisions establishing a five year programme for the Interchange of Data between Administrations (IDA). No agreement was reached on a draft Directive on a framework for electronic signatures, and it was therefore agreed that this proposal should be referred back to the Committee of Permanent Representatives for further discussion.

The Commission also made oral presentations on: a Communication on implementation by Member States of Community legislation in the telecommunications sector; a Green Paper on radio spectrum policy; and on a report to the European Council on job opportunities in the information society. The Commission also provided an oral update on: the outcome of the OECD Conference on electronic commerce held in Ottawa in October; progress within the "Global Business Dialogue" on electronic commerce; and on internet domain name governance issues. The Presidency made an oral presentation on the outcome of the Conference "Coping with Convergence" held in Vienna on 3 November 1998.

Tobacco Advertising

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to promote global standards on tobacco advertising. [61912]

Ms Jowell: I have been asked to reply.

Government officials will fully co-operate in the planning, scheduling and information-sharing that would accompany the development of an international framework convention for tobacco control, intended to facilitate and encourage member states to strengthen their own national tobacco control policies. They will liaise with relevant organisations in taking this forward. We hope that the forthcoming White Paper on Tobacco Control will provide a model in the development and operation of a framework convention.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Awareness Training

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what disability awareness training is currently provided for his Department's staff, with particular reference to assisting partially-sighted or blind people; and what proposals he has for future training. [60999]

Mr. Timms: Each Agency develops its own programme of training. They have always included in their programmes training for awareness of disabilities which has included awareness of the difficulties faces by partially-sighted and blind people. The profile of this training was raised when the Disability Discrimination Act 1996 came into force.

Although staff training in most of the Department's Agencies to assist partially-sighted or blind people is encompassed in their general disabilities training, for the future the Benefits Agency and Contributions Agency intend to commit themselves to the ten steps of the Charter "See It Right" issued by the Royal National Institute for the Blind.

Benefits (Means Testing)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those benefits not currently means-tested which will be means-tested in future as a result of the plans he has announced to date. [61423]

Mr. Timms: The proposals in the consultation documents "A new contract for welfare: Support for Disabled People" published on 28 October and "A new contract for welfare: Support in Bereavement" published on 18 November do not cause any benefit which has no current means testing to become means tested. Contributory benefits already contain long-standing rules which take some account of income. Our plans to take some account of occupational and personal pension income over £50 a week for future Incapacity Benefit claims are in line with previous practice in contribution-based Jobseeker's Allowance, and will strike a fairer partnership between State and private provision. No existing claimant at the point of change will be affected.

Benefits Agency Medicals

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the current arrangements are for assessing and paying travelling expenses of those attending Benefits Agency medicals; and what the previous arrangements were. [61190]

Angela Eagle: The administration of the Benefits Agency is a matter for its Chief Executive, Peter Mathison. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Ms Joan Walley, dated 1 December 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking about the current arrangements for assessing and paying travelling expenses of those attending Benefits Agency Medicals, and what were the previous arrangements.

The current arrangements are that a customer will be given the opportunity to complete a claim from for reimbursement of reasonable travelling expenses, incurred during their visit to the designated Medical Examination Centre, at the time of their medical examination. The claim form covers travelling costs incurred using agreed transport methods as well as car parking, subsistence and financial loss allowance where appropriate. Travel by private transport is paid at a standard rate per mile, whilst parking, bus, train and authorised taxis are also paid on production of a ticket or receipt.

Since the provision of Medical Services was contracted out to Sema Group on 1 September 1998, Sema Group Finance is now responsible for the central payment of claims whereas previously all customer's expenses were paid locally by Disability Benefit Centre's finance sections. They have also increased the number of ways a payment can be made. Previously there were two methods of payment, direct to a bank account and by girocheque. Since 1 September, in addition to the above methods, payment can be made by ordinary cheque, and a limited number of outlying Scottish examination centres have the facility to issue cash payments.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Invalid Care Allowance

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in North Staffordshire are in receipt of Invalid Care Allowance. [61189]

Mr. Timms: The administration of the Benefits Agency is a matter for its Chief Executive, Peter Mathison. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Ms Joan Walley, dated 1 December 1998:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people in North Staffordshire are in receipt of Invalid Care Allowance (ICA).

North Staffordshire is served by the Benefit Agency's (BA's) North Staffordshire District with offices situated in Hanley, Longton, and Newcastle-Under-Lyme. The District does not correspond to Constituency or Local Authority boundaries.

On 25 November 1998 The ICA's computer system identified 3,650 people receiving ICA in the area covered by the BA District. This figure is provisional and subject to change.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Pensioners (Means-tested Benefits)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the number of benefit units where (a) more than 25 per cent., (b) more than 50 per cent., (c) more than 75 per cent. and (d) 100 per cent. of the income from occupational and personal pensions is offset by reductions in entitlement to means-tested benefits. [60925]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 27 November 1998]: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

The number of benefit units where the income from an occupational pension is offset by reductions in entitlement to means-tested benefits

Estimated benefit units in each category at 1999–2000	Number
(a) more than 25 per cent. up to 50 per cent.	200,000
(b) more than 50 per cent. up to 75 per cent.	200,000
(c) more than 75 per cent. up to 100 per cent.	450,000
(d) 100 per cent.	300,000

Notes:

1. Figures are not available for personal pensions.
2. These figures relate to Income Support, Working Families Tax Credit, Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit only and are the estimated result of discounting occupational pension income entirely for the purposes of all benefit assessment.
3. Figures are rounded to the nearest 50,000 cases and are based upon the Department's Policy Stimulation Model of income-related benefits. This model draws data from the 1995–96 Family Resources Survey, uprated to 1999–2000 levels, and calibrates estimated income-related benefit results.
4. Estimates from household surveys based on reported income holdings are subject to differing levels of response. Consequently these figures should not be interpreted as precise point estimates, but rather as indicative only of broad magnitudes.

Centenarians

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what his policy is with regard to 100th birthday greetings; for what reasons he sends them; how his Department verifies the age of those claiming to be centenarians; what the cost is of such verification and delivering such 100th birthday greetings; and if he will make a statement. [61715]

Mr. Darling: Following the tradition of previous Secretaries of State for Social Security, a congratulatory message is sent to those receiving a Social Security benefit and celebrating their 100th birthday, 105th birthday and subsequent birthdays.

Verification of age is obtained from Departmental records and the cost of this which includes checks on the well being of the claimant is incorporated into normal running costs. The estimated cost of collating the information and sending each telemessage is approximately £7.60. For the period 1 January to 30 November 1998, 3,192 messages were sent.

Contributions Agency Computer

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects the NIRS 2 computer system at the Contributions Agency to be operational; and if he will make a statement. [61935]

Mr. Timms: I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave to the hon. Members for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) and for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) on 22 October 1998, Official Report, column 1187.

Lone Parents

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the reasons for the low number of initial interviews carried out under the New Deal for lone parents compared with the number of initial interviews requested. [62013]

Angela Eagle: The number of initial interviews carried out under the New Deal for Lone Parents is in line with expectations. Up to 23 October 1998, over 30,000 interviews had been booked and over 23,000 already carried out.

The initial contact letter sent to lone parents under the New Deal for Lone Parents is not a request for them to attend an interview[1]. Participation is voluntary and lone parents may choose to get in touch with a New Deal Personal Adviser when its suits their circumstances.

The report of the independent evaluation of the New Deal for Lone Parents, to be published next year, will include an examination of the reasons why some lone parents choose not to get in touch with a Personal Adviser when they receive an initial contact letter.

[1] Two of the eight prototype areas did experiment by sending out letters with a stated interview time and date; however, lone parents were advised that the programme was voluntary.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Vitamin and Mineral Supplements

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will announce the membership of the Ad Hoc Expert Advisory Group on Vitamin and Mineral Supplements. [61013]

Mr. Rooker: Details of the membership of the Expert Group on Vitamins and Minerals were given in my replies to my hon. Friend for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies) on 12 November 1998, Official Report, column 314, and my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman) on 7 May 1998, Official Report, columns 456–57. The only change from the information given in those replies is that Professor Woods has stood down from the Group.

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the guidance which he gave to the Ad Hoc Advisory Group on its terms of reference on vitamin and mineral supplements [61014]

Mr. Rooker: The Terms of Reference of the Expert Group on Vitamins and Minerals are to:

- establish principles on which controls for ensuring the safety of vitamins and mineral supplements sold under food law can be based;
- review the levels of individual vitamins and minerals associated with adverse effects;
- recommend maximum levels of intakes of vitamins and minerals from supplements if appropriate;
- report to the Food Advisory Committee.

The group will also be able to advise on the levels of vitamins and minerals in fortified foods, if it considers this is appropriate.

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure that the new Ad Hoc Advisory Group on Vitamin and Mineral Supplements has access to expert opinion from Europe and the USA. [61015]

Mr. Rooker: The Expert Group on Vitamins and Minerals will consider all relevant scientific information on the safety of vitamins and minerals through comprehensive searches of world-wide databases of information and by making a public call for interested parties to submit relevant information.

Pesticides

Mr. Flight: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to require that the testing of fruit and vegetable products at supermarkets against excessive concentrations of pesticides takes place at depots. [61179]

Mr. Rooker: I have no plan to change current arrangements. Fruit and vegetables and other commodities are tested for a range of pesticide residues as part of the Working Party on Pesticide Residues annual surveillance programme. This programme is designed to sample foods typically available to the consumer from a range of retail outlets across the United Kingdom. Every effort is made by the Working Party to ensure the integrity of both its sampling and analysis techniques. In directing the sampling technique the importance of checking carefully the origin of the produce is stressed to the samplers. It would not be practical to ask them to sample produce direct from supermarket depots.

Quarantine

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to reduce the quarantine period for pet animals from (a) North America and (b) Europe. [61478]

Mr. Rooker: The Advisory Group on Quarantine has recommended that quarantine should be replaced for cats and dogs leaving the UK and returning after visits to the European Union and European Economic area countries, and rabies free islands in the rest of the world; quarantine would also be replaced for cats and dogs entering the UK from such countries. Quarantine would be retained for cats and dogs coming into the UK from other countries. The Government are sympathetic to these recommendations.

The Advisory Group recommended that further consideration be given to the risks arising from allowing cats and dogs from North America into Great Britain without undergoing quarantine. This study is underway.

The Government will propose a specific way forward on the matters covered by the Advisory Group's report after the public consultation on the Advisory Group's recommendations ends on 31 December 1998.

Food Standards Agency

Mr. Luff: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he plans to publish the draft bill to establish the Food Standards Agency; and if he will make a statement. [61467]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 30 November 1998]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) on 25 November 1998, Official Report, column 10.

I shall make a further announcement in the light of discussions with colleagues.

Digestive Enhancers

Mr. Walter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the use of digestive enhancers in the poultry industry. [61890]

Mr. Rooker: There are currently five antimicrobial growth promoters permitted by EC legislation for use in poultry or chickens for fattening. They are bacitracin zinc, spiramycin, virginiamycin, flavophospholipol and avilamycin. The European Commission has proposed a ban on bacitracin zinc, spiramycin and virginiamycin with effect from 1 January 1999. The proposal is due to be considered in the Commission's Standing Committee on Animal Nutrition today.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Servants (Media Relations)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the rules governing relations with the media which apply to (a) special advisers, (b) press officers and (c) Government Information Service officials. [61620]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Guidance on relations with the media for all civil servants—including members of the Government Information and Communication Service and Special Advisers—is set out in "Guidance on the Work of the Government Information Service". Copies are in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Rowett Research Institute

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Scottish Office has (a) had direct or indirect involvement in the personnel and recruitment policies of the Rowett Research Institute and (b) made representations or recommendations to the Institute in relation to the early retirement or dismissal of staff. [61721]

Mr. Macdonald: The Rowett Research Institute employs staff under terms and conditions laid down by the Joint Negotiating and Consultative Committee of the Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council. The Scottish Office Agriculture, Environment and Fisheries Department, as the major funder of the Institute, has a limited involvement in the Institute's general policies on personnel, recruitment and retirement of staff, but that involvement does not extend to individual cases which are a matter for the Institute's Governing Body.

Private Finance Deals

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what monitoring he undertakes of the sale price achieved for land and capital assets transferred to private companies as part of private finance deals and then sold on. [61702]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 1 December 1998]: My Department does not maintain a central register of information on such disposals. It is the responsibility of the disposing public body to ensure that value for money is obtained. The National Audit Office as external auditor has authority to report to Parliament on the economy, efficiency and effectiveness of such contracts.

Non-domestic Rates

Mrs. McKenna: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what the non-domestic rate poundage for Scotland will be in 1999–2000. [62354]

Mr. Dewar: It will be 48.9p, the same as in England.

Trees

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact on indigenous species of trees of the import for planting of seeds of those same species. [61898]

Mr. Macdonald: Seed and planting stock of many indigenous tree species, including oak, have been imported into Britain from continental Europe for several centuries. Much of this material is well adapted to British conditions with the result that it can be very difficult to identify trees which are truly of native origin. Scientists are developing methods for identifying the origin of indigenous species. For example, analysis of the chemical constituents of native Scots pine has identified seven distinct areas of pine in Scotland.

Our advice to woodland owners reflects the importance of using suitable seed sources for planting trees in Britain, and particularly for regenerating and extending semi-natural woodlands. The UK Forestry Standard states that landowners should use suitable local provenances if they are available, and the Forestry Commission has published guidelines which emphasise the value of using natural regeneration or plants derived from local seed sources. The Commission is also drawing up a scheme to encourage foresters to grow planting stock from locally sourced indigenous species of trees and shrubs.

Lead Pipes

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to reintroduce a local authority programme to enable more domestic water lead pipes to be replaced. [61536]

Mr. Macdonald: Under the repairs grant system local authorities may give assistance at up to 90 per cent. of the cost of works to home owners replacing lead plumbing. It is for authorities to set their own budgets for repairs grants and decide the priority they give to lead pipe replacement. As regards council housing, it is for local authorities as landlords to determine their priorities for works to their own stock.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much has been spent by each Scottish council in grants for the replacement of lead water pipes in domestic property in the most recent years for which figures are available; and how much was spent by the previous district and islands councils for the last full year before these grants ceased to be ring-fenced. [61556]

Mr. Macdonald: This information is not held centrally.

Open Learning

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to support open learning courses as an alternative to existing training schemes. [61540]

Mr. Dewar: The Opportunity Scotland consultation paper, published in September set out the Government's commitment to the promotion of learning in all forms, throughout life, and detailed a number of initiatives which will be used for that purpose. Training courses are a particular form of learning and are complementary rather than alternative to any other forms.

Examinations

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to persuade professional bodies and the Scottish Higher Education Funding Council to co-operate in creating a single set of exams in each field which will satisfy both the professional body's and the universities' requirements. [61542]

Mrs. Liddell: Many professional bodies already recognise university courses for the purposes of entry to the professions and the whole are of higher education qualifications has recently been the subject of many recommendations by the Dearing and Garrick Committees. These include recommendations on the development of programme specifications and an integrated credit and qualification framework. The implementation of these recommendations should improve articulation between professional qualifications and degrees.

Water Charging

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total value of the water rates relief allowed to the various categories of properties entitled to it in the latest year for which figures are available. [61546]

Mr. Macdonald: The exact information requested is not held centrally and could be collected only at disproportionate cost. However, the water authorities estimate that the total value of reliefs given on water and sewerage charges in 1997–98 in Scotland was some £14 million.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide assistance to the water boards to enable them to change from a system of charges to commercial properties based on rateable value to one based on volume. [61548]

Mr. Macdonald: The water authorities are responsible for developing appropriate charging arrangements. Each of the authorities has recently completed consulting its non-domestic customers about proposals to alter the basis of charges to reflect more closely the level of services actually used rather than using rateable values as a proxy for use. Following this exercise the water authorities concluded that there is overall support in favour of a change to the charging basis. Each is now discussing the detailed implementation of changes for their area with Scottish Water and Sewerage Customers Council. Domestic properties are unaffected by this proposal.

Overall, the new arrangements will not alter the total income raised from the non-domestic sector, though its distribution amongst customers will be affected. The water authorities propose to phase in the changeover to ensure that individual chargepayers have sufficient time to adjust to the new arrangements.

Given that there will be no reduction in income to the water authorities and that the impact on chargepayers will be phased in, there is no case for giving financial assistance to the water authorities.

Domestic Sewerage

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will extend the domestic sewerage transitional relief beyond the three years originally specified. [61557]

Mr. Macdonald: The Government do not intend to extend domestic sewerage relief grant beyond the three year period initially envisaged.

Care in the Community

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what plans he has for an early review of Care in the Community funding levels; [61537]

(2) if he will ensure that funding levels for Care in the Community meet the economic charge per room which housing associations and other providers have to charge to meet the registration standards set for staffing, food and buildings and their loan charges. [61538]

Mr. Galbraith: Following our Comprehensive Spending Review on 14 July we announced substantial additional resources for Scottish Councils over the next 3 years. These include significant extra provision for community care. However, it is for each council to decide how to allocate its funds.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the expenditure on Care in the Community in each council area in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98; and what is budgeted for 1998–99. [61539]

Mr. Galbraith: Net council expenditure on Social Work excluding that implicitly on services for children is set out in the table.

Employment Creation

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to assist councils, universities, colleges and development and training agencies in the North East of Scotland to invest in employment creation in order to offset the future decline in the North Sea oil and gas industry. [61541]

Mr. Dewar: Economic development assistance to the area is channelled through Grampian Enterprise and the local authorities. Grampian Enterprise and the local councils have been working with the further and higher education institutions in the area to promote the diversification of the local economy to counteract job losses in the oil and gas industry.

Learning Difficulties

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will require councils to provide in-service training to train teachers to identify children with learning difficulties as quickly as possible and to adopt systems which achieve an early follow up in respect of each child identified. [61545]

Mrs. Liddell: The provision of in-service training for teachers is a matter for authorities to determine in the light of local needs and circumstances. We have no plans to change this arrangement.

The Government support authorities provision for in-service training of staff working with children with special educational needs through specific grant. From April 1999, Government resources available for special educational needs in-service staff development and training will more than double to £5 million per year.

Sewage Discharges

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact of the current system of licensing private and industrial sewage discharges by the Scottish Environmental Protection Agency on the Government's efforts to meet its pollution targets. [61547]

Mr. Macdonald: One of the targets which we set for the Scottish Environment Protection Agency was to improve the level of consent compliance for sewage and industrial discharges to 80 per cent. by 2001–02. A copy of the Agency's Annual Report 1997–98 has been placed in the Library of the Houses of Parliament. As mentioned in their report, the Agency achieved that level of compliance in 1997–98, four years ahead of target. The Agency are to be congratulated on this achievement. However, it is clear that a minority of SEPA's other targets were not met. This is certainly disappointing and we have asked the Agency how they intend to improve performance in these areas.

Millennium Experience

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussion he has had with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry regarding the Scottish contribution to the Millennium Experience. [62256]

Mr. Galbraith: Scottish Office officials are in close contact with officials of the New Millennium Experience Company in Scotland on the development of the Millennium Festival and the Millennium Experience in Scotland, and on the Scottish contribution to the Millennium Experience nationally.

Pesticide Tax

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received and what consultation he has undertaken regarding the imposition of a pesticide tax; what assessment he has made of the effects and levels of pesticide taxes in other European Union states; and what plans he has to introduce a pesticide tax. [61892]

Mr. Macdonald: In November 1997, the Government issued a consultation paper entitled 'Economic Instruments for Water Pollution'. One of the options on which the consultation paper sought views was a possible tax or charge on pesticides.

Research is currently underway into whether a tax or charge on pesticides would be an effective way to reduce pollution. There is evidence to suggest that pesticides have harmful effects on wildlife, terrestrial and aquatic ecosystems, and on human health. The Government are committed to minimising their use. The current research study is focusing on various design options for a tax or charge.

The Government will evaluate the findings of the research, and the results of other on-going work, in considering how best to proceed.

Decisions on the possible introduction of such a tax would be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

India

Mr. Singh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of India about sectarian atrocities committed against (a) Muslims, (b) Christians and (c) members of other minority communities. [61487]

Mr. Fatchett: We have made clear to the Indian authorities our concern over attacks on members of minority communities. During my meeting with the Indian Home Minister on 12 November I urged that steps be taken to restore the confidence of religious minorities in India.

British Consulate, Yemen

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has for the future of the British Consulate in Aden, Yemen; and if he will make a statement. [61476]

Mr. Fatchett: As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary stated in the House on 27 November 1998, Official Report, column 443, we have recently conducted a review of the network of British representation overseas and there will be no change in the present representation in Aden. However, we will continue to keep the network under review.

Comprehensive Spending Review

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the implications of the Government's Comprehensive Spending Review for the United Kingdom's diplomatic presence abroad. [61477]

Mr. Fatchett: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary described the outcome of the Comprehensive Spending Review (CSR) in his speech during the foreign affairs debate on 27 November 1998, Official Report, column 443. In essence, the uplift in the FCO budget will allow a significant programme of reform to modernise FCO operations world-wide. The aim is to adapt the network of overseas posts in response to changing priorities and to deploy staff and resources so as best to meet future objectives. 200 more members of the Diplomatic Service will be appointed; and 375 more staff in total.

The distribution of staff will reflect foreign policy priorities, particularly in commercial work. A further eight new overseas posts have been approved; commercial representation in China, Japan, India and Sweden will be strengthened; five Posts will close where the resources could be better deployed elsewhere. Britain's representation in the Caspian region will increase by 50 per cent., and be augmented significantly in member states of the EU and in countries aspiring to join the EU and NATO.

East Timor

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent military operations in the sub-district of Alas in East Timor. [61791]

Mr. Fatchett: We are concerned at reports of recent killings in Alas in East Timor. We are working closely with EU partners and others to establish the accuracy of the reports.

Ottawa Convention

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he (a) has had and (b) plans to have with the Government of the United States of America regarding the Ottawa Convention. [61828]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We regularly press the United States to sign the Ottawa Convention. I welcomed the American announcement in May that they would sign the Convention. We hope they will make every effort to do so soon.

Bulgaria

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from his Bulgarian counterpart concerning the visa requirement for Bulgarian nationals wishing to visit the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [61818]

Mr. Fatchett: The Bulgarian authorities have made regular representations to us about their inclusion on the EU Common Visa List, CVL. We have noted their concerns and explained that decision on the CVL are taken collectively by EU Member States acting on proposals made by the Commission.

Alcohol

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much was spent by his Department on the purchase of alcoholic drink in the United Kingdom in 1996–97. [61697]

Mr. Fatchett [holding answer 1 December 1998]: The information requested is not readily available.

Mordechai Vanunu

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the occasions on which the case of Mordechai Vanunu has been discussed with the Israeli Government. [62055]

Mr. Fatchett: We have raised Mr. Vanunu's case with the Israelis on many occasions. I did so during my last visit to Israel in January.

General Pinochet

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the meetings held with (a) General Pinochet and (b) his staff by the British Embassy in Santiago, Chile, in each of the past three years. [62057]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: In respect of meetings with Senator Pinochet while he was Commander-in-Chief of the Army, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 12 January 1998, Official Report, column 23. In the course of its normal work, the British Embassy in Santiago has had regular contact with the Chilean military, both before and since the Senator retired from the Army in March this year. Since the reply given in January, Embassy staff have had no meetings with the Senator or his private staff.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what official facilities were afforded to General Pinochet during his current visit to Britain. [62059]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: A VIP suite at Heathrow Airport was made available to General Pinochet on his arrival.

Diplomatic Posts

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his oral statement of 27 November 1998, Official Report, column 443, if he will list the five diplomatic posts he is closing. [62060]

Mr. Fatchett: The five diplomatic posts to be closed are: Chaing Mai (Thailand); Cleveland (USA); Kuching (Malaysia); Pusan (S. Korea); and Seville (Spain).

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on which date the consulate in Lyons will be closed. [62063]

Mr. Fatchett: The Consulate in Lyons will not be closing.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the diplomatic posts that he has expanded since 1 May 1997, indicating the (a) number and (b) grades of the diplomats in post (i) on 1 May 1997 and (ii) currently. [62061]

Mr. Fatchett: The posts which have seen a net increase in jobs between 1 May 1997 and 30 November 1998 are listed.

Post	1997	1998	Additions to the UK establishment
Abuja	7.00	10.00	DS9, S2, S0

Between those two dates there was an overall reduction in our UK based manpower, so a greater number of slots were deleted elsewhere to provide these additions. It would be disproportionately expensive to list all of the grades of all the diplomats in post between these times.

Foreign Office Properties

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all (a) overseas and (b) UK properties (i) owned by his Department and (ii) leased. [62064]

Mr. Fatchett: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office occupies the following properties in the United Kingdom.

Owned	Leased
Old Admiralty Building, London SW1	1 Palace Street, London SW1
Old Public Offices, King Charles Street, London SW1	Cromwell House, London SW1
22–24 Whitehall, London SW1	4 Matthew Parker Street, London SW1
Hanslope Park, Buckinghamshire	Apollo House, Croydon
Creslow, Buckinghamshire (Wireless Station)	8 Cleveland Row, London SW1
Gawcott, Buckinghamshire (Wireless Station)	1 Carlton Gardens, London SW1
Poundon, Buckinghamshire (Wireless Station)	20 Victoria Street, London SW1

To provide the information requested on overseas properties would at present involve a disproportionate expenditure of public funds. However, the Department has recently acquired an electronic property data base which will soon be operational. I shall write to the hon. Member shortly with the information requested and shall place copies of the letter int he Libraries of the House.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his oral statement of 27 November 1998, Official Report, column 443, if he will list his Department's (a) owned and (b) leased properties that are being sold. [62062]

Mr. Fatchett: All FCO properties are being reviewed against a set of Key Performance Indicators designed to assess their fitness for purpose, the returns they offer on capital and the costs of alternative provision. Properties proposed for sale include the Ambassador's house in Dublin, the Embassy in Bonn and the former Consulate in Casablanca.

Iran

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representation he has made to Iran concerning (a) the six Baha'is who are under sentence of death, (b) the persecution of members of the Baha'i faith and (c) the recent execution of Mr. Ruhu'llah Rawhani. [62065]

Mr. Fatchett: We have on many occasions raised with the Iranians our desire for an improvement in their human rights record, not least with regard to the plight of the Baha'i community. An EU Troika of Heads of Mission in Tehran (UK, Austrian Presidency, and Germany) called on the Iranian Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) on 4 October to press the Iranian Government on the cases of Mr. Dhabihi-Moqaddam and Mr. Najafbadi, two Iranian Baha'is who had death sentences confirmed at the end of September. They were informed that both men had been convicted for acting against national security, but that the sentences were subject to review by the Supreme Court. Even if the Supreme Court upheld the sentences, that would not necessarily be final. Representatives of a number of other countries have also made similar representations to the Iranians.

We are aware of further arrests of Baha'is in Iran, and continue to look into these. We are determined to impress upon the Iranians the seriousness with which their behaviour is viewed by all EU countries. The plight of the Baha'is formed a prominent part of the EU-sponsored UN human rights resolution on Iran, adopted on 18 November.

We were very disturbed by the execution of Mr. Rawhani in July. The FCO Regional Director for the Middle East, summoned the Iranian Chargé on 28 July to protest. I myself saw Barney Leith, Secretary-General for the National Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is in the UK on 5 August to express the Government's condolences about the execution of Mr. Rawhani and to discuss what more we could do to maintain international pressure on the Iranian Government to end the discrimination against the Baha'i community. Later that same day I tackled the Iranian Chargé on Mr. Rawhani's execution. I also warned him that we would be strong in our condemnation if there were further executions. The EU also reacted, including by a formal demarche to the Iranian Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Tehran on 5 August. Some EU partners followed our example by summoning local Iranian diplomatic representatives to protest.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Rural Areas (Access to Justice)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps the Welsh Office is taking to increase access to justice for people living in rural areas in Wales. [61473]

Mr. Hoon: The Lord Chancellor's Department is proposing to create a Community Legal Service, which will improve access to good quality legal and advice services for those with the greatest need. This will be achieved by greater local planning of legal and advice services and co-ordination of funding through Community Legal Service Partnerships between local authorities, the Legal Aid Board and other significant funders. This will be particularly important to rural communities, as the inconsistent geographic coverage of legal and advice services impacts disproportionately in rural areas.

The Lord Chancellor's Department also wishes to see the facilities at some magistrates' courts improved where these may be substandard, but—as section 56 of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997 sets out—decisions about the location and number of courthouses and offices are the responsibility of the relevant magistrates' courts committees in consultation with their paying authorities. The Lord Chancellor's Department will become involved only when a paying authority appeals against an MCC's determination.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will take steps to halt the closure of (a) magistrates' and (b) county council courts in the rural areas of Wales. [61474]

Mr. Hoon: Magistrates' courts are locally managed by magistrates' courts committees under the provisions of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997. Decisions concerning the location and number of magistrates' courts in their area are for the relevant magistrates' courts committee to determine. A local authority that contributes financially may appeal to the Lord Chancellor against a proposed closure. The procedure for such appeals is set out in section 56 of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997. In the absence of an appeal, however, the Lord Chancellor plays no part in the process.

The Court Service is responsible for all civil and the higher criminal courts and is required constantly to monitor and review the viability of its court network. Factors taken into consideration include the role played by the court in providing a service to the public in that area, and the effect and implications of providing an alternative for its current users. The criteria for considering the case for and against closure as set out in the Departmental Accommodation Plan are: the condition of the existing accommodation; the availability of facilities; the frequency of judicial visits and waiting times; the facilities provided by the alternative court; and the capacity of that court to cater for the additional work; and distances and public transport considerations. In general, the Court service must look to improve services to an area overall.

DEFENCE

Newsletters

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the current security classifications of the newsletters produced for the staff of (a) the Pay and Personnel Agency and (b) the Duke of York's Royal Military School; how often each newsletter is produced; and when each newsletter was first produced. [62043]

Mr. Spellar: This is a matter for the Chief Executives of the agencies concerned. I have asked the Chief Executives to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from G. H. Wilson to Mr. Matthew Taylor, dated 3 December 1998:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about newsletters to staff as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Duke of York's Royal Military School.

The current security classification of newsletters produced for the staff is "unclassified".

Newsletters were first produced for staff, parents and pupils in December 1992 and are produced once per school term. In addition Staff Bulletins have been in production at the school for many decades and these are produced once a week.

Letter from Mike Rowe to Mr. Matthew Taylor, dated 3 December 1998:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about newsletters as this falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Pay & Personnel Agency.

The Agency produces an unclassified newsletter, the "NewsPayPer". It was first produced in July 1996 and there have been 9 quarterly issues since.

Research Papers

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many series of research papers his Department produces; and what are the names of each of these series of research papers. [62041]

Mr. Spellar: A very large number of research papers are produced by the staff of Ministry of Defence research establishments and most such papers are in the public domain and not classified. Publication of research papers is the individual responsibility of the research establishments and sectors within them. Details of series of research papers are not held centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Protection of Wrecks Act 1973

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the procedures for enforcement of the Protection of Wrecks Act 1973, indicating the steps salvers should take to initiate enforcement action. [60864]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Responsibility for policing or prosecuting offences under the Protection of Wrecks Act 1973 lies with the relevant police force and the Crown Prosecution Service. My Department is happy to assist the police in any matters relating to the 1973 Act, whenever necessary. Steps are being taken to remind relevant police forces of their responsibilities under the 1973 Act, and of the designated wreck sites within their area of responsibility.

Any individual who suspects that illegal diving may be taking place on a designated wreck site should, in the first instance, contact their local police constabulary whose responsibility it is to take the necessary steps to investigate the allegations. My Department would also wish to be kept informed of such incidents and will provide advice as necessary.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement about the actions of and communications between his Department and the Devon and Cornwall police in the week commencing 5 October 1998, regarding the designated site at Salcombe and the complaint made to them under the Protection of Wrecks Act 1973. [60865]

Mr. Alan Howarth: My officials were in telephone contact with the Devon and Cornwall Police three times on Wednesday 7 October to discuss the situation on the Salcombe Cannon designated wreck site. As a result of the telephone conversation, a letter was faxed to the Police at 3.15pm on Wednesday 7 October, setting out the legal provisions of the Protection of Wrecks Act 1973. A copy of the licence for the site, detailing the individuals authorised to dive on it, was also faxed to the Police, at their request, on the afternoon of Wednesday 7 October. A further telephone call was made to the Police on Friday 9 October to obtain an update on the situation.

Royal Parks Agency

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) if he will provide a breakdown of the running costs of the Royal Parks Agency (a) by area of responsibility and (b) by Royal Park in each year since 1993; [60973]

(2) how many people were employed by the Royal Parks Agency to maintain (a) Hyde Park and (b) Regent's Park in each year since 1993; [60892]

(3) how many people employed by the Royal Parks Agency in each year since 1993 were paid (a) £0 to £10,000, (b) £10,000 to £20,000, (c) £20,000 to £30,000, (d) £30,000 to £40,000, (e) £40,000 to £50,000 and (f) £50,000 and above. [60891]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 27 November 1998]: Responsibility for the subject of these questions has been delegated to the Royal Parks Agency under its Chief Executive, Mr. David Welch. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Viviane Robertson to Mr. Richard Ottaway, dated 3 December 1998:

In the absence of the Chief Executive, Mr. David Welch, the Secretary of State for Culture Media and Sport has asked me to reply to your parliamentary questions concerning staffing levels and costs in the Royal Parks.

Breakdown of the running costs of the Royal parks Agency by area of responsibility and by Royal Park in each year since 1993

	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98

Headquarters	1,308	1,310	1,428	1,730	1,500

Note:
These figures represent net running costs ie: less receipts. A further breakdown of Headquarters costs is not available

To ask the Secretary of State for Culture Media and Sport, how many people were employed by the Royal parks Agency to maintain Hyde park and Regent's Park in each year since 1993.

From 1993–94 to 1996–97 the Agency employed 12 non-uniformed staff to maintain Hyde park and 8 staff to maintain Regent's park. Since 1997–98 these numbers have been reduced to 8 and 6 respectively. I regret we are unable to confirm the number of police officers in these two parks, as we do not keep historical records of numbers of police officers on a park by park basis.

To ask the Secretary of State of State for Culture Media and Sport, how many people employed by the Royal Parks Agency in each year since 1993 were paid in (a) £0 to £10,000, (b) 10,000 to £20,000, (c) £20,00 to £30,000, (d) £30,000 to £40,000, (e) £40,00 to £50,000 and (f) £50,000 and above.

We are unable to provide a breakdown of the numbers of staff paid in bands below £30,000.

English National Stadium

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) if he will ensure that the new English National Stadium will be held in trust for the nation in perpetuity by the English National Stadium Trust; [61435]

(2) if the FA and the English National Stadium Developments Company will continue to be bound by the contractual terms of the grant from the English Sports Council following repayments of that grant; [61433]

(3) when the development proposal for the new National Stadium will be submitted to the appropriate planning authority; [61432]

(4) what redress will be available to the English National Stadium Trust in the event that the FA and the English National Stadium Development Company break the terms of the grant from the English Sports Council; [61434]

(5) if he will make a statement on his policy regarding attempts to sell a share of the freehold interests in the new English National Stadium; [61436]

(6) when he expects the sale of the Wembley Stadium site to the English National Stadium Trust's Development Company to be concluded; [61431]

(7) what plans he has to grant a long lease of the new National Stadium to the English National Stadium Trust. [61437]

Mr. Banks: The planning application for the National Stadium is a matter for the English National Stadium Development Company (ENSDC) in consultation with the London Borough of Brent, as planning authority. The present anticipated timetable for submitting a planning application is Spring/Summer 1999, although ENSDC are known to be reviewing the position. The English Sports Council (ESC) included milestone dates on planning issues as conditions of the Lottery award to ensure the project moves ahead on a reasonable timetable.

In the event of a breach of the conditions of the Lottery award, the ESC has the right to seek repayment. It is a condition of the Lottery award that the freehold interest cannot be sold. The site acquisition is still under discussion between the applicants and Wembley Plc. The site purchase arrangements are subject to strict Stock Exchange rules on disclosure. Following the acquisition, it is intended that the English National Stadium Trust will hold a 999 year lease for the stadium site. The principal lottery award conditions will apply for 50 years, even if the award is repaid, to ensure that the stadium meets its objectives throughout this period.

As these are detailed matters relating to a Lottery award, I have also written to my hon. Friend proposing he receives a briefing from the ESC on the National Stadium project.

TREASURY

Business Taxation

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures have been proposed by the European Commission to reduce harmful tax competition; and if he will make a statement. [61883]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 1 December 1998]: On 1 December 1997, based on a Commission proposal the ECOFIN Council acknowledged the positive effects of fair competition and the need for a Code of Conduct for business taxation designed to list harmful tax measures.

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the effect of EU tax harmonisation proposals on British business. [61308]

Dawn Primarolo: Decisions in this area are subject to unanimity. We have made it clear that we will not agree to any course of action which is not in Britain's national economic interest.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy to seek to end harmful tax competition within the European Union; what his policy is on determining what types of tax competition are harmful; and if he will make a statement. [61065]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 30 November 1998]: The Government are in favour of effective international action to combat harmful tax practices. The Government support the work of the Code of Conduct Group which under my Chairmanship has been reviewing measures which may be considered harmful under the criteria set out in the Code of Conduct on business taxation.

Tax Policy

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy to switch the tax burden away from taxes on labour to taxes on capital; and if he will make a statement. [61069]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 30 November 1998]: The Government's tax policy objectives are set out in paragraphs 1.66 to 1.69 of the July 1997 Financial Statement and Budget Report.

Anglo-German Working Party

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his plans for an Anglo-German working party on job creation and economic reform. [61062]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 30 November 1998]: When the Chancellor met the new German Finance Minister, Herr Lafontaine, on Thursday 19 November, they agreed that we should look together at what more we can do to promote job creation and economic reform in our economies. Both Governments will work closely, including through a joint working group, to examine the policies we are pursuing and how we can learn from each other.

Energy Conservation

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what approaches he has made to the European Commission since the spring Budget regarding VAT in the United Kingdom on energy conservation materials and supplies. [62038]

Ms Hewitt: Under the UK Presidency Environment Ministers of Member States reached agreement that the Council should invite the European Commission to consider proposals for differentiation in tax levels for energy saving products. The Financial Secretary has also written directly to Commissioner Monti putting forward the case for change.

Sterling

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in how many weeks the pound has been (a) within, (b) above and (c) below the exchange rate mechanism target since 1 January 1997. [62300]

Ms Hewitt: Sterling is not a member of the ERM and the Government have no intention of joining. The Government do not have a target for sterling but aim for a stable and competitive exchange rate over the medium term, consistent with the objective of price stability.

Developing Countries (Debt)

Mr. Reed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what restrictions are placed upon the Government's ability to act independently of other creditors to reduce debt owed by developing countries by (i) the European Union,

(ii) the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and (iii) other international organisations or agreements. [61491]

Ms Hewitt: The UK is not restricted in acting unilaterally to reduce debt owed by developing countries by either the EU, the OECD or any other international agreements.

However, lasting solutions to the problems of heavily indebted poor countries require a multilateral effort. Since the UK holds only a part of the total debt owed by these countries, it cannot by itself reduce their debts to sustainable levels. That is why the UK has been making such efforts in international forums to ensure that all creditors co-operate in giving poor countries a permanent solution to their debt burdens.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to cancel the debt owed to the United Kingdom Government by Nicaragua and Honduras; and if he will make a statement on discussions with other creditors on assistance to Nicaragua and Honduras. [61496]

Ms Hewitt: The UK wrote off all of its loans to Honduras and Nicaragua long before Hurricane Mitch struck. Following the devastation caused to these countries last month, the Chancellor decided that Nicaragua and Honduras need make no debt service payments to ECGD over the next two years. The issue of a moratorium is to be discussed at the Paris Club of official bilateral creditors next week.

The Chancellor wrote to the International Financial Institutions—the IMF, World Bank and Inter-American Development Bank—calling on them to look at possible mechanisms for lessening the debt service obligations of Honduras and Nicaragua, and has taken these proposals forward with his G7 and EU colleagues.

Mr. Reed: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will urge the IMF to sell gold reserves in order to pay for the immediate suspension of debt service payments to the international institutions by Nicaragua and Honduras. [61494]

Ms Hewitt: The UK Government support, and have been pressing for, the sale of a proportion of the IMF gold reserves to provide financing for the HIPC initiative. The UK will continue to press for gold sales in the IMF Executive Board. Gold sales require the approval of the Executive Board by a majority of 85 per cent., and we are therefore working closely with other members at the IMF to secure Board approval.

Petroleum Products (Cross-border Smuggling)

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the impact on the rate of economic growth in Northern Ireland of the smuggling of petroleum products from Irish Republic; and if he will make a statement. [61924]

Ms Hewitt: HM Customs and Excise has no estimates for the impact on the rate of economic growth in Northern Ireland of such activity.

Petroleum Products (Duty)

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on how many litres of (a) road gasoline and (b) road diesel fuel duty was paid in each quarter of (i) 1996, (ii) 1997 and (iii) 1998 to date. [61922]

Ms Hewitt: Deliveries of Petrol and Diesel of all types:

These figures are for the whole of the UK. Customs does not keep separate figures for any regions.

Construction Industry

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect which the 11-week limit to casual employment has had on small employers in the construction industry. [61911]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I have been asked to reply.

I assume that my hon. Friend refers to the 13-week qualifying period for the entitlement to paid annual leave under the Working Time regulations. There was no specific assessment on applying this entitlement to casual workers, and specifically the ramifications for small employers in the construction industry. An assessment for the whole of British industry was made, a copy of which is held in the Library.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Hinduja Group

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what grant applications her Department has received from the Hinduja group of companies since 1 May 1997; and what grants have been paid. [62241]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development has received no grant applications from the group and has paid no grants to it.

Hurricane Mitch

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her plans are for further assistance to Central America in the aftermath of Hurricane Mitch. [62674]

Clare Short: An assessment mission from DFID visited Honduras and Nicaragua on 23–28 November. They had an extensive programme of field visits to disaster affected areas and discussions with Governments,

UN agencies, the Inter-American Development Bank and World Bank, Red Cross and NGOs, EC and other donors. Our findings and conclusions are as follows:

Situation Assessment

Consolidated estimates of damage confirm that Honduras is, by far, the worst affected country. Some 20,000 are dead and missing, 285,000 displaced and overall about 1.4 million (out of a total population of 6.1 million) affected. The physical devastation is widespread, affecting 14 out of 18 administrative departments: 60 per cent. of roads and bridges, 50 per cent. of agricultural production (including a fifth of the economically important coffee and nearly all the banana export crops), 80 per cent. of water distribution networks, 70 per cent. of hospitals, 12 per cent. of health centres, and 25 per cent. of schools are destroyed or severely damaged. The effects of the disaster, still starkly visible a month later, are reflected most obviously in disrupted access and basic utilities. Groups of destitute families are living under ramshackle and insanitary conditions wherever they can find shelter.

In Nicaragua damage to infrastructure has been more moderate though still significant in five departments (Pacific coast and the north). Overall, some 3,000 are dead and missing, and 370,000 (out of a total population of 4.5 million) severely affected. But, in contrast to Honduras, the physical effects and human impact are less evident a month later.

The mission did not visit El Salvador (population 5.8 million, 475 killed/missing, 84,000 affected) and Guatemala (population 10.9 million, 400 killed/missing, 105,000 affected) but reports suggest substantially less damage. In both countries, agricultural losses appear to be more significant than infrastructure damage (except in particular pockets).

Assessment of disaster response

In both Honduras and Nicaragua, a striking feature has been the self-help efforts of the communities themselves, reflecting the strong regional tradition of community solidarity. Most lives were saved and vulnerable people helped by indigenous efforts as the physical disruption of the hurricane and floods meant that it took time for outside help to arrive. The strength of local government was a key factor in enabling good local mobilisation.

The most effective external life-saving interventions appear to have been carried out by the military (both national and foreign forces). However, there are lessons to be drawn in terms of the efficiency and effectiveness of tasking and military/civil co-operation. The Governments of Honduras and Nicaragua also responded effectively.

Co-ordination in both countries presents a mixed picture. However it is important to recognise the practical constraints (especially in Honduras) and the burden placed by outside organisations rushing in. The UN-coordinated needs assessment process was crucial and reached credible conclusions. The UN Diaster Assessment and Co-ordination (UNDAC) mechanism of OCHA was also useful and appropriately deployed in support of the in-country UN Resident Co-ordinator. Inter-agency co-operation within the UN system appears to have been satisfactory. But overall, the UN could have been more assertive in terms of providing guidance and "gate-keeping", and donors more conscientious—and less competitive—in deferring to UN co-ordination.

The EC through ECHO, has disbursed funds for immediate relief through NGOs working in the region, and is planning an extensive reconstruction package. In the Development Council on 30 November, I emphasised the importance of co-ordinating this with the wider international assistance effort. We intend to work closely with the EC to ensure that its assistance is disbursed as effectively as possible.

International NGOs have also made useful contributions. The best work is being done by agencies already established on the ground. They are able to mobilise existing systems and structures and draw on the local knowledge and trust they have built up. This contrasts with the many diaster relief organisations that have flocked to the region and have had difficulty in finding a meaningful niche while possibly creating additional problems for their hosts (for example overburdening internal transport systems).

Impact of DFID humanitarian assistance

Britain was among the fastest in delivery relief on the ground. In the immediate aftermath of the hurricane, a total of about £1 million was granted by DFID to NGOs (CAFOD, CARE, Christian Aid, Del Campo farmers co-operative, Food for the Hungry, IRC, Tear Fund), the International Federation of Red Cross, the Pan American Health Organisations, and the Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Assistance (OCHA). The geographical distribution of funding to date is about £370,000 for Honduras, £390,000 for Nicaragua, £15,000 for El Salvador, and £200,000 for regional use to benefit all four countries. Most of our grants have been disbursed very rapidly and transformed into urgently needed benefits for an estimated 0.5 million people. These include provision of emergency shelter, clothing, blankets and household goods, water supplies, health care, seeds and other agricultural inputs.

Forward strategy

Immediate disaster relief needs have been largely met except perhaps for the most isolated communities. Planning for the longer-term needs of reconstruction is progressing but it will be at least six months before we see real progress. Meanwhile, there is a transition period in which continued humanitarian assistance is necessary. Survivors—especially those who are displaced—remain vulnerable to disease in the absence of safe water and disruption of health services. Food security can be promoted if inputs are made in time for the current planting season. If primary schooling is not restored, vulnerable children may drop out permanently from education. The solution to meeting these urgent needs is, as has been demonstrated already, by supporting successful community efforts, in close conjunction with socially responsive local municipal authorities, in a way that kick starts local economies. But one very serious constraint—especially in Honduras—is the continued lack of access to poor communities because of disrupted roads. Without tackling this very little else is possible, and vulnerability will increase as people's reserves run out.

The UN is about to launch a "Transitional Appeal" for the period December 1998 to May 1999. This should provide a good framework of priorities. Our own further transitional humanitarian assistance, over the next six months, will enable people—especially the poor who have been left completely destitute by the disaster—to survive and cope, while seeking to establish the basis for sustainable recovery.

In the light of this, I have decided that, during this transitional period, we will provide further humanitarian assistance of £3 million allocated according to the relative needs of the affected countries. This will include:

- In Honduras, a programme of emergency repairs and rehabilitation to secondary (rural) roads, including essential small bridges; and also a public works programme ("cash for work") targeting particularly neglected municipalities. This would benefit poor families by creating short-term local employment while also generating much needed social benefits through the rehabilitation of essential community infrastructure, and injecting cash into local economies.

- In Nicaragua support for UNICEF's emergency programmes to repair water and sanitation infrastructure and to restore primary health and education services for diaster affected communities.

- On a regional basis, support for a WHO/PAHO programme within the national health authorities of the four Central American countries, especially in the area of epidemiological surveillance and epidemic control.

- Support for UNDP's function of inter-agency co-ordination through the Offices of the UN Resident/Humanitarian Co-ordinators in all affected countries.

Longer Term

We are also working on plans to respond to longer term needs. We have already committed £6 million for Central America over the next two years. We are now re-focusing this to take account of reconstruction needs. We are also taking forward the proposals on debt relief which the Chancellor and I announced on 7 November.

Learning the lessons

Given the magnitude of the disaster and the complexity of the international and national response efforts, there are many lessons to be learned to improve disaster preparedness in developing countries. We shall be pursuing these in the context of a UN-led lessons learnt exercise planned for February 1999.

SCOTLAND

Independent Tribunal Service

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people in Scotland had been waiting for more than (a) three, (b) six, (c) 12 and (d) 18 months for a response from an Independent Tribunal Service appeal, in the year ended 31 August (a) 1998 and (b) 1997. [61918]

Angela Eagle: I have been asked to reply.

The information is not available in the form requested. Such information as is available is in the tables.

Appeals—Data supplied by Analytical Services Division (ASD) from the computer extracts from the Independent Tribunal Service (ITS).

The Government are committed to reducing the unacceptable delays in handling welfare appeals, new arrangements for decision making and appeals will be introduced next year and will provide a more responsive and efficient service for appellants.

We will set stringent, effective targets for the clearance of appeals when the new arrangements are introduced.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Teachers (Trade Unions)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the trade unions representing teaching staff with which his Department has dealings. [62025]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Department has dealings with the following trade unions representing teaching staff:

Association of Teachers and Lecturers

Association of University Teachers

National Association of Head Teachers

National Association of Schoolmasters Union of Women Teachers

National Association for Teachers in Further and Higher Education

National Union of Teachers

Professional Association of Teachers

Secondary Heads Association

Undeb Cenedlaethol Athrawon Cymru/National Association of the Teachers of Wales.

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many hours were spent in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools by teachers on permitted trade union activities in each of the last three years for which figures are available. [62028]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This information is not collected centrally.

Literacy and Numeracy

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the ranking of the UK has been in standard international comparative tables for literacy and numeracy in each of the last five years. [62026]

Ms Estelle Morris: We are not aware of any standard annual comparative tables for literacy and numeracy. However, the Third International Mathematics and Science Study (TIMSS), carried out in 1995, found that in mathematics England's 9 year olds came 10th out of 17 countries; and our 13 year olds came 16th out of 25 countries. In the International Adult Literacy Survey (IALS), carried out in 1996, British adults came 9th out of the 12 countries for which results are so far available.

This Government are determined to raise standards in schools and also take the issue of basic skills very seriously. That is why we have established the National Literacy and Numeracy Strategies which are designed to raise standards to the level of the best. In addition to the wide range of current adult learning opportunities, the Government have set a target in The Learning Age to help 500,000 people a year by 2002.

Ministerial E-mail Address

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is his e-mail address. [62562]

Mr. Mudie: The e-mail address for my right hon. Friend and other Ministers in his Department is: http://dfee.ministers@dfee.gov.uk

Class Sizes

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if, where a child is admitted in the final term, as an agreed exception under the Regulations of the School Standards and Framework to a reception infant class that already has 30 pupils, it will be mandatory to reduce the class size maximum to 30 in the following year; and what advice local education authorities will be given on compliance with the legislation. [61824]

Ms Estelle Morris: There are two general sets of circumstances in which a child will be treated as an excepted pupil and not count towards the infant class size limit of 30 pupils for every qualified teacher, to apply from the start of the 2001–2002 school year—

(1) where a child is admitted to the school in certain specified circumstances that could not have been anticipated in planning, for example where he moves into the area outside a normal admission round and cannot find a place at any other suitable school; and

(2) where a child, who is normally educated in a special school or in a unit in a mainstream school for children with Special Educational Needs (SEN), attends a mainstream class.

The first set of exceptions applies only for the remainder of the school year in which the child was first admitted—even where the child was admitted during the final term of that year. The second set of exceptions enables those pupils to gain the benefit of attending mainstream classes and will be permitted beyond the school admission year—at any time when those pupils attend the infant classes at the mainstream school or outside the special unit. Thus it will only be mandatory to reduce the class size maximum to 30 in the following year if the exception is one within the first group.

On 9 September 1998, the Department for Education and Employment sent guidance (and copies of the relevant Regulations) on the class sizes legislation to all local education authorities in England.

Communications Technology

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what research his Department has commissioned into the effect of studying information communications technology on developing children's ability in other subjects; and if he will make a statement. [62114]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In recent years the Department has commissioned a range of relevant studies and evaluations. These include

The Impact of IT on Children's Achievements (1992)

Preparing for the Information Age (1997)

The UK ILS Evaluations (1998).

As part of the National Grid for Learning, the Department will be initiating further studies in the development and use of ICT within the curriculum.

In addition, the Teacher Training Agency has commissioned a major research study into effective pedagogy for the use of Information and Communications Technologies (ICT) in literacy and numeracy in primary schools.

Art and Music

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what research his Department has commissioned into the effect of art and music lessons in developing children's ability in other subjects; and if he will make a statement. [62113]

Ms Estelle Morris: My Department has not commissioned any research into the effect of art and music lessons on children's ability in other subjects. This Government believe that art and music are essential parts of every child's education. That is why music and art remain National Curriculum foundation subjects which must be taught by all schools as part of a broad and balanced curriculum.

School Organisation Plans

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment by whom the funding for any public inquiry held by an adjudicator to determine the outcome of proposals for a school organisation plan will be provided. [62306]

Ms Estelle Morris: Where an Adjudicator wishes to hold a public inquiry, or is required to do so in respect of school organisation proposals published by the Secretary of State, the cost of that inquiry will be met by the Department for Education and Employment. The Local Education Authority or school concerned will be invited to offer accommodation for the inquiry.

Teachers (Vacancies)

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many teacher vacancies there were in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools at the latest date for which information is available by each local education authority. [62304]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is shown in the table.

Form 618G survey January 1998

School Standards

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects to appoint adjudicators under section 25 of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998; and if he will publish the job description for such adjudicators. [62305]

Ms Estelle Morris: We will announce the appointment of adjudicators in the New Year. The posts were advertised in the Summer. Those who expressed an interest were sent a copy of the job description and person specification, which is as follows.

School organisation and admissions adjudicators

The job

The School Standards and Framework Bill, currently before Parliament, provides for decisions on changes to school organisation (opening, closing, enlarging and changing the character of schools) to be taken at local level by a School Organisation Committee, established by, but independent of the local authority. The Bill also provides for the Secretary of State to appoint adjudicators to consider cases where the School Organisation Committee is unable to reach a decision. The Bill also establishes new arrangements for agreeing school admissions arrangements at local level and provides for complaints about admissions arrangements to be referred to the adjudicator for resolution.

The adjudicator will consider and decide cases, usually on paper, taking account of the views both of those proposing change and those objecting to it. There will be guidance from the Secretary of State on issues that adjudicators will wish to take into consideration. In the case of admissions there will be a statutory Code of Practice. Adjudicators will be empowered to hold a local public inquiry into any case and will be required to do so if any proposals are made by the Secretary of State. Further background information is contained in the attached documents.

The Secretary of State proposes to appoint about 20 adjudicators initially, for two or three years. Adjudicators will be allocated cases on the basis of their availability—and where appropriate on the basis of geographical location. We expect that adjudicators will work from home. Adjudicators will be paid £270 per day plus expenses for any day on which they are required to consider cases. The Secretary of State will provide other facilities as necessary and administrative support, which will be located in Darlington. It is difficult to assess loading at this stage, but an adjudicator might be called upon on between 60 and 120 days each year. There are likely to be seasonal pressures, particularly in considering admissions issues, around Easter.

The first appointment will be of a lead adjudicator whose role would be to secure effective and efficient adjudication by:

(a) developing procedures and processes through some experience of adjudicating and through discussion with other adjudicators;

(b) seeking efficient use of resources through guidance on practical issues such as conduct of considerations and writing of decisions;

(c) seeking to support the consistent application of procedures through peer review—but not reviewing decisions once made. (The provision for appeal against adjudicators' decisions is judicial review);

(d) convening and chairing training conferences;

(e) undertaking appraisal of adjudicators, which would inform a decision on re-appointments or potentially on the allocation of cases;

(f) advising on recruitment and appointment;

(g) the publication of an annual report;

(h) providing one voice for the adjudication service with whom Ministers could discuss concerns.

But we do not envisage that the lead adjudicator will have a heavier adjudication load than any other adjudicator. The lead adjudicator will also be a part-time appointee, but will be paid £300 a day, and would be guaranteed work for 125 days per year.

Interviews for candidates for appointment as lead adjudicator will be held in September, with a view to the appointee taking up post as soon as possible thereafter. Other interviews for adjudicators will be held in the late Autumn.

Person Specification

The role of an adjudicator will be a challenging one. It is essential that adjudicators have credibility with both the local and education communities, derived from their experience, independence and impartiality.

Adjudicators must be able to keep an objective perspective, weigh competing arguments, and be accepted for their ability to do so.

We envisage that successful applicants will have experience of education or education planning at a senior level, for example as a senior education officer; a headteacher or an HMI.

For the lead adjudicator, in addition to the above, the successful applicant will have experience of senior management in large organisation, for example as a Chief Education Officer.

EU Youth Affairs Council

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Youth Affairs Council meeting on 26 November. [62772]

Mr. Mudie: I attended the Council of Youth Ministers in Brussels on 26 November.

The Council agreed unanimously a resolution proposed by the Presidency encouraging the Community and member states to involve young people in decision-making at all levels. The Council also discussed the Commission's proposal for a Community youth action programme from the year 2000 but was unable to reach an agreed common position.

Secondary School Teachers

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many graduates from (a) Oxford, (b) Cambridge, (c) London, (d) Warwick and (e) Sussex universities have been employed as secondary school teachers in grant maintained schools in (i) 1990, (ii) 1995 and (iii) the last year for which there are records. [62376]

Mr. Charles Clarke: This information is not held centrally.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Boards of Visitors

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received a copy of the Annual report for 1997 by the National Advisory Council for the Boards of Visitors of England and Wales. [62676]

Mr. Straw: I was presented with a copy of the National Advisory Council for the Boards of Visitors of England and Wales' Annual Report for 1997, by its Chairman Mrs. Ruth Draycott OBE JP on 18 August 1998.

I have asked my noble Friend the Minister of State, Lord Williams of Mostyn, to consider the report and to respond to the issues raised in it.

A copy of the report has been placed in the Library.

Asylum and Immigration

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes in the arrangements for (a) deporting persons subject to deportation orders and

(b) locating and removing illegal immigrants are planned to be made in the period from 1 December 1998 to 1 March 1999. [62228]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The period 1 December 1998 to 1 March 1999 will see the reorganisation of casework in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate from the present Directorates into a single Integrated Caseworking Directorate. Arrangements for the removal of illegal entrants and people against whom deportation orders have been made will continue unchanged during this period: and the Immigration Service will continue to respond in cases where suspected illegal entrants are detected. During the reorganisation of headquarters case records there will be some interruption to the paper processing of cases, but this will not affect the ability of local immigration officers to take enforcement action in the many cases where decisions have already been taken.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how he plans to ascertain whether or not the considerations to be taken into account in dealing with asylum applications made between 1 July 1993 and 31 December 1995 apply to the cases of individual asylum seekers; and if he plans that each such applicant will be interviewed; [62229]

(2) how he plans to ascertain the considerations to be taken into account in dealing with asylum applications made between 1 July 1993 and 31 December 1995; and if he plans that each such applicant will be interviewed. [62209]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Undecided asylum cases, where the date of application falls between the dates relevant to the backlog procedure, have already been identified. Instructions to caseworkers processing these cases will be issued shortly and will be made available to the public through selected sites and the internet. A copy will also be placed in the Library.

Although it may be necessary to interview some of these applicants in order to give cases full consideration, where possible a decision will be taken on the information already available on the file, or subsequently obtained by post from the applicant.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the incidence of offending among asylum seekers; and if he will make a statement. [62211]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: No general assessment has been made of such incidents, but any conviction will be notified to the Immigration and Nationality Directorate and will be taken into account when deciding whether an asylum seeker should be allowed to remain in the United Kingdom. There is no evidence that the vast majority of asylum seekers are committing non-immigration criminal offences in the United Kingdom. Recent reports in the press have highlighted criminal offending by a minority, most of whom, with the sanction of the courts, will be removed from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he proposes to establish guidelines as to the considerations to be taken into account in dealing with asylum applications made between 1 July 1993 and 31 December 1995 as outlined in paragraph 8.30 of Fairer, Faster and Firmer. [62208]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Instructions on how to deal with cases which fall to be dealt with under the backlog procedures are to be issued to staff shortly. A copy of these instructions will be placed in the Library, sent to selected sites and placed on the Immigration and Nationality Directorate's website on the internet.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what account will be taken of delays in dealing with their asylum claim caused by the actions of the asylum seekers themselves as regards applicants (a) before 1 July 1993 and (b) from 1 July 1993 to 31 December 1995, in determining the eligibility of such an asylum applicant for indefinite leave to remain under paragraph 8.29 of Fairer, Faster and Firmer. [62233]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It would be difficult to envisage a set of criteria which would make it possible to distinguish those who through some action have delayed their case and the extent to which it was, in each individual case, justifiable or not.

Applicants who sought asylum in the United Kingdom before 1 January 1996 and who were still awaiting an initial decision on 27 July 1998 will not be excluded from the backlog procedures announced in the White Paper, even if some of the delay was caused by their own actions. However, any applicant whose case is being dealt with as part of the backlog exercise who, without good reason, fails to respond promptly to inquiries made by the Immigration and Nationality Directorate since the publication of the White Paper, is liable to have their application refused on non-compliance grounds.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how he proposes to ascertain in the case of each individual applicant whether or not the presence of pre-July 1993 asylum applicants is conducive to the public good; [62207]

(2) how he plans to ascertain in the case of individual pre-July 1993 asylum seekers whether or not their presence is conducive to the public good. [62213]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The information on individual case files will be examined. The Immigration and Nationality Directorate is routinely informed when those subject to immigration control are arrested and convicted of an offence.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the offences which amount to serious criminal offences for the purposes of determining the eligibility of pre-1 July 1993 asylum applicants for indefinite leave to remain under Para 8.29 of Fairer, Faster and Firmer-A Modern Approach to Immigration and Asylum. [62230]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It depends on the circumstances of the case, but generally an offender receiving a custodial sentence of 12 months or more would be excluded from benefiting from the backlog procedure. Other offenders may be excluded if their record is serious enough.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps are currently taken to discover if asylum seekers have a criminal record prior to claiming asylum in the United Kingdom; and what plans he has to introduce new checks so as to ascertain if asylum seekers have criminal records. [62210]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It is existing practice for the Immigration and Nationality Directorate to be advised if any foreign national is convicted of a criminal offence in the United Kingdom. A refugee who has been convicted by a final judgment of a particularly serious crime and constitutes a danger to the community may be removed to the country from which they sought asylum. When considering asylum applications, factors such as criminal convictions will be taken into account if a person qualifies as a refugee and before permission is given to remain in the United Kingdom.

It is not generally possible to ascertain whether an asylum seeker has committed an offence before they arrived in this country. However, if it is discovered that they have, consideration will be given to whether their actions exclude them from protection under the terms of the 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees.

We have no plans to introduce any new checks to ascertain whether asylum seekers have criminal records.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the likely effects of the refurbishment of Lunar House on the Immigration Service over the next three months. [62227]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The conditions at Lunar House have been described as Dickensian. The much needed refurbishment has been timed to fit in with fundamental changes in the way the Immigration and Nationality Directorate (IND) handles casework. These include the creation of a new Integrated Casework Directorate, which will be in temporary offices above the Whitgift Centre in Croydon until the building work on Lunar House has been completed in 2001. I wrote to all hon. Members on 18 November to explain that there will be considerable upheaval in the next three months. However, I am confident that, after February, IND's service will be much improved. The refurbishment will create more reasonable conditions, which will be more conducive to the efficient delivery of services.

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum applications from Slovakians have been certified since May 1997; how many Roma or Slovakian cases there have been in the period; and in how many of these cases the certification has been overturned at appeal. [61690]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The number of asylum applications made by nationals of Slovakia from May 1997 to October 1998 was 1,095, of which 565 were certified. I regret the information on ethnic origin could be obtained only by examination of individual case records and is, therefore, available only at disproportionate cost. I regret that the information on how many of the certified refusals overturned at appeal is not available.

Gun-related Crime

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, by offence, the number of gun-related crimes committed between (a) July 1995 and July 1996, (b) July 1996 and July 1997 and (c) July 1997 and July 1998. [62194]

Mr. Boateng: The table gives the readily available information which relates to the number of notifiable offences in which firearms, other than air weapons, were reported to have been used.

Notifiable offences recorded by the police in which firearms, other than air weapons, were reported to have been used England and Wales 1995–1996

Offences	July 1995-June 1996	July 1996-June 1997	July 1997-June 1998 (provisional)
Homicide	64	51	43
Attempted murder and other acts (including wounding) endangering life	746	547	652
Other offences of violence against the person	596	743	809
Robbery	4,249	3,307	2,720
Burglary	255	240	273
Other offences excluding criminal damage	248	229	221
Criminal damage	155	144	103
All offences	6,313	5,261	4,821

Note:
Figures for July 1997 to June 1998 exclude a few offences which became notifiable from 1 April 1998

Shapurji Saklatvala

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he intends to publish the files kept by the security services on Shapurji Saklatvala; and if he will make a statement. [61649]

Mr. Straw: It is long-standing Government policy neither to confirm nor deny whether the Security Service holds a record on any individual. I informed the House on 29 July 1998, Official Report, columns 251–52, that the Security Service has released almost all the surviving material in its archive covering the years 1909–1919, and is actively reviewing for release its more extensive stock of records for World War Two. Once this second phase of historical release has been completed, the Service will review its inter-war records in preparation for further releases. It is that period which is relevant to my hon. Friend's Question.

Prison Service (Staff Messes and Clubs)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Prison Service is directly liable for debts occurring in (i) staff messes and (ii) staff clubs in prison service establishments; and if he will make a statement. [61907]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service is currently liable for debts incurred by staff messes in Prison Service establishments.

Staff clubs are, according to current model rules, independent entities separate from Prison Service establishments. They are formed by staff and the managing committee should be responsible for any debts that arise. In their day-to-day operation with creditors, however, clubs have, on occasions, failed to make it clear that they are a separate legal entity from the core Prison Service. Consequently, when problems have occurred, the Prison Service has not always been able to distance itself from liability in the minds of creditors. The worst cases have resulted in settlement of debts from public funds. The Prisons Board has approved a corrective course of action which, following implementation, will ensure public funds are not misused to clear mess and club debts, fines and penalties.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) staff messes and (b) staff clubs in prison service establishments have closed in each of the last five years. [61905]

Mr. George Howarth: From the information currently available, the following number of staff messes and clubs in Prison Service establishments have closed during the last three years:

1996: One club

1997: Five clubs and one mess

1998: One club and one mess.

Prisoners (Complementary Medicine)

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of HM prisons currently provide complementary medical services for prisoners; how many others have requested such provision; and if he will make a statement. [62198]

Mr. George Howarth: Thirty-one Prison Service establishments have reported that they provide some form of complementary medical services to prisoners; and a further eight have said that they have plans to do so. The Prison Service is planning to issue guidance on the place of complementary therapies alongside conventional health services, as well as the range of treatments that it would be appropriate to offer in the prison context.

Augusto Pinochet

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the security arrangements for Augusto Pinochet following (a) his arrest and (b) his removal to another place of residence. [62119]

Mr. Straw: Security arrangements for individuals are an operational matter for the chief officer of police concerned.

Electoral Procedures

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the outcome of the review of the commercial sale of electoral registers by the Working Party on Electoral Procedures. [61802]

Mr. George Howarth: The Working Party on Electoral Procedures has asked Home Office civil servants to consult further with commercial and other interests about business' concerns before the sale of the register is considered again in detail later in the Working Party's programme.

Food Poisoning

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of food poisoning have been reported in each year since 1995 caused by (a) turkeys eviscerated in retail premises, (b) turkeys eviscerated in retail premises which were improperly cooked, (c) turkeys eviscerated at abattoirs and (d) turkeys eviscerated at abattoirs which were improperly cooked. [61670]

Ms Jowell: I have been asked to reply.

The majority of food poisoning notifications are sporadic cases which cannot normally be linked to a specific food vehicle. The most reliable data linking particular foods with infection is derived from the investigation of outbreaks. Information on outbreaks associated with food production processes such as those relating to the slaughter and evisceration of poultry is not available. The tables show the pathogens responsible for disease associated with the consumption of turkey products and the faults in food handling that investigators have identified as contributing to the transmission of infection in these outbreaks.

CABINET OFFICE

Ministerial E-mail Address

Mr. Brake: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what is his e-mail address. [62563]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: My e-mail address is jcunningham@cabinet-office.gov.uk.

HEALTH

Adverse Drug Reactions

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been (a) conducted and (b) commissioned by his Department into the children in respect of whom yellow cards have been issued. [61621]

Ms Jowell: The Medicines Control Agency is funding, jointly with the National Health Service, Executive Trent, a pilot project for the reporting of suspected adverse drug reactions in children, entailing the establishment of a research unit at Derbyshire Children's Hospital run by Professor Imti Choonara of the University of Nottingham. The objectives of the project are to stimulate reporting of suspected adverse drug reactions occurring in children in the Trent region to the Medicines Control Agency and Committee on Safety of Medicines, to identify and investigate possible signals of new adverse drug reactions occurring in children and to determine the value of extending the scheme to other regions or nationally. The centre commenced work in September 1998 and will report on its progress in mid-1999.

The current processes undertaken by the Medicines Control Agency for the evaluation of reports on yellow cards involve the identification and investigation of patterns suggesting new safety concerns, so that suitable steps can be taken to make sure that medicines are used as safely as possible.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance his Department issues to GPs on informing people of potential side-effects of the use of MR or MMR vaccinations. [61610]

Ms Jowell: A doctor must decide what information to pass on to a patient about the possible adverse reactions to any drug, including vaccines, and we would expect them to pass on all the relevant information to each patient. Full details of the contraindications to vaccination and the adverse reactions associated with measles, mumps and rubella (MMR) vaccine are set out in the United Kingdom Health Departments' memorandum "Immunisation against Infectious Disease" which is issued to doctors. The chapter on MMR states:

"Parents should be told about possible symptoms after immunisation".

In addition, the Health Education Authority (HEA) produces a range of leaflets on immunisation, which give information on possible side effects. Details of possible adverse reactions to MMR vaccine are included in the leaflet "A Guide to Childhood Immunisations", which is given to new parents, and in the leaflet "Immunisation for School Leavers". The HEA also produces a range of factsheets, including two on MMR, to assist healthcare professionals in responding to more detailed queries from parents.

Measles/rubella (MR) vaccine was used during the 1994 immunisation campaign. During the campaign all parents received an information leaflet/consent form and parents who were worried were advised to talk to their family doctor or school nurse. A letter from the Chief Medical and Nursing Officers, information and question and answer sheets were issued to all doctors and nurses either involved in giving the vaccine or in giving information on the campaign.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance his Department has issued to GPs on conducting follow-up inquiries after the reporting of adverse health reactions on a yellow card. [61611]

Ms Jowell: On receipt of a yellow card, the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) sends out a letter to each reporter which reminds them to forward any further relevant information when available. Each yellow card report of a suspected adverse drug reaction is evaluated by the MCA. Where the information provided on a report is insufficient, the reporter is contacted for further details.

Reporters can at the time of reporting request an overview of the adverse reactions already reported in association with the suspect drug and this may stimulate the doctor to provide further information.

Cosmetic Surgery

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that doctors are obliged to detail in writing the potential adverse consequences and dangers arising from a cosmetic surgical procedure. [61816]

Mr. Hutton: In obtaining consent to any surgical procedure medical practitioners must ensure that patients receive sufficient information presented in a form that they can understand about the intended procedure, the alternatives and any substantial risks.

Human Fertilisation and Embryology

Mr. Lock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to publish the report following the review by Professor Sheila McLean of the consent provisions in the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990. [62588]

Ms Jowell: I am pleased to announce that the Report of the Review of the common law provisions relating to the removal of human gametes (sperm or eggs) and of the consent provisions in the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 has been published today. Copies have been placed in the Library. The review, announced in February 1997, was conducted by Sheila McLean, Professor of Law and Ethics in Medicine at the University of Glasgow, and followed the Court of Appeal judgment in the case of R v. Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority ex parte Diane Blood.

In September 1997 Professor McLean conducted a public consultation on the issues raised in the course of her review. Over 600 copies of her discussion document were issued, with 116 responses being received. We welcome Professor McLean's Report which, following a thorough and comprehensive review of the complex issues involved, has delivered sensible and well argued recommendations. These include:

- in terms of the common law provisions relating to the removal of human gametes the report recommends that the current requirement for formal consent following adequate disclosure of information, should remain;
- the courts should be asked to determine whether the removal of gametes is lawful where there is any doubt about such removal in cases where consent cannot be given in the usual way;
- the requirement in the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 for consent to certain treatment provided under the Act (such as in-vitro fertilisation and donor insemination) to be given in writing should remain, and be extended to all treatment provided under the Act; and
- that the 1990 Act should be amended to remove from the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority any discretion to permit the export of human gametes that have been removed unlawfully.
- recommendations about the status of children born after the death of the gamete provider and the need for gamete providers to take account of succession rights of such children when storing gametes.

Following Mrs. Blood's case, there was considerable public and parliamentary interest in such issues and in particular as to whether the existing provisions in the common law and the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 reflected clinical and lay opinion. We have decided, therefore, to seek public and professional views on the recommendations. These will be requested by the end of April, when we will consider the best way of taking the recommendations forward.

We are very grateful to Professor Sheila McLean for having produced such a carefully considered Report.

Mental Health

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will lay a revised version of the Code of Practice on the Mental Health Act 1983 before the House. [62773]

Mr. Hutton: We have today laid copies of a revised version of the Code of Practice on the Mental Health Act 1983 before the House, in accordance with Section 118(4) of the Act. Copies are available in the Library.

Acquired Brain Injuries

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 27 November 1998, Official Report, column 26, concerning services for people with brain injuries, when the draft guidance will be ready for consultation. [62200]

Mr. Hutton: The draft guidance should be ready for consultation by the summer of 1999.

Road Accidents (NHS Charges)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much, in each of the last three years, Wellhouse NHS trust (a) recovered from insurance companies for the cost of treatment and (b) spent on treating road accident victims. [62288]

Mr. Hutton: Information on the cost of treating road accident victims at the Wellhouse National Health Service Trust is not available. The trust received the following income under the provisions of sections 157 and 158 of the Road Traffic Act 1988:

Year	Income (£000)
1995–96	52
1996–97	45
1997–98	30

Source:
1. Annual summarisation schedules 1997–98
2. Annual financial returns 1995–96 and 1996–97

The Road Traffic (NHS Charges) Bill, introduced to the House of Commons on 27 November 1998, will provide a centralised system of collection for Road Traffic Act charges. This will relieve hospitals of the administrative burden associated with this task and ensure that more cases are identified and that more income is returned directly to the hospital providing the care.

Cardiac Disease (Staffordshire)

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the percentage of patients who achieve return of spontaneous circulation at the point of admission following (a) cardiac arrests and (b) heart attack having been delivered to (i) Stafford General Hospital, (ii) Burton District General Hospital and

(iii) Good Hope Hospital, Sutton Coldfield by the Staffordshire Ambulance Service for each of the last two financial years. [61902]

Ms Jowell: The information for part (a) is listed in the table. Many patients suffering a heart attack (myocardial infarction) do not have a cardiac arrest and do not lose spontaneous circulation. These are therefore not included in the table.

Percentage

Hospital	1996–97	1997–98
Stafford General	20.5	19.0
Burton District General Hospital	17.1	19.0
Good Hope	22.9	15.2

Pre-pregnancy Care

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision he plans to make for pre-pregnancy care of women of childbearing age, following the Acheson report concerning inequalities in health. [62286]

Mr. Hutton: The Acheson Report drew attention to improvements in health and life expectancy associated with income and living standards. The Government are firmly committed to improving the living standards of the poorest households and are already taking a number of measures that will help to achieve this. We shall be considering Sir Donald Acheson's recommendations as a whole in the development of a new health strategy, and we shall publish a White Paper early next year.

Independent Pharmacists

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average length of the time taken, by region, by his Department to pay independent pharmacists for the cost of medicines dispensed. [62068]

Mr. Milburn: A payment representing approximately 80 per cent. of the amount due for dispensing prescriptions is made to community pharmacists on the first day of the month following that in which correctly endorsed prescriptions are received for pricing at the prescription pricing authority. The balance is paid on the first day of the following month once prescriptions have been fully processed.

Renal Services

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reasons the North West Lancashire, Morecambe Bay and South Cumbria, East Lancashire, and South Lancashire health authorities have not agreed a policy to fund an expansion of the renal unit at the Royal Preston Hospital; and if he will make a statement. [61743]

Mr. Milburn: The four health authorities support the recommendations of the pan-Lancashire review of renal services, which reported last year. That review recommended the development of a "hub-and-spoke" model for long term renal care; a hub in Preston and satellite units in Accrington, Blackpool and Kendal. The authorities agreed additional revenue for 1998–99 to implement the model in the short term, essentially by maximizing the use of existing local facilities. They have also set up a working group to determine how resources should be allocated in future years.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what amount was spent per head of population on renal services in each health authority area in England in the year for which he has the most up-to-date data. [61744]

Mr. Milburn: In terms of global budget, 1.5 per cent. of National Health Service revenue was spent on renal services in 1996. Information about the amount spent per capita on renal services in each health authority in England is not available.

NHS Work Force (Health)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the savings to the NHS budget which could be made by implementing the recommendations in the report, Improving the Health of the NHS Workforce; and if he will make a statement. [62116]

Mr. Milburn: It is difficult to estimate, at this stage, what savings might accrue from the successful implementation of the recommendations of the Nuffield report, but it is acknowledged that a reduction of 1 per cent. in staff sickness absence would release £140 million per annum for patient care.

Special Hospitals

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps his Department has taken to ensure that staff working in special hospitals understand their role within the complaints system; [62118]

(2) what action his Department is taking to improve the methods for selecting and training staff who work with newly admitted patients in special hospitals. [62117]

Mr. Hutton: It is for each high security (special) hospital to determine the methods to be employed in selecting staff to work in the hospital, and to ensure that they receive any necessary advice, training and education to enable them to perform the full range of their duties.

A seminar is being held in each region in England and in Wales, looking at training, work force planning and education issues relating to people working with mentally disordered offenders (MDOs). This programme covers the whole range of agencies and disciplines who have an involvement with MDOs, whether in secure settings or in the community. It aims to identify the core and specialist skills required to work successfully with MDOs and to develop efficient and effective training, work force planning and education strategies within each region.

Reflex Sympathetic Disorder

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate of the numbers of United Kingdom citizens currently suffering from reflex sympathetic disorder; how many are registered disabled; and what research the NHS has conducted into (i) the causes of and (ii) potential cures for the disorder. [61901]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not available in the form required. No research is currently taking place in relation to reflex sympathetic disorder. However, the National Health Service provides a wide range of services for people with neurological diseases.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Environmental Pollution

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many successful prosecutions for environmental pollution there have been by the Health and Safety Executive against operators of illegal gas and oil retailing points in Northern Ireland. [61921]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Environment and Heritage Service under its chief executive, Mr. Robert C. Martin. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Robert C. Martin to Mr. Jeffrey Donaldson, dated 3 December 1998:

As Chief Executive of the Environment and Heritage Service (EHS), I am responsible for the operational aspects of environmental protection. While question No 1259 refers to prosecutions for environmental pollution, it specifically refers to the Health and Safety Executive and retailing issues, and therefore I have been asked to co-ordinate the reply on behalf of Department of Economic Development's Health and Safety Inspectorate and Department of Environment's Local Government Branch.

EHS is responsible for the control of pollution of waterways under the provisions of the Water Act 1972. There have been no reports of pollution from illegal gas or oil retailing points in Northern Ireland and therefore no prosecutions have been taken. Similarly, there are no reports of pollution from illegal petrol retailing points.

The Industrial Pollution Control Order 1997 includes controls on Petrol Vapour Recovery at retailing points. Petrol retailers have until 31 December 1998 to submit applications for registration to District Councils. No prosecutions have been taken.

The Health and Safety Executive is a Great Britain organisation which has no remit in Northern Ireland. The major responsibility for Health and Safety at Work legislation in Northern Ireland lies with the Department of Economic Development under the provisions of the Health and Safety at Work (Northern Ireland) Order 1978. Since this Order does not deal with environmental pollution, the Department of Economic Development is not empowered to prosecute in cases where environmental pollution occur.

District Councils have an enforcement role under the provisions of the Health and Safety at Work Order in relation to retail premises which would include retailing of gas cylinders.

District Councils are also the licencing authority for petroleum retailing. I understand that the information relating to licencing is not held centrally.

I hope this reply is helpful.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Burma

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to support the imposition of financial sanctions on the regime in Burma. [62040]

Mr. Fatchett: At the October meeting of the General Affairs Council of the EU, a decision was taken to toughen the EU common position against Burma. At present there is no EU consensus for economic and financial sanctions.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for entry visas made in Sri Lanka for entry into the United Kingdom have been (a) granted and (b) refused in the last 12 months. [62182]

Mr. Fatchett: During the period October 1997 to October 1998, the British High Commission in Columbo processed 15,516 visa applications. Of these, 14,846 resulted in the issue of a visa and 670 were refused.

Hinduja

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what grant applications his Department has received from the Hinduja group of companies since 1 May 1997; and what grants have been paid. [62242]

Mr. Fatchett: We have received no grant application from the Hinduja family or their companies since 1 May 1997, nor have we made any grants to them.

Middle East Peace Process

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had concerning the Middle East Peace Process; with whom; and if he will make a statement. [62197]

Mr. Fatchett: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the House on 1 December 1998, Official Report, column 656, by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Accommodation (Homeless People)

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take steps to ensure that social landlords offer accommodation to homeless people with drug problems. [61159]

Mr. Raynsford: The White Paper "Tackling Drugs to Build a Better Britain", issued in April 1998, sets out the Government's anti-drugs strategy for the next 10 years. This includes a proposal that senior representatives of local housing authorities are included in the core, multi-agency membership of Drug Action Teams, to ensure that housing initiatives are included in local strategies designed to meet the needs of people with drug problems. In addition, the new body to tackle rough sleeping in London, where the problems are most intense, will put in place a programme of outreach support and hostels which will target the needs of people with drug problems who sleep rough in the Capital and who are not ready to move directly into a permanent social tenancy.

Under the homelessness legislation, local housing authorities must assist people who are unintentionally homeless and vulnerable because of ill health or other special reason; this includes those who are vulnerable because of drug problems. And in allocating permanent social tenancies, local housing authorities must give reasonable preference to persons with medical or welfare problems, among others. Registered Social Landlords (RSLs) already provide 700 units of supported accommodation specifically for people with drug problems, and also manage a number of hostels for homeless people which provide support for this client group. The Housing Corporation is currently developing good practice guidance for RSLs on strategies for providing residential services to drug users, in conjunction with the United Kingdom Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator.

Council Tax

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what would have been the additional council tax at Band D equivalent of each local authority if they had increased their spending by £100 per person, including all precepts, for 1998–99. [61667]

Ms Armstrong: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Local Government Finance

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the value of the resources top-sliced from the 1998–99 RSG settlement to finance the area cost adjustment. [61668]

Ms Armstrong: The contribution of the area cost adjustment to standard spending assessments for 1998–99 was £1,576 million.

Countryside Access

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to publish the Government's analysis of the response to their consultation paper on access to the open countryside in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [61642]

Mr. Meacher: I cannot go further than my earlier reply of 9 November 1998, Official Report, column 10, that we intend to do so shortly.

City Challenge

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the final key outputs were for the 11 first-round and the 19 completed second-round city challenge schemes. [61716]

Mr. Caborn: The Department has been noticed as part of the final reporting process, of the key output data, covering the five years of funding for the first and the completed second round City Challenge schemes. The figures, which are subject to verification by the appropriate Government Offices and set out in the table.

Aviation

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what representations he has received in respect of United Kingdom airlines' access to the United States civil aviation market, with particular reference to rights of (a) cabotage and (b) ownership of United States airlines; and if he will make a statement; [61795]

(2) what representations he has received on the negotiations on the bilateral air transport relations between the United States and the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [61790]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My Department has received representations from numerous sources in the UK and US about the liberalisation of UK/US air services. The two issues of cabotage and ownership of airlines have featured prominently in the representations from UK-based organisations. The UK hopes to conclude a new liberal agreement with the US which provides genuinely equal opportunities for airlines of both countries.

Sparsity Allowances

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if sparsity allowance is included in the social services standard spending assessment of county councils; and if he will make a statement; [61829]

(2) if he will make a statement on the future levels of sparsity allowance for shire counties. [61830]

Ms Armstrong: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister made a statement on 2 December 1998, Official Report, columns 883–901, about our proposals for Standard Spending Assessments for 1999–2000, including the allowances to be made for sparsity of population. These proposals include, for the first time, a sparsity allowance in the element of the Standard Spending Assessment for social services for the elderly in their own homes.

Air Pollution

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reasons aviation emissions are not covered by international agreements on limiting greenhouse gases. [61897]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 2 December 1998]: Aviation emissions of greenhouse gases are indeed covered by the Climate Change Convention and the Kyoto Protocol. Emissions from domestic flights are covered by UK commitments to reduce greenhouse gases. Emissions from international flights are not "allocated" to individual countries at present but are the subject of separate requirements to take preventive action, particularly through the International Civil Aviation Organisation.

Bus Fuel Rebate Scheme

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will rebate the tax paid on fuel by Ring and Ride (Greater Manchester Accessible Transport Ltd.) on the same basis as that which applies to commercial bus operators. [62101]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Levitt) on 2 November 1998, Official Report, column 307.

Community Transport

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to receive the report commissioned by his Department on community transport. [62110]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The national review of voluntary and community transport has now been completed and a summary of its main findings has been presented this week to delegates at the annual Community Transport conference for their views and comments. The final report will be available early in the New Year.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many of the environmental protection measures proposed for the second phase of the channel tunnel rail link between Ebbsfleet and St. Pancras are a specific requirement of the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Act 1996. [62107]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Additional tunnelling in the approach to St. Pancras and at Barking and revised alignment of the track at Thurrock and Rainham were provided partly for environmental reasons and are required by the 1996 Act. Other environmental protection measures may arise from the detailed planning approvals granted under the provisions of the 1996 Act by the local planning authorities.

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate his Department has made of the value for money of the environmental protection measures included in design for the second phase of the Channel Tunnel Rail Line between Ebbsfleet and St. Pancras; and if he will make a statement. [62108]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have not sought to make such an estimate, partly because few CTRL works in section two are exclusively for environmental protection, but primarily because there is no reliable means of apportioning costs between environmentally protective and other works.

Eurostar

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received since 8 May 1997 from residents near the railway line between the channel tunnel and London concerning noise from Eurostar trains. [62109]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have received a number of representations from residents near the railway line between the channel tunnel and London concerning noise from the horns of Eurostar trains. I understand from Eurostar that the levels of these horns comply with the rules governing international railway operations and are required by railway safety regulations.

Housing

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reason the Government have decided not to issue an approved code of practice, covering issues raised in Circular 12/92 entitled "Guidance to Local Housing Authorities on Standards of Fitness" under section 352 of the Housing Act 1985; and if he will make a statement. [62122]

Mr. Raynsford: We have decided against introducing an Approved Code of Practice for houses in multiple occupation (HMOs) as we consider that our existing powers do not enable us to produce an effective and workable code that would deliver the standards we want HMOs to achieve in the longer term.

We will be consulting on proposed standards for the licensing scheme we are committed to introduce for HMOs. Once these standards have been agreed we will publish them and issue guidance to authorities on how they might begin to apply them prior to the introduction of licensing.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals the Government have to provide a statutory definition of multiple occupation houses following the Barnes v. Sheffield City Council case; and if he will make a statement. [62123]

Mr. Raynsford: We hope to issue a consultation document on our proposals for a licensing scheme for houses in multiple occupation (HMOs) early in the New Year. The consultation document will address the issue of HMO definition, with the objective of clarifying the uncertainty that surrounds it following cases such as Barnes v. Sheffield City Council.

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the housing developments of over 10,000 homes which his Department has approved for planning purposes since 1985 indicating (a) the date of approval and (b) the local planning authority. [62070]

Mr. Raynsford: This information is not readily available.

Express Transit, Nottingham

Mr. Geraint Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to make an announcement on funding for the Nottingham Express Transit light rail scheme; and if he will make a statement. [62530]

Dr. Reid: I am delighted to announce today that the Nottingham Express Transit (NET) is to go ahead.

The Government are to provide £167 million of revenue support to Nottingham City Council so it can fund its side of the deal. The NET is an early local authority Private Finance Initiative (PFI) project.

The project is the culmination of years of hard work and is an excellent example of central and local Government working together to bring real benefits to the local community. This is illustrated by our support for this project. Over the next few years the NET will take up a large part of my Department's allocation of resources for local authority PFI projects. We will not be in a position to support similar light rail schemes in this way for the foreseeable future.

As we set out in "New Deal for Transport: Better for Everyone", the transport White Paper published in July, we aim to give local authorities greater input into providing tailored transport solutions. This is reflected in the recently issued draft guidance to help Local Authorities to formulate local transport plans which are a core part of our proposals to deliver integrated transport strategies at the local level.

Public Utilities

Mr. Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the need for a national strategy to deal with the disruption caused to local communities when companies seek to lay water, gas, electricity and telecommunication services along essential transport routes. [61313]

Ms Glenda Jackson: As the White Paper "New Deal for Transport: Better for Everyone" makes clear, we intend to consult on options for an incentive system, with penalties, to minimise disruption to all road users, and to encourage improved co-ordination of road works. I expect to begin this process in the New Year.

Sussex Downs Conservation Board

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the future of the Sussex Downs Conservation Board after 31 March 2001. [62121]

Mr. Meacher: We are still giving detailed consideration to the Countryside Commission's formal advice on protecting our finest countryside including the future arrangements for the Sussex Downs Area of Outstanding Natural Beauty. There is a great deal to consider but we hope to announce some conclusions soon. The future of the Board will depend upon the decisions taken.

Uniform Business Rate

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effects of the uniform business rate on small businesses. [61305]

Mr. Raynsford: In 1995 my Department published a research report "The Impact of Rates on businesses" which indicated that rates were a significantly greater burden for small businesses—those with turnovers of under £100,000—than for larger businesses. As stated in our White Paper "Modern Local Government: In Touch with the People", we are discussing with business representatives the details of a possible scheme to reduce this burden on small businesses.

Swimming Pools

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many swimming pools are currently operated by each local authority; and what were the corresponding figures (a) five years ago and (b) 10 years ago. [62375]

Mr. Raynsford: This information is not centrally available.

Disabled People

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many external members of the 18 policy action teams referred to in the Social Exclusion Unit report, "Bringing Britain Together: A National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal", represent the interests of disabled people; and if he will make a statement. [62232]

Ms Armstrong: The Policy Action Teams include a cross membership of those who have particular professional expertise in the issues to be addressed, and of those who live or work in poor neighbourhoods. Policy Action Team 4 (Neighbourhood Management) includes a representative from the Leonard Cheshire Foundation. Policy Action Team 16 (Learning Lessons) includes a representative from Business in the Community who is also Chair of the National Disability Council and a member of the Disabled Right Task Force. All the Teams will consult far more widely than their own membership, and will welcome contributions from individuals and groups representing the interests of disabled people.

Domestic Water Customers

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the practice by Thames Water and Welsh Water of disconnecting domestic customers. [62249]

Mr. Meacher: The Government regard it as unacceptable that anyone should be deprived of water supplies to their home because of an inability to pay. The Water Industry Bill, introduced on 25 November, includes provisions which, if agreed by Parliament, would make it an offence to disconnect water supplies to dwellings, schools or hospitals for non-payment of charges.

At present, water companies have powers to disconnect water supplies to homes for non-payment, under the Water Industry Act 1991. Water undertakers are also required to operate a code of practice on debt and disconnection and to have regard to guidance issued by the Director General of Water Services. The Government welcome the reductions in the numbers of customers disconnected in recent years. Nine water companies in England and Wales made no household disconnections for failure to pay water service bills in the first half of 1998–99.

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Director General of OFWAT for not taking enforcement action against Welsh Water in respect of budget payment units and trickle-flow meters and delays in removing the remaining meters. [62248]

Mr. Meacher: I understand that the Director General of Water Services has told Welsh Water that he requires an undertaking from the company that it will remove any disconnection element from the budget payment units currently installed, including any trickle flow valves, by May 1999. Failing receipt of such an undertaking he will take enforcement action.

Conveyancing

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to announce the outcome of the Government's review of the home buying and selling process; and if he will make a statement. [62585]

Ms Armstrong: The report of the Government's research into the home buying and selling process will be published on Monday 7 December. At the same time, we will publish a consultation paper setting out a package of proposals for making the process quicker, easier and more efficient. The package will propose action by all the parties involved in the process, but before reaching final conclusions we want to stimulate wide debate about both the problems and the best ways of dealing with them. Copies of the consultation paper will be available from the Vote Office. Copies of the consultation paper and the research report will also be placed in the Library of both Houses.

Land Use Planning

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what controls he envisages to give effect to the land use planning requirements of the COMAH Directive; and if he will make a statement. [62586]

Mr. Caborn: The Government have today issued draft Regulations to implement the land use requirements of Directive 96/82/EC on the Control of Major Accident Hazards.

Amendments are to be made to the Planning Hazardous Substances consents procedures to implement these provisions of the Directive while maintaining existing health and safety standards where these differ from the Directive. Changes to the Development Plan Regulations will ensure that local planning authorities take account of the requirements of the Directive when drawing up their development plans.

Work Equipment

Mr. Ivan Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the Government have done to meet the concerns of the plant and equipment hire industry over the introduction of the new Provision and Use of Work Equipment Regulations 1998. [62787]

Mr. Meale: As my hon. Friend knows, I met recently with the hon. Members for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) and for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) and representatives of both hire and lease companies and the construction industry. I am grateful to the hon. Members for helping to facilitate what was a very useful meeting. I am grateful also to many Members of the House who have written to me about this issue and for the very helpful advice I received from the Health and Safety Commission. At the meeting we agreed a practical way forward within the law which is acceptable to the industry and which will allow companies to meet their duties. Representatives of the plant and equipment hire industry and other trade associations have now agreed with HSE that hire companies should prepare an action plan in which they will identify the mobile work equipment that needs to be modified or adapted to comply with the new requirements of the Directive. They will also need to prioritise within the action plan the modifications which are needed, according to risk, and ensure that the new requirements are met.

Guidance has been produced for duty holders which explains what they will need to do to comply with Regulations 26 and 27 of the Provision and Use of Work Equipment Regulations 1998. I will arrange for a copy of this guidance to be placed in the Library of this House.

I have asked the Health and Safety Commission to keep the situation under close review.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Lone Parents

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if a single parent claiming income support will be able to have one interview to cover New Deal, income support, housing benefit, Child Support Agency and other benefit-related matters. [60873]

Angela Eagle: Personal advisers working in the New Deal for Lone Parents already offer lone parents on Income Support a comprehensive package of support and advice.

The DSS and the London Borough of Camden are already working together to pilot new arrangements for lone parents.

From June 1999 we will also pilot a more integrated service through the Single Work Focused Gateway. This will start in four areas from June, with a further eight pilots from November 1999.

At initial contact if appropriate an interview will be arranged within three working days usually held at the office. The interview will be conducted by a personal adviser who will provide a balanced package of work focused help and financial support. The adviser will be able to access information on the options available and provide a personalised calculation of potential in-work income including tax credits. Information on Housing Benefit and Child Support issues will be available at this point of entry.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what valuation is made of (a) a company car and (b) a company grant for an employee to acquire a car for company business, in formulating CSA payments. [60858]

Angela Eagle: The value of a company car is not taken into consideration in determining the income of either parent under the maintenance formula.

The treatment of an allowance paid by an employer for the purchase of a car will depend on the intended use. Where it is for business purposes only, the whole allowance will be ignored in determining income. Where there is a degree of private use, the amount taken into account will be that portion of the allowance which it is considered covers the parent's private usage.

The Green Paper "Children First—a new approach to child support" (Cm 3992) published on 6 July sets out our proposals for a new child support scheme, including a simpler definition of what counts as income.

Benefit Take-up

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he is taking to encourage the take up of (a) housing benefit, (b) income support, (c) family credit and (d) council tax benefits. [61472]

Angela Eagle: We want all those who are entitled to benefits to claim them, and we are taking action to encourage them to do so.

All local authorities are under a Statutory duty to publicise and promote maximum take-up of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit. This Department provides guidance and advice to authorities to help them maximise the effectiveness of take-up campaigns and we will continue to do so. Take-up rates for Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit are already consistently high.

We have recently completed research into why some pensioners do not claim their Income Support entitlement, and a series of pilots to test ways of identifying them and encouraging them to claim. We are currently evaluating the results before deciding how best to proceed.

From June to August 1998 we conducted a national advertising campaign to encourage take up of working benefits including Family Credit. This included advertising on television, radio and in women's magazines. Additionally, all lone parents whose children are over 5 years old are now invited for interviews and advised as to the availability of working benefits and provided with any help needed to claim their entitlement. These initiatives supplement the ongoing provision of information leaflets and advice through the Family Credit helpline.

Disabled Students

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) part-time and (b) full-time students have been in receipt of (i) disability living allowance, (ii) severe disablement allowance, (iii) disabled student allowance and (iv) other disability-related benefits in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [61468]

Mr. Timms: The information on the number of part time or full time students in receipt of disability living allowance, severe disablement allowance or other disability related benefits is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Information on Disabled Student Allowance is not available in the form requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

The number of disabled students' allowances made by local education authorities in England and Wales as part of mandatory awards in the academic years 1992–93 to 1996–97

Academic year	Number of awards
1992–93	2,490
1993–94	4,050
1994–95	5,320
1995–96	6,550
1996–97	8,120

Notes:
1. The Disabled Students Allowance forms part of the mandatory award. There are three separate allowances—that for specialist equipment; for non-medical helpers; and the general Disabled Students Allowance. Mandatory awards are payable to personally eligible students attending full-time or sandwich courses leading to a first-degree or comparable qualification. DipHE or HND courses and postgraduate courses of initial teacher training.
2. The table shows the number of awards, not the number of students. Students can receive more than one type of disabled students allowance.
3. The table shows the number of awards made by local education authorities to students normally domiciled in their area (in England and Wales).
4. The number of awards is rounded to the nearest 10.
5. Information for 1996–97 is the latest available.

Back-to-work Bonus

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants have (a) received and (b) been refused the back-to-work bonus. [61913]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Back to Work Bonus statistics

	All claimants
Claimants with an accrued bonus at the end of October 1998[1]	150,000
Number of bonus payments made from October 1996 to October 1998	81,000
Total amount of bonus payments made from October 1996 to October 1998	£20,574,000
Number of cases where a claim for a Bonus payment was unsuccessful, up to October 1998[2]	31,000

[1] Live claims on ISCS and JSAPS with a bonus accrual plus claims which have ended with a bonus accrual but no bonus payment has been made (claimants who return to benefit within 12 weeks and have not claimed a bonus retain the amount accrued during the previous claim).
[2] Reasons for unsuccessful claims include: No Back to Work Bonus amount had accrued; the claim for a Bonus payment was received outside the limit of 12 weeks for making a claim.
Note:
Data based on information held on the Income Support Computer System (ISCS) and the Jobseeker's Allowance Payment System (JSAPS). No clerically processed claims included. Excludes JSAPS activity for November 1996. Numbers are rounded to the nearest thousand.

Welfare Reform

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the Government expect to publish their response to the submissions made on the Green Paper on Welfare Reform. [61797]

Mr. Denham: The Green Paper on Welfare Reform set out a clear philosophy for the welfare state. "Work for those who can, security for those who cannot" is the foundation of our programme. It received overwhelming support. The public's response demonstrated first a widespread recognition of the need for welfare reform, and secondly, endorsement of our approach. We are now responding by putting those principles into practice.

On 28 October, we published three documents, "A new contract for welfare: Principles into Practice", which set out the significant progress that has already been made on welfare reform; "A new contract for welfare: Support for Disabled People", which set out detailed proposals to reform benefits for people with a long-term illness or disability; and "A new contract for welfare: The Gateway to Work", which set out plans for a single gateway to the welfare system.

We also published on 18 November "A new contract for welfare: Support in Bereavement" which set out proposals to reform bereavement benefits.

As announced in the Queen's Speech, we will introduce a Welfare Reform Bill in the current session. We will make further announcements in due course.

Contributions Agency Computer

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects the backlog of cases caused by the failure of the Contributions Agency computer to be cleared; and if he will make a statement. [61936]

Mr. Timms: The NIRS2 computer system is a large and complex system and there have been some delays and problems in its introduction, which the House was made aware of on the 5 November.

Backlogs of work have built up in both the Contributions Agency and the Benefits Agency as a consequence of the delays and problems with NIRS2. Both Agencies however, invoked contingency arrangements wherever possible to reduce the effect on customers.

The Contributions Agency and the Benefits Agency are working together to develop plans to clear backlogs as the new systems facilities become available, staff are able to address the backlogs caused by the absence of those facilities. For example, the backlog of requests for data protection printouts has been eliminated since 18 November 1998. It is not yet possible, however, to predict with certainty the date when all the backlogs will be cleared.

British Pensioners (Overseas)

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which Commonwealth nations have negotiated reciprocal arrangements to enable British pensioners living abroad to receive annual increases; and if he will make a statement on reciprocal arrangements with Kenya. [62035]

Mr. Denham: Pensioners living in the following Commonwealth countries receive annual UK State Pension increases: The Bahamas, Barbados, Cyprus, Jamaica, Malta and Mauritius. There is no reciprocal Social Security agreement between the UK and Kenya.

Family Credit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the source for her estimate in her answer of 16 November 1998, Official Report, column 592, that in 50 per cent. of couples receiving family credit the main earner is female. [62246]

Angela Eagle: The Family Credit Quarterly Statistical Enquiry for May 1998 shows that of the 767,000 families receiving Family Credit, 59 per cent. (452,000 families) have a female main earner.

Note:

Figures are rounded to the nearest thousand.

Ministerial E-mail Address

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his e-mail address. [62567]

Mr. Darling: Ministers may be contacted at the following address: ministers@ade006.dss.gov.uk.

Child Support

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish the Chief Child Support Officer's Annual Report for 1997–98. [62587]

Angela Eagle: The Annual Report of the Chief Child Support Officer (CCSO) for the year 1997–98 is published today. The Report highlights the damaging effect of the excessive complexity of the current maintenance formula.

We are determined to address the problems which the CCSO has identified by tackling the root causes of inaccuracy in child support assessments. The Child Support Agency has already begun to improve the way that it collects information by making greater use of the telephone, actively managing self-employed cases and by freeing local staff to allow more face-to-face contact with parents. The provisions in the 1998 Social Security Act which streamline and simplify the decision making process will be implemented in the Child Support Agency from June 1999. These changes will support further work in the Agency to improve the service that it offers to all its clients.

The proposals for reform will result in a radically simpler system which focuses on a rapid, transparent, and accurate assessment of liability. Improving standards of service is central to our proposed reforms and we are committed to avoiding the complexity which results in the problems identified by the CCSO.

WALES

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many 18 to 24 year olds in Wales have lost their jobseekers allowance as a result of refusing all four options in the New Deal. [61469]

Mr. Hain: Up until the end of October 1998, out of a total of almost 12,000 young people who entered the New Deal Gateway in Wales, 95 young people have had their jobseekers allowance temporarily suspended because, without good cause, they failed or refused to start a New Deal option or left an option early, or because they were dismissed from a New Deal option due to misconduct.

Prescription Claims

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he has taken to refund to the claimants for prescription payment certificates the additional amounts due to them following the acceptance by the Treasury Solicitor in Case No. LIC01071 between R. M. Wordley and the Welsh Office (Treasury Solicitor Ref. L96/8316H JBM/LS) of Mr. Wordley's interpretation of Regulation 9 of S.I., 1989, No. 419 as amended. [61831]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: There are no outstanding claims for payment. The case of Wordley v. Secretary of State for Wales was settled in February 1997, without admission of liability.

Rheumatoid Arthritis

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what resources his Department provides to Dyfed Powys Health Authority for the treatment of rheumatoid arthritis; and if he will make a statement. [61914]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: In 1998–99 Dyfed Powys received £237.8 million in discretionary resources, £8.4 million, or 3.6 per cent. more than in 1997–98. It is a matter for the health authority to determine how these funds should be used to provide an appropriate range of health services to its resident population, taking into account the pattern of local health need.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what the average provision of rheumatologists per hundred thousand people is for Welsh health authorities; and if he will make a statement; [61916]

(2) how many rheumatologists are employed by the Dyfed Powys Health Authority; and if he will make a statement. [61915]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information on hospital medical staff directly employed by the NHS in Wales is collected in an annual census relating to staff in post at 30 September. Health authorities do not directly employ hospital medical staff. The number and rate of rheumatologists employed by NHS trusts, grouped by health authority ares, are shown in the following table. It should be noted, however, that health authorities are free to purchase services from any health provider.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to review the current provision of care for sufferers from arthritic conditions; and if he will make a statement. [61917]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The provision for the care of those suffering from arthritic conditions is the responsibility of health authorities whose responsibility it is to assess the needs of their local population and provide appropriate services to meet them while taking account of their resources, priorities and other pressures.

Assembly Reporting

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has for the record of the National Assembly for Wales. [62797]

Mr. Michael: I will publish tomorrow a consultation paper which sets out our proposals on the timing of the production of the report, which will be called "The Daily Journal"; its translation into and from the Welsh language; the method of publication; standards and archiving. In line with our policy of inclusivity I want to ensure that the record reaches as wide an audience as possible and we want to learn of people's thoughts on how best to make the Record available to the people of Wales.

Copies of the Paper will be placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Water Disconnections

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the levels of disconnections by Welsh Water; and if he will encourage those water companies that do not have them to establish charitable or hardship funds. [62250]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Since the privatisation of the water industry in 1989, there has been a general decline in the number of water supply disconnections made by Dwr Cymru Welsh Water. In 1991–92 the number of household disconnections was 2,938 as compared to 160 in 1997–98.

The issue of disconnection formed part of the Government's recent review of the water charging system in England and Wales which proposed the prohibition of the disconnection of household water supplies for non-payment of charges. The Government have decided to proceed with this proposal. Clause 1 of the Water Industry Bill, which will have its Second Reading in the House on Monday 7 December, provides for this prohibition through an amendment to section 61 of the Water Industry Act 1991.

The development of charitable trusts by water companies is strongly supported by the Government as they provide invaluable support to customers in genuine need. The Government will continue to encourage action by companies to assist those customers who experience difficulties in paying their charges, not only through charitable trusts, but also through the design of tariffs and through helping customers reduce their bills and economise on water use.

Housing Associations

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which housing associations in Wales (a) do and (b) do not participate in mutual aid development on their estates. [62274]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Mutual aid development refers to the activities known as "housing plus" or sustaining communities. The Welsh Office sets "Regulatory Requirements", which are the standards that housing associations must work to. They state:

"Associations should help to safeguard their tenants' quality of life by providing support to communities which help protect the interests of existing neighbours or tenants or contribute to the prevention or reversal of social decline".

Our experience at audit of housing associations is all are engaged in a range of such projects, some more extensively than others. We have encouraged associations to increase this work in the future as part of the Government's agenda to tackle social exclusion.

Tai Cymru issued in September 1998 a report on "Sustainable communities for the future" which gave many examples of good practice in this area and made recommendations for future action.

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many housing association development workers are employed by each housing association in Wales. [62275]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: This information is not held centrally but we believe all associations employ development workers. Some Associations employ specific officers to carry out this work while others use generic staff who provide this function alongside their housing management role. We believe both approaches can be equally effective.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Methyl Bromide

Mr. Flight: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans Her Majesty's Government have (a) to ban the use of methyl bromide as a chemical agent for the purposes of sterilising soil and grain stores and (b) to ensure that a replacement product is available. [61180]

Mr. Rooker: The Government are bound by the timetable laid down in the Montreal Protocol to reduce or phase-out substances such as methyl bromide which deplete the ozone layer. The Protocol was last amended in September 1997 when it was agreed, for developed countries, to cut production and use of methyl bromide by 50 per cent. by 2001, 70 per cent. by 2003 and phase out by 2005. The Protocol exempts quarantine and preshipment treatments. All member states of the European Union are signatories to the Protocol, which is currently implemented through Council Regulation (EC) 3093/94.

The European Commission has proposed a draft Regulation imposing a more stringent timetable to cut production and phase-out methyl bromide which is under discussion.

Impact Studies have been commissioned by MAFF and DETR on the effect of phase-out in the horticultural, food commodity and structures sectors. Methyl Bromide is an efficient fumigant and for some purposes such as soil sterilisation and the disinfestation of flour mills, there are no ready, single alternatives. A LINK research project to consider alternatives for the horticulture sector commences in April next year. Two further LINK projects covering commodities and structural fumigation are currently under consideration.

Policy responsibility for negotiations and implementation of the Protocol within the UK rests with my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions. Further information about the impact of phase out of methyl bromide on the horticulture industry can be found in the ADAS reports "A Review of Methyl Bromide Use in Horticulture (1996)" and "Withdrawal of Methyl Bromide—summary of principle cost implications for UK horticulture (1998)", both of which were commissioned by my Department. (Copies of both reports are available from ADAS or MAFF—Horticulture and Potatoes Division.)

Pet Quarantine

Ms Perham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to introduce a parallel system for pet quarantine to cover North America. [60863]

Mr. Rooker: Pet Animals arriving from North America are already subject to the same regime as animals arriving from anywhere else outside the British Isles. The Advisory Group on Quarantine has recommended that quarantine should be replaced for cats and dogs leaving the UK and returning after visits to the European Union and European Economic area countries, and rabies-free islands in the rest of the world; quarantine would also be replaced for cats and dogs entering the UK from such countries. Quarantine would be retained for cats and dogs coming into the UK from other countries. The Government will propose a specific way forward on the Advisory Group's recommendations after the public consultation on the Group's report ends on 31 December 1998.

The Advisory Group recommended that further consideration be given to the risks arising from allowing cats and dogs from North America into Great Britain without undergoing quarantine. This study is underway.

BSE

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the progress of the attack rate experiment examining the dose of BSE-infected cattle brain necessary to transmit BSE orally between cattle; and what evidence the experiments have produced on the relationship between the incubation period and the size of the dose. [61558]

Mr. Rooker: In the so called attack-rate experiment, to determine the minimum amount of BSE-infected cattle brain required to infect cattle by the oral route and the effect dose size may have on the incubation time, groups of 10 cattle were deliberately infected at four months of age by feeding them with either 300, 100, 10 or 1 gram of BSE infected brain tissue. The cattle were then observed for the development of disease and killed when judged to be positive by clinical signs. Diagnosis of BSE was confirmed by examination of the brain post-mortem.

The experiment has now been running for 7 years and transmission of BSE has been accomplished with all four different doses of brain. All 10 animals in each group dosed with 300 or 100 grams of brain have been positively diagnosed with incubation periods ranging from 32–42 months and 32–60 months respectively. Seven of the 10 animals in each group dosed with 10 or 1 gram have been positively diagnosed with incubation periods ranging from 44–71 months and 45–71 months respectively. One animal died early from other causes not related to BSE in the group that received 10 grams of brain. All the remaining animals from the groups that received 10 or 1 gram of brain are now showing early clinical signs consistent with BSE.

The results indicate that cattle can be infected by the oral route down to a level of 1 gram of BSE infected cattle brain and that incubation period appears to be prolonged at lower doses.

The experiment has since been extended and groups of cattle have now been challenged with either one, one tenth, one hundredth or one thousandth of a gram of the same infected cattle brain used previously. The experiment has been running for 11 months and all animals are still clinically normal. It is hoped that this phase of the experiment will define the minimum dose of brain required to infect cattle and provide further information relating to the effect on incubation period relative to the infecting dose.

Deer Management

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the agenda items for discussion at the meeting between the Director General of the Forestry Commission and the Chair of the Commissioners of the Forestry Commission, and the Quantock Staghounds on 4 December; and if he will make a statement. [62033]

Mr. Morley: The Chairman and the Director General of the Forestry Commission are meeting representatives of the Quantock Staghounds to hear their views on issues relating to deer management. There is no formal agenda, but the meeting will take account of the Commission's decision not to renew the Staghounds' licence to hunt over Commission land, and also the recent Harris report on stag hunting.

Scallops

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans have been made to introduce measures to secure scallop stock conservation. [62675]

Mr. Morley: Following issue of a consultative paper in June this year and careful consideration of the responses, it has been decided to proceed with the introduction of specific licensing arrangements for over 10 metre vessels fishing for scallops using mechanical dredging gear.

Permission to fish for scallops with mechanical dredging gear will be granted where vessel owners can demonstrate that they currently hold licences with a history of having caught a minimum of 1 tonne of scallops by this method in any calendar year during the period 1 January 1994 to 31 May 1998. The users of mechanical dredging gear will be required to complete a logbook for all fishing trips during which scallops are caught. Where licences are aggregated, the permission to fish for scallops with mechanical dredging gear will only be given if all the donor licences carried that permission.

These arrangements are planned to take effect from 1 April 1999 and will be reviewed after 2 years in the light of experience. The review will take account also of progress towards the development of more precisely targeted conservation measures.

A number of respondents to the consultation exercise proposed that scallop licensing should be introduced for vessels of 10 metres and under. This will be considered as part of broader management arrangements for these vessels. However, I should make it clear that if scallop licensing were to be introduced in this context, the reference period for determining eligibility would also be 1 January 1994 to 31 May 1998.

Fisheries Departments will be writing to all owners of over 10 metre vessels setting out the criteria for qualification for a licence and inviting applications. The letter will also deal with the arrangements for considering applications from those who do not meet the qualifying criteria but who have made a financial commitment to invest in a scallop vessel, gear or licences for aggregation onto a scallop vessel prior to 31 May 1998.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Millennium Bug

Ms Oona King: To ask the President of the Council if she will make a statement on the progress being made by central Government departments and agencies and the wider public sector in tackling the millennium bug. [62174]

Mrs. Beckett: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement I made yesterday in the House on 2 December 1998, Official Report, columns 902–16. I have also place copies of the latest quarterly returns from Departments, agencies and key organisations from the wider public sector in the Library and on the Internet (http://www.open.gov.uk/year2000).

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Tanning Shop Franchises

12. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many letters he has received in respect of the treatment by the (a) National Westminster Bank and (b) Lombard Banking of the Tanning Shop franchise customers. [61306]

Mrs. Roche: No letters have been received by this Department in respect of the treatment by either the National Westminster Bank or Lombard Banking of the Tanning Shop franchise customers although the former Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) received a letter from my hon. Friend on 12 December about The Tanning Shop Ltd.

Manufacturing Competitiveness

13. Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on manufacturing competitiveness. [61309]

Mr. Mandelson: We recognise the difficulty that the downturn in the world economy is causing certain sections of our manufacturing industry and exporters. However, not all is doom and gloom. We believe that the tough and decisive action this Government have taken is creating the conditions for stability necessary to build Britain's long-term prosperity. And as the Government's Competitiveness White Paper will show, we are taking measures to stimulate greater enterprise, innovation and exploitation of knowledge, all of which will underpin Britain's competitiveness into the new Millennium.

Science (Government Spending)

14. Mr. Andy King: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the average annual increase in total Government spending on science over the last 20 years. [61310]

Mr. Battle: Information before 1986–87 is not available in the terms requested. The average real terms annual change in total Government spending on Science Engineering and Technology over the 12-year period 1986–87 to 1997–98 was a decrease of £128 million at 1997–98 prices. This excludes National Health Service SET expenditure for which information has been available only since 1995–96.

Electronic Commerce

15. Ms Southworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress is being made in assisting small businesses to increase their use of electronic communications. [61311]

Mrs. Roche: Electronic Communication—in particular e-commerce over the Internet—allows every small business in the UK to compete on the world stage. The Government's aim is to make the UK the best environment in the world for e-commerce by 2002. And we need to help small businesses grasp the opportunities this opens up. International benchmarking studies commissioned by the department show that only 11 per cent. of UK small businesses regularly use external electronic networking technologies such as the Internet. The White Paper on competitiveness which we will be publishing shortly will set out our strategy to increase this number significantly.

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on how he intends to promote successful electronic commerce. [61324]

Mrs. Roche: The Government's strategy for electronic commerce will be set out in the White Paper on Competitiveness which we will be publishing shortly. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced to the House on 25 November 1998, Official Report, column 217, the Prime Minister will be appointing a Digital Envoy to drive this strategy forward.

Scientific Research

16. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to ensure that British scientific research contributes to economic prosperity. [61312]

Mr. Mandelson: The development and commercial exploitation of scientific research is fundamental to a prosperous knowledge-driven economy.

Important steps have already been taken such as:

£1.4 billion additional funding for science;

the launch earlier this year of University challenge to help universities turn good research into good business; measures to promote collaborative partnerships such as LINK;

the creation, of a £25 million Science Enterprise Challenge announced in my right hon. Friend's the Chancellors Pre-Budget Statement.

My forthcoming Competitiveness White Paper will address this important issue and build on these measures.

Supermarket Retailing

17. Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to receive the Office of Fair Trading report into supermarket retailing. [61314]

Mr. Mandelson: The decision to undertake a study of supermarket profitability was taken independently by the Director General of Fair Trading. It is a matter for him how and when he makes his findings public. I understand that he hopes to complete preliminary investigations early in the new year.

Textile Industry

18. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to support the United Kingdom's textile industry. [61315]

Mr. Battle: DTI provides a wide range of support to the UK's textiles, clothing and footwear industries. Currently the Department is supporting 22 projects aimed specifically at raising the profile of the sector and improving its competitiveness.

Foreign-owned Industries

19. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he is taking to ensure that DTI grants helping foreign-owned industries to move into the north-west do not disadvantage existing indigenous industries. [61316]

Mrs. Roche: Displacements are a primary factor when considering grants for mobile investments. There is no national benefit in supporting a project which simply knocks out equivalent employment in competing businesses.

Policy Decisions

20. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans his Department has for the solicitation of scientific advice in order to facilitate policy decision making. [61317]

Mr. Battle: DTI has in place a number of procedures and mechanisms to ensure that the appropriate scientific advice is sought and used to inform policy making in line with the Guidelines on "The Use of Scientific Advice in Policy Making". These mechanisms include, for example, the use of in-house experts, independent advisory committees and expert research or technical advice. The Office of Science and Technology carried out a review of how Departments were implementing the Guidelines, and the Chief Scientific Adviser published a report last July which showed that good progress was being made. A further review will be undertaken next year.

Manchester United

22. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to receive the decision of the Monopolies Commission regarding the sale of Manchester United football club; and if he will make a statement. [61319]

Mr. Mandelson: The Monopolies and Mergers Commission is due to deliver its report on BSkyB's proposed acquisition of Manchester United to me by 12 March 1999.

Small and Medium Enterprises

23. Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to establish networks of research-oriented small and medium enterprises. [61320]

Mrs. Roche: From the day it was elected, this Government have striven to encourage better networking by research-oriented SMEs. Very often, such firms possess real talent and innovative ideas; it is our aim to encourage them to learn from each other, and from a wider canvas of expertise, how best to bring their research to market.

I recognise and welcome the industrial forums that have been established in Wales and commend them to other parts of the country.

One of the earliest actions of this Government, following the 1997 election, was to announce the establishment of the first four Faraday Partnerships in the UK.

Each Faraday Partnership is a collaborative network between one or more universities, one or more independent research and technology organisations and a group of up to 30 firms, focusing especially on small and medium-sized firms.

At regional and local level, numerous semi-formal groupings exist, usually facilitated by Government Office, Business Links or universities and research organisations. Many such groups have been established as a result of the work of the team of 13 regional industrial secondees working in the DTI's Innovation Unit, who in turn collaborate with local providers to identify suitable topics for networking.

Particular emphasis has been given to encouraging smaller firms to understand the outcomes of the Foresight process. Many high-technology small firms are nowadays key to Britain's industrial capability—in topics such as software and aspects of biotechnology. Keeping these firms aware of the directions that science and technology are taking in our universities is a fundamental role of networks.

28. Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his Department's work in supporting small and medium enterprises. [61325]

Mrs. Roche: Small and medium-sized businesses are crucial to a successful enterprise economy and the Government are firmly committed to stimulating the creation, competitiveness and growth of new and smaller businesses.

The key principles underlying the Government's approach include fostering an enterprise culture that encourages innovators and risk takers; providing and maintaining a supportive economic environment; identifying and removing barriers to growth; and providing high quality business support for firms at all stages of their development. The Government also work within the European Union to help to further these aims throughout Europe.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on support for small businesses in London. [61303]

Mrs. Roche: A full range of support is available to SMEs in London through TECs, Business Links, Chambers of Commerce, Enterprise Agencies and others. The structure of business support in London is, however, being reviewed to ensure that it is fully effective in meeting the needs of companies.

Government Chemist

24. Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the performance of the Government Chemist in meeting his statutory responsibility. [61321]

Mr. Battle: Good chemical analysis makes a considerable contribution to our quality of life and our industrial competitiveness. I am satisfied that the Government Chemist is discharging his role as statutory function in a satisfactorily manner. This view is endorsed by the Royal Society of Chemistry and other Government Departments for which the Government Chemist provides analysis and advice.

I have just received the Government Chemist's second annual report and copies will be placed in the Library.

Energy Supply

25. Mr. Paul Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has for maintaining diversity of long-term energy supply in the United Kingdom. [61322]

Mr. Battle: We set out the Government's plans in the White Paper, Conclusions of the Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation and Government Response to fourth and fifth Reports of the Trade and Industry Committee (Cm 4071), published on 8 October 1998.

Minimum Wage

26. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received concerning the youth rate of the national minimum wage; and if he will make a statement. [61323]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Government have received a number of representations about the national minimum wage youth rate.

The setting of a different rate for young people reflects the importance we attach to their training, development and education and to helping them to secure jobs. International research shows that where minimum wages have an adverse impact, if falls disproportionately on young people. That is why most countries which have minimum wage legislation have exemptions and lower rates for young people.

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer concerning the implications for the competitiveness of British industry of the minimum wage. [61022]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The competitiveness of British industry is regularly discussed during meetings Ministers have with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The national minimum wage will help improve relationships at the workplace and produce improvements in work force commitment, morale, and performance. It should contribute to raising industry's competitiveness by reductions in staff turnover and absenteeism. This should result in improved productivity, which will benefit individual companies and the economy as a whole.

Working Time Directive

29. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many small businesses he estimates will face increased overheads as a result of the Working Time directive. [61326]

Mr. Ian McCartney: There was no specific assessment of the increased overheads faced by small businesses, but we do not think small businesses will be disproportionately affected because of their size. An assessment for the whole of British industry was made, a copy of which is held in the Library.

The Government have endeavoured to minimise costs and burdens on business in line with proper implementation of the Directive. These measures will provide workers with proper rest and help combat stress and illness amongst workers. With the CBI estimating £25 billion lost in 1996 due to absenteeism they also make good business sense.

Millennium Dome

33. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures he has put in place to ensure that Ministers dealing with sponsorship for the millennium dome do not deal with competition issues affecting those sponsors. [61331]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company is responsible for procuring and negotiating sponsorship for the Millennium Experience project.

34. Ms Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the level of sponsorship for exhibits within the millennium dome. [61332]

Mr. Mandelson: The £120 million confirmed sponsorship raised by the New Millennium Experience Company so far covers 8 exhibit zones within the Dome, some associated National Programme strands, and Baby Dome. The exhibit zones are Communicate (BT); Body (Boots The Chemist); Work (Manpower); National Identity (Marks and Spencer); Learn (Tesco); Global (BAA and British Airways); Mind (British Aerospace and GEC); and Transaction (Corporation of London subject to matching funding by City Institutions). The National Programme strands are Future Talk (BT); Our Town Story (McDonald's); National Skills Festival 2000 (Manpower); Children's Promise/Voices of Promise (Marks and Spencer); and Tesco Schoolnet 2000. Baby Dome is being sponsored by Sky. Camelot, the official ticket distributor, is also an official partner sponsor.

35. Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the numbers expected to visit the millennium dome in its first year. [61333]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) is charged by the Government and the Millennium Commission with developing the Millennium Experience project and operating it for one year. The NMEC estimate that 12 million people will visit the Millennium Experience during its one year of operation.

36. Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about corporate sponsorship for the millennium dome. [61334]

Mr. Mandelson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South, (Mr. Chapman) on 3 December 1998, Official Report, columns 1038–39.

37. Mr. Grieve: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the number of zones planned for the millennium dome. [61336]

Mr. Mandelson: There will be 14 zones within the Millennium Dome.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will publish the amounts budgeted to be spent on design and content within each of the zones in the Greenwich Millennium Exhibition; [61979]

(2) if he will publish the budgets for each of the zones in the Greenwich Millennium Exhibition. [61981]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answers 1 December 1998]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on 27 July 1998, Official Report, columns 82–83.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the BBC over broadcasting rights to the Millennium Exhibition in Greenwich. [61982]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) is in discussion with a number of broadcasters, including the BBC, over broadcasting rights to the Millennium Experience at Greenwich.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has held with representatives of the Amalgamated Engineers and Electrical Union about transportation to the Millennium Dome. [61335]

Mr. Mandelson: Transport issues are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London.

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if there will be a celebration of Britain's contributions to political theory during the last 1000 years in the Millennium Dome. [61665]

Mr. Mandelson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 5 November 1998, Official Report, column 623.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what provision will be made for the sale of traditional British food at the Millennium Experience. [61625]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company's policy is to provide as wide a range of catering services as possible to meet the varied needs of visitors to the Dome.

Mr. Prior: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the average daily number of visitors to the Millennium Dome. [61330]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company aims to attract an average daily number of 33,000 visitors.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many expressions of interest he has received for the use of the Millennium Dome after 1 January 2001; and when he will make a decision on a short list of potential users. [61879]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: Since 1 December 1997 when I invited expressions of interest in the Dome's future use, I have received 7 proposals. A working group set up by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister is currently looking at the best mechanism for encouraging and assessing expressions of interest, including the timetable and the criteria against which bids would be judged. No firm decisions have been made yet but it is likely that a formal competition will begin in the New Year.

Mergers

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his policy on mergers. [61302]

Mr. Mandelson: I shall refer cases to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission primarily on competition grounds. However, I shall continue to consider each case on its merits, in order to safeguard competition and the interests of the consumer.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what date and for what reasons his planned trip to Brazil in November was cancelled. [61519]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 30 November 1998]: A decision to postpone my planned visit to Brazil and Argentina was taken as soon as it became clear—following the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House regarding Prorogation on Thursday 12 November—that Trade and Industry Oral Questions would take place on 3 December.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what plans he has to carry out his planned visit to Brazil; [61526]

(2) if he will list his planned overseas visits. [61522]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 30 November 1998]: I have not yet finalised my overseas visits programme for next year.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list his planned itinerary for his cancelled trip to Brazil. [61527]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 30 November 1998]: The itinerary for this visit had not yet been finalised. It would have consisted of calls on representatives of the Brazilian Government, business and the media.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list the expenses incurred during his trip to Brazil in 1998; [61528]

(2) if he will list the expenses incurred by the then Minister without Portfolio on his visit to Brazil; [61524]

(3) if he will publish the itinerary of the visit by the then Minister without Portfolio to Brazil in June; [61518]

(4) what issues the then Minister without Portfolio discussed with the British Council in Rio de Janeiro during his visit; [61521]

(5) if he will list the individuals met by the then Minister without Portfolio during his ministerial trip to Brazil. [61523]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 30 November 1998]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) on 31 July 1998, Official Report, column 779.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the itineraries for his overseas visits in the current year. [61513]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 30 November 1998]: I have no current plans to undertake any further official overseas visits this year.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the (a) itineraries for and (b) expenses incurred in his visits to the United States. [61529]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 30 November 1998]: My visit to the United States from 10 September to 15 September involved meetings in New York, San Francisco, Silicon Valley and San Diego with leading edge technology and knowledge driven businesses, venture capitalists and academics.

On the expenses incurred, I refer to the reply I gave in writing to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire), my letter dated 25 November, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list his expenses on overseas trips. [61520]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 30 November 1998]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave in writing to the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire), my letter dated 25 November, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the individuals he met during his visit to the United States. [61525]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 30 November 1998]: During my visit, I met representatives of leading edge technology businesses, venture capitalists and academics.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many meetings he has had with (a) McDonald's and (b) Manpower since becoming Secretary of State; and if civil servants were present. [61986]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: I have had no meetings with McDonald's or Manpower since my appointment as Secretary of State.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who was present and what was discussed at his meeting with British Telecom on 30 October. [62003]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: The meeting with British Telecom was attended by the Chief Executive, Sir Peter Bonfield, and two others from BT, as well as officials from my Department. Strategic issues concerning the company and its future business were discussed.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what aspects of the Millennium Dome he discussed with Mr. S. P. Hinduja and Mr. G. P. Hinduja at his meeting on 6 October. [62203]

Mr. Mandelson: I met with S. P. Hinduja and G. P. Hinduja at my offices to discuss Indo-British relations. The Millennium Dome was not on the agenda, but was referred to in passing at the end of the meeting. There was no substantive discussion.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many meetings he has had with the directors or employees of Sangam Ltd. since he became the Minister responsible for the Millennium Experience; where they were held; what was the subject matter; and if civil servants were present; [62000]

(2) how many informal meetings at which Government business was discussed he has had with the directors or employees of Sangam Ltd. since 2 May 1997; and what was the subject matter; [62001]

(3) how many meetings he has had with the directors or employees of Sangam Limited since he became Secretary of State; where they were held; what was the subject matter; and if civil servants were present; [61999]

(4) on what dates he has had meetings with (a) Srichand P. Hinduja, Chairman and (b) Gopichand P. Hinduja, President of the Hinduja Group of Companies since 2 May 1997; what was the location of the meetings and the subject matter discussed; and if officials were present. [61977]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave him today in response to questions Numbers 61976 and 62203.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many informal meetings he has had since 2 May 1997 at which Government business was discussed with (a) Srichand P. Hinduja, Chairman and (b) Gopichand P. Hinduja, President of the Hinduja Group of Companies. [61976]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: As Minister without Portfolio, I met the Hindujas on a number of occasions, sometimes formally and otherwise at social events. Since becoming Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, I have had one meeting with the Hindujas on 6 October.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many informal meetings at which Government business was discussed he has had with British Airways. [61993]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: In my capacity as Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, I have had no meetings with British Airways. In my capacity as shareholder of the New Millennium Experience Company, I meet Bob Ayling, the Chief Executive of BA, from time to time in his capacity as Chairman of NMEC.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the meetings he has held with the British Council relating to the promotion of trade and industry abroad. [61514]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 30 November 1998]: Since my appointment as Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, I have opened a new British Council English language training centre in Johannesburg on 15 September and attended the Pontignano conference, hosted by the British Council, in Italy on 19 September.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) who was present and what was discussed at his meeting with British Aerospace on 26 October; [61983]

(2) who was present and what was discussed at his meeting with British Aerospace on 7 September; [61998]

(3) how many informal meetings at which Government business was discussed he has had with British Aerospace. [61994]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: Each of these meetings with British Aerospace was attended by at least one director of British Aerospace and at least one official from my Department. On each occasion strategic issues affecting the future business of British Aerospace were discussed. I apologise to the hon. Member for the fact that my answer to him of 19 November 1998, Official Report, columns 882–83, was incomplete, in that I also met British Aerospace on 3 September for a similar purpose. Beyond this, I have held no informal meetings with British aerospace since I was appointed Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) who was present and what was discussed at his meeting with British Aerospace on 21 October; [62004]

(2) who was present and what was discussed at his meeting with British Aerospace on 14 November. [62005]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 2 December 1998]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him today in response to his questions 61983, 61998 and 61994.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many meetings he has had with the Chairman of the New Millennium Experience Company since 30 July; what was discussed; and if officials were present. [61984]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: Since 30 July, I have met the Chairman of the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) 4 times at the Millennium Experience Co-ordinating Group at which progress of the Millennium Experience project was discussed. I also met the Chairman at a working lunch at my office with other members of the New Millennium Experience Company Board and officials.

Ministerial Responsibilities

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry from which civil servants he has sought advice in respect of potential conflicts of interest arising from his position as Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and as the sponsoring Minister of the New Millennium Experience Company; and what advice he received. [61997]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement I issued on 6 August, copies of which were placed in the Library.

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is yet in a position to make his decision on the proposal to construct a combined heat and power generating station adjacent to the Shotton paper mill in Flintshire. [62874]

Mr. Battle: I have today granted consent under Section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 to Shotton Combined Heat and Power Ltd.'s application for my consent to construct a 215 MW combined heat and power generating station adjacent to the Shotton paper mill in Flintshire.

I have placed a copy of the decision letter in the Library.

Ministerial E-mail Address

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his e-mail address. [62554]

Mr. Mandelson: My e-mail address is "tlo.mandelson@tlo.dti.gov.uk".

Ford Motor Company

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the total value of grants paid by his Department to the Ford Motor Company since 1 May 1997. [61989]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 1 December 1998]: Ford Motor Company have not received any Regional Selective Assistance (RSA) payments from this Department since 1 May 1997. However Jaguar Cars Ltd., a wholly owned subsidiary of Ford, has received two RSA payments totalling £7 million during the same period.

Electricity Industry

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what direct representations he has made to the French Government calling for the speeding up of reciprocal changes to the French electricity market. [62220]

Mr. Battle: My officials have made representations to their French counterparts about the imbalance in electricity trade between the UK and France on two occasions, and we will continue to raise this issue with the French Government at both Ministerial and official level.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans his Department has to ensure two-way trade on the Anglo-French electricity interconnector. [62192]

Mr. Battle: The steps which the Government are considering taking in order to ensure fair trade in electricity with Europe were set out in the White Paper on the Conclusions of The Review of Energy Source for Power Generation (Cm 4071). These include reviewing interconnector trading in the context of the reform of wholesale trading arrangements and the use of the reciprocity provision in the electricity liberalisation directive. There should, however, be increasing opportunities for trade in electricity following implementation of the directive in February 1999.

Late Payment of Interest

Yvette Cooper: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the response by business to legislation on the late payment of interest. [61307]

Mrs. Roche: Late payment has a devastating impact on Britain's small businesses. This Government are determined to improve the UK's payment culture to ensure that small businesses can thrive and prosper.

The Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998 commenced on 1 November 1998 and provides small suppliers with a statutory right to claim interest on late paid bills and transfers the cost of late payment from the supplier to the late payer.

It is too early to draw conclusions about the impact legislation has had. However, evidence from other European Countries who have introduced legislation shows that effective legislation can tackle late payment, particularly when supported by other measures.

British Libya Interest Group

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his response to the latest representations of the British Libya Interest Group. [61462]

Mr. Wilson: The position of Her Majesty's Government is well known. Following recent representations from the British Libyan Business Group (BLBG), my officials will be meeting with their Chairman, Mr. Kevin Boyle, and others to listen to their concerns on 10 December 1998.

Agriculture (Producer Rights)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to require the Office of Fair Trading to review producer-wholesaler trading and the rights of producers with regards to the agricultural industry. [61937]

Dr. Howells: It is the responsibility of the Director General of Fair Trading to monitor markets and investigate allegations of anti-competitive behaviour.

He is currently carrying out an inquiry into the profitability of the major supermarkets in the grocery sector. The scope of this inquiry is a matter for him.

End of Life Vehicles (European Directive)

Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) when he will meet his European counterparts to discuss the European Directive on End of Life Vehicles; [61061]

(2) if he will ensure that special steel is given an exemption from the European Directive on the lead content of end of life vehicles. [61060]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 30 November 1998]: My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment will be attending the Environment Council on 21 December, and the Government understand that the Austrian Presidency is likely to put the draft End of Life Vehicles Directive on the agenda.

World Trade Organisation

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in what format reports from representatives of Her Majesty's Government who are members of the United Kingdom delegation to the World Trade Organisation are lodged. [61166]

Mr. Wilson: They take the form of letters, telegrams or telephone conversations to Government Departments with an interest in the particular issue.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the CVs of the representatives of Her Majesty's Government who are members of the United Kingdom delegation to the World Trade Organisation in Geneva are made public. [61163]

Mr. Wilson: Biographies of diplomatic staff appear in "The Diplomatic Service List" published annually by The Stationery Office. There are no rules on the provision of CVs to the public, this would be a matter for the individuals concerned.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what formal liaison takes place between the representatives of Her Majesty's Government on the United Kingdom delegations to (a) the World Trade Organisation in Geneva and (b) the European Union. [61164]

Mr. Wilson: Representatives in the two delegations liaise closely with each other and with Government Departments. When appropriate, members of the United Kingdom Delegation to the World Trade Organisation may attend formal European Union meetings.

Telephone Sales

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what guidelines exist regarding (a) telephone sales calls and (b) inducing residents to call high-cost telephone numbers in order to claim prizes offered through unsolicited mail (i) in the United Kingdom and (ii) from abroad; and if he will make a statement. [61503]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 30 November 1998]: The information requested is:

a (i) Under the Telecommunications Act 1984, UK companies using telephone marketing are subject to a class licence which contains measures aimed at limiting potential nuisance. In addition, the Telephone Preference Service (TPS) is a scheme to help residential customers reduce the number of telesales calls they receive. Residential customers can register for inclusion in a database against which companies selling via the telephone can voluntarily "clean" their mailing lists.

However, the Government are considering introducing an "opt-out" scheme for individual subscribers under the EC Telecoms Data Protection Directive as soon as is practicable in 1999. This scheme will be mandatory for companies selling by telephone.

a (ii) The EC Directive also applies to other Members States. Complaints about unsolicited telephone sales calls from abroad are extremely rare.

b (i and ii) Whether provided from the UK or abroad, mailshots encouraging residents to call high-cost lines to claim prizes are part of the Premium Rate Services (PRS) industry and are regulated by the Independent Committee for the Supervision of Standards of Telephone Information Services (ICSTIS) through a Code of Practice which covers the promotional material for and the duration of competitions and games with prizes. ICSTIS can fine service providers who breach the code and can recommend that network operators bar access to companies' services which breach the Code.

Members of the public can raise concerns about particular PRS services by telephoning ICSTIS' free complaints line on 0800 500212.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 321

SESSION 1998–99

24th November—3rd December 1998

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index to the daily parts and weekly Hansard is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Indexing Service (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes, and cannot, therefore, be used in conjunction with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instruments etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Contributions by Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker and deputies'. Significant rulings and statements are indicated by the sub-heading 'Rulings and statements'.

Opposition Day Debates and Estimates Day Debates are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates, etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Com = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, res = resolution, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
